St. Leo says that the advantages which accrue to us through the death of Jesus Christ are far greater than the losses the devil has occasioned us by sin. St. Paul tells us the same: "Not as the offense, so also the gift . . . for where sin abounded, grace did more abound." (Rom. 5:15, 20).

Therefore, our Saviour exhorts us to hope for all graces through His infinite merits. He Himself teaches us how to present our petitions to His heavenly Father: "Amen, amen I say to you: if you ask the Father any thing in my name, he will give it you." (John 16:23). "He that spared not even his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how hath he not also, with him, given us all things?" (Rom. 8:32). According to the Apostles, therefore, God has excepted nothing, neither the forgiveness of sins, nor final perseverance, nor divine love and perfection, nor Heaven itself; "with him he hath given us all things." The only thing for us to do is to ask Him for His graces, for "the Lord is rich unto all that call upon him." (Rom. 10:12).

CHRIST'S INTERCESSION

Do not forget, says the Venerable John of Avila, that between the Eternal Father and ourselves there is a Mediator, Jesus Christ, to whom we are united by bonds of love so strong that nothing can ever break them unless we ourselves break them by mortal sin. The blood of Jesus Christ cries for mercy in our behalf, and that cry is so loud that the clamor of our sins cannot be heard. No one is lost, therefore, because satisfaction has not been made for him, but because by the neglect of the Sacraments he fails to share in the satisfaction which Jesus Christ has made. Christ Our Lord has taken it upon Himself to remedy our ills as if they were His own. He who was without sin, took upon Himself our sins and prayed for forgiveness for them. And He prayed to His heavenly Father with as much fervor as if He were praying for Himself. What He desired, He obtained. God willed that we should be so inseparably united to Jesus Christ that He cannot be loved except we be loved with Him; nor can we be hated except He be hated with us. But now Jesus cannot be hated; therefore, we shall be loved as long as we remain united to Him by love.

Jesus is loved by His heavenly Father; therefore we are loved with Him. He is far more powerful to win God's love for us than we are to draw His hatred on ourselves, for God loves His Divine Son more than He hates the sinner. Our Lord spoke thus to His heavenly Father: "Father, I will that where I am, they also whom thou hast given me, may be with me." (John 17:24). As love is stronger than hatred, love carries off the victory. Our sins are forgiven and the love of God bestowed on us and the strength of the bond of love gives us the assurance that God will never forsake us. "Can a woman forget her infant . . . ?" says the prophet Isaias; "and if she should forget, yet will not I forget thee. Behold, I have graven thee in my hands." (Is. 49:15–16).

The Lord has written us in His hands with His own blood. Therefore we should allow nothing to disquiet us, for He arranges and disposes everything with these very hands which were nailed to the Cross as a proof of His love for us.

THE INTERCESSION OF THE BLESSED MOTHER

A fourth motive for unbounded confidence is the powerful intercession of Mary our Mother. St. Bernard says that we have access to the Eternal Father through His Divine Son, who is a mediator of justice. But we have access to the Son through His holy Mother, who is the mediatrix of grace and who, by her intercession, has obtained for us what Jesus Christ has merited by His death. "Through thee who hast found grace, may we have access to the Son, O Mother of our Salvation, in order that through thee He may receive us who through thee was given to us." All goods and graces, therefore, that we receive from God come to us through the intercession of Mary. And why is this? St. Bernard replies: "Because God has wished it so."

A further reason of this privilege of Mary, St. Augustine gives us when he says: "Mary can rightly be called our Mother because by her love she contributed towards giving us the life of grace and making us members of the mystic body of Christ." As Mary, therefore, by her love contributed towards the spiritual regeneration of the faithful, God has willed that through her intercession all men shall obtain the life of grace here and the life of glory hereafter. On this account the Church desires us to invoke her as "our life, our sweetness and our hope." Accordingly, St. Bernard exhorts us to have constant recourse to this divine Mother because her petitions are certainly answered. "Hasten to Mary," he writes, "for I say it without hesitation, the Son will certainly hear the Mother. She is the ladder of safety for poor sinners. She is my greatest assurance; she is the only ground of my hope." He calls Mary a ladder for sinners, for as you cannot mount to the third round before putting the foot on the second, nor to the second before reaching the first, so you can reach God only through Jesus Christ, and Jesus Christ only through Mary. The Saint calls Mary his greatest assurance and the only ground of his hope, for it is his firm conviction that God desires all graces that He bestows on us to come through the hands of Mary.

QUALITIES OF HOPE

We shall now devote our attention to the qualities that should characterize our hope. First of all, our hope must be firm and unwavering. "Hope of eternal happiness," according to St. Thomas, "is the confident expectation of this happiness." With this doctrine the Council of Trent agrees when it says: "We must all confidently hope for the assistance of God; for as God has begun the good work in us, He wills to complete it, provided we make use of His grace; both the desire and its realization are from Him." (Sess. 6, ch. 18). This is what the Apostle St. Paul taught in his letter to Timothy: "I know whom I have believed, and I am certain that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him, against that day." (2 Tim. 1:12). In this we see the distinction between Christian hope and that which is purely human. With human hope there is always connected the fear that the person who has made a promise has changed or will change his mind. Christian hope, on the contrary, which looks to eternal salvation, has no doubt or fear whatever regarding God. The Lord is able and willing to grant us eternal happiness, and what is more He has promised it to all who keep His commandments; for this end He pledges Himself to grant to all who seek them the graces necessary to fulfill His commands. It is nevertheless true that even Christian hope is not altogether free from a certain fear; but as St. Thomas says: "We have nothing to fear on the part of God, but only from ourselves." It is quite possible that we may fail to cooperate with God's grace and even place obstacles in its way.

The Council of Trent was right, therefore, in condemning the innovators for saying that man has no freedom of will, and that each one must have an infallible certainty with regard to his perseverance in grace and eternal happiness. This doctrine the Council condemned because, as we have just seen, our cooperation is necessary for the attainment of eternal happiness—and this cooperation is uncertain. God desires, therefore, that on the one hand we foster a certain anxiety in order that we may not, by trusting to our own strength, be put to confusion; but on the other hand He wishes us to be absolutely certain that it is His Will to make us eternally happy and that He will give us all the graces we need if we but ask Him. We should therefore trust with unwavering confidence in His goodness. St. Thomas says: "We must confidently expect eternal happiness from the power and mercy of God, believing firmly that God can make us happy and that He wishes to do so."

It sometimes happens that, owing to spiritual aridity or the disquiet resulting from a fault we have committed, we feel an absence of that sensible confidence in prayer which we would gladly experience. We must not on that account cease to pray, because God will very likely hear us sooner then than at other times, since we are apt to pray with greater distrust in ourselves and more hope in the goodness and fidelity of God. Oh how pleasing and acceptable it is to God when in fear and dread and every temptation we hope against hope; that is to say, when in spite of a feeling of mistrust arising from our own misery, we nevertheless trust in Him, as did the Patriarch Abraham, whom the Apostle praises because "against hope he believed in hope." (Rom. 4:18).

Secondly, our hope must be founded on God alone. The Lord forbids us to place our trust in creatures: "Put not your trust in princes." (Ps. 145:2). "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man." (Jer. 17:5). God desires us not to build on creatures because He does not want us to be attached to them with inordinate love. St. Vincent de Paul advises us not to count much on the protection of men, for if we do the Lord will withdraw from us; on the other hand, the more we grow in the love of God the more we will trust in Him. "I have run the way of thy commandments when thou didst enlarge my heart" (Ps. 118:32), by confidence.

But someone may say: If God alone is our hope, how can the Church address Mary as "Our hope"? Let us listen to what St. Thomas says on this point. We can place our hope in anyone, says the Saint, in a twofold manner; we can regard one as the principal and ultimate cause of our hope, or as the secondary and mediate cause. For example, one may hope for a favor from a king and from his minister or favorite. The king would be the principal or ultimate cause from which he hopes, the minister or favorite the mediate or intercessory. If the latter grants the favor, it comes nevertheless from the former, but through the intercession of the latter.

Now as the King of Heaven is Infinite Goodness itself, He desires to enrich us with His graces; but as great confidence on our part is necessary to obtain them, He has, in order to increase our confidence, given us His own Mother as our Mother and mediatrix to assist us. Therefore He wishes us to place our hope of salvation and of all goods and graces in her. According to the words of the prophet, they who put their trust in creatures are cursed. This passage refers to those who disregard their God and place their hope in the friendship and favor of man. But those who hope in Mary, the Mother of God, who has the power to obtain for them grace and eternal life, will be blessed by God. They give great joy to His loving heart, for He desires to see honored and loved that exalted creature who on earth loved and honored Him more than all men and angels together. We are right therefore in calling the Blessed Virgin our hope, for by means of her intercession we hope to obtain what we never could obtain by our feeble prayers alone. We beg her for her intercession, says Suarez, in order that the dignity of the intercessor may supply what is wanting in us. By invoking Mary with confidence, we manifest no distrust in the mercy of God, but simply fear on account of our own unworthiness. Holy Church is justified therefore in calling Mary "The Mother of holy hope," and by this she wishes to say that Mary awakens in us the hope of the inestimable goods of eternity.

Thirdly, our hope must be an active hope. In order that our hope may not be in vain it must labor; that is to say, to unbounded confidence in God we must unite the use of the means of salvation and sanctification which the Divine Majesty has given us; otherwise we should belong to those idle souls who tempt the Lord. We must act as if the obtaining of our salvation depended entirely on ourselves, and yet we must place all our confidence in God and be thoroughly convinced that of ourselves we are utterly unable to attain what we desire. God accomplishes everything by means of His grace, but He nevertheless desires our cooperation. If this cooperation, insignificant though it is, be wanting, God withdraws from us and treats us as indolent servants deserving of naught but to be cast out into exterior darkness. "Wherefore, brethren, labor the more, that by good works, you may make sure your calling and election." (2 Peter 1:10).

But what have we to do? Above all things we must pray. And how long must we pray? Until, says St. John Chrysostom, we hear the favorable sentence that assures us of eternal salvation. And he adds: He who says: "I will not stop praying until I am eternally happy," will certainly be eternally happy. "Know you not," says the Apostle, "that they that run in the race all run indeed, but one receiveth the prize? So run that you may obtain." (1 Cor. 9:24). In order to be eternally happy it is not enough, therefore, merely to pray; we must continue to pray until we are in possession of the crown that God has promised us.

If we desire to be happy for all eternity we must imitate David the prophet, who kept his eyes always directed to the Lord in order to implore His help and not be overcome by his enemies: "My eyes are ever towards the Lord, for he shall pluck my feet out of the snare." (Ps. 24:15). The devil is never tired of laying snares for our destruction: "Your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, goeth about seeking whom he may devour." (1 Peter 5:8). Therefore we must keep our weapons ever in our hands to defend ourselves against such an enemy. We must say with the royal Psalmist: "I will pursue my enemies . . . until they are consumed." (Ps. 17:38). But how shall we win so important and difficult a victory? Only by prayer, says St. Augustine, and persevering prayer. But how long must it last? As long as the struggle goes on. Just as the contest never ceases, says St. Bonaventure, so we must never cease calling on God for His assistance, which is necessary for us so as not to succumb. "Woe to them that have lost patience," says the Wise Man (Ecclus. 2:16), and have given up prayer. Blessed shall we be "if we hold fast the confidence and glory of hope unto the end." (Heb. 3:6).

By means of the assistance we receive through prayer we must endeavor to keep the Commandments of God and do violence to ourselves so as not to yield to the temptations of Hell: "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent bear it away." (Matt. 11:12). We must do violence to ourselves in temptations by conquering ourselves and mortifying our senses so as not to be overcome by the enemy of our souls. And when we have been guilty of a fault, says St. Ambrose, let us do violence to the Lord by prayers and tears in order to obtain His forgiveness. To inspire us with courage the Saint continues: “O blessed violence that God does not punish with His wrath but receives with mercy and reward! The greater this violence the more pleasing it is to Jesus Christ.” He concludes with the following words: “We must rule over ourselves by subduing our evil passions in order to win Heaven which Jesus Christ has merited for us.”

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole mind."—Matt. 22:37.

Chapter 3

THE LOVE OF GOD

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole mind."—Matt. 22:37

Love of God is a divinely infused virtue which leads us to love the Lord Our God as the sovereign good, and purely for His own sake. The motive which prompts us to love God is His own boundless perfection, on account of which alone He deserves to be loved, even though we had no reward to hope for or no punishment to dread. He who loves God because he finds in Him his own happiness has an interested, a selfish love, which really belongs to the virtue of hope and not to love. But he who loves God because for His own sake He deserves to be loved, has the true and genuine love of friendship. The companions of King Louis of France met a woman one day who carried in one hand a burning torch and in the other a vessel of water. On being asked what these things signified, she replied: "With this torch I would gladly burn Heaven, and with this water extinguish the fire of Hell, in order that men might love God not because of the reward of Heaven or the punishment of Hell, but simply and solely because He deserves to be loved."

The perfect love of God, however, does not exclude the hope of Heaven. We love God because He deserves to be loved, and we would love Him even though we had no reward to expect for doing so. But knowing as we do that He will give us a reward and that He even desires us to hope for it, we must confidently expect it and strive to attain it. To long for Heaven in order to possess God and love Him more perfectly is a true and perfect love of God, for eternal glory is the perfection of this love.

All perfection consists in the love of God; for love is the virtue which unites us most intimately with God. All the other virtues are of no account unless they are accompanied by love. On the other hand, love has all the other virtues in her train, according to the teaching of St. Paul: "Charity is patient, is kind: charity envieth not, dealeth not perversely; is not puffed up; is not ambitious, seeketh not her own, is not provoked to anger, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth with the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." (1 Cor. 13:4–7). "Love," concludes the Apostle, "is the fulfillment of the law." (Rom. 13:10). This induced St. Augustine to say: "Love and then do what you wish." He who loves another is very careful to cause him no offense; on the contrary, he is eager to do what will afford him pleasure. In like manner, he who loves God above all things abhors an offense against Him more than death itself, and strives as much as in him lies to please God. The first and greatest commandment which the Lord has given us, bids us love Him with our whole heart. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart." (Deut. 6:5). As God has loved us with an infinite love, He desires that we should love Him sincerely, and He longs to possess our whole heart: "Son, give me thy heart." (Prov. 23:26). "What doth the Lord, thy God, require of thee, but that thou fear the Lord, thy God, and walk in his ways and love him, and serve the Lord, thy God, with all thy heart and with all thy soul." (Deut. 10:12).

In the Old Law God commanded that fire be kept constantly burning on the altar. This altar, says St. Gregory, is a type of our heart in which the fire of divine love must ever burn. Therefore, to the command to love Him with the whole heart, God added this injunction: "And these words which I command thee this day shall be in thy heart; and thou shalt meditate upon them sitting in thy house, and walking on thy journey, sleeping and rising. And thou shalt bind them as a sign on thy hand, and they shall be and shall move between thy eyes. And thou shalt write them in the entry and on the doors of thy house" (Deut. 6:6–9), in order to be continually mindful of them and make thy life conformable to them. As a reward for this love, God promises to give us Himself: "I am thy protector and thy reward exceeding great." (Gen. 15:1). The princes of this world reward their faithful subjects with possessions, honors and privileges. The Lord God gives them who love Him nothing less than Himself.

We should certainly be amply rewarded by the knowledge that God loves those who love Him, as He says in so many passages of Holy Writ: "I love them that love me." (Prov. 8:17). "He that abideth in charity, abideth in God and God in him." (1 John 4:16). "He that loveth me shall be loved by my Father; and I will love him." (John 14:21). If we knew that in some distant country there lived a handsome, holy, learned and compassionate prince, we could not refrain from loving him even though he had done us no good whatever. But what are all the excellent qualities of such a prince compared to those of our God! God possesses every perfection in an infinite degree. He possesses everything that makes Him worthy of our love. Could He have offered a greater, better, nobler, richer or more amiable object for our love than Himself?

Who is of higher nobility than God? Illustrious people are proud of the fact that their nobility goes back five hundred or a thousand years; the nobility of God is from all eternity. Who is greater than God? He is the Lord of all. The angels of Heaven and the powerful on earth are to Him as a drop in the mighty ocean or as a miserable grain of dust. A single word from Him brought the world into being; a single word could consign everything to oblivion. Who is richer than God? He possesses the treasures of Heaven and earth. Who is more beautiful than God? The beauty of all creatures vanishes before the glory of God. Who is more beneficent than God? St. Augustine says that the efforts of God to bestow favors on us are greater even than our desire to receive them. Who is more merciful than God? As soon as a sinner, though it be the most abandoned wretch on earth, humbles himself before God and repents of his sins, God pardons him and receives him back. Who is more grateful than God? He never permits anything we do for love of Him to go unrewarded. In fine, who is more amiable and deserving of love than God? His very face fills the Saints of Heaven with a delight that constitutes their perfect happiness for all eternity. On the contrary, the greatest suffering of the reprobate consists in their knowing and seeing the lovable nature of God without being able to love Him.

We must therefore love God from our heart because He is worthy of all love. On account of the love God bears us, He is deserving of our sincerest gratitude. If we could unite the love of all men and angels and saints in one heart, this united love could not compare with the least degree of the love God bears each single soul. St. John Chrysostom says that God loves us more than we can love ourselves. "I have loved thee with an everlasting love" (Jer. 31:3), says God to each one of us. Those who loved us first on earth were our parents; but they began to love us only when they began to know us; God, on the contrary, loved us before we had an existence. Even before our parents lived, God loved us; yes, even before the creation of the world. In a word, He has loved us as long as He is God, and that is from all eternity. That heroic virgin St. Agnes was right when she said to those who sought to win her affections: "Another lover has come before you." O world and creatures of the world, I cannot love you; for as God has loved me first it is no more than right that I should give and consecrate to Him my heart.

NATURE BIDS US LOVE GOD

Heaven and earth cry out, says St. Augustine, everything I see speaks to me and urges me to love Thee my Lord; all creatures tell me Thou hast created them for love of me. When the Abbot de Rance, founder of the Trappists, would gaze through the window of his cell and see the stars and the heaven, the birds and the flowers, and consider that God had created all these to show him His love, he felt his heart inflamed with love for God. The very sight of a flower enkindled love in the heart of St. Mary Magdalen; "The loving God," she would exclaim, "has created this little flower to win my love."

When St. Teresa looked at the trees or flowers or the meadows and brooks, she said they accused her of ingratitude and chided her with her little love for a Creator who had called all these things into being just to be loved by her. "Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends." (John 15:13). Do you believe, O Christian soul, that Jesus Christ died for love of you? And if you believe this, can you love anything but Him? Before the Incarnation of the Eternal Word, says a celebrated author, man might doubt whether God loved him tenderly or not; but now that Jesus Christ has become man and died for us, such a doubt is impossible.

THE SUFFERINGS OF CHRIST A PROOF OF LOVE

How could Our Lord have better proved His love for us than by suffering so many pains and such contempt and by ending His life in bitter agony on the Cross? But alas, we have grown so accustomed to hear of the Incarnation and the Redemption, of a God born in a stable, a God that was scourged and crowned and crucified, that it makes but little impression on us. O holy faith, enlighten us that we may see what boundless love God has shown us in becoming man and dying on a cross. If Jesus Christ is not loved by mankind, it is because so few think of the love He has shown them; for would it be possible to think of this, and live without loving Him? St. Paul says: "The charity of Christ presseth us" (2 Cor. 5:14); that is to say, a soul that considers the love of Jesus for mankind is forced, as it were, to love in return.

When the Saints reflected on the Passion of our Blessed Redeemer they were so inflamed with love that they frequently gave vent to their astonishment and devotion. One day, in an ecstasy of devotion, St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi caught hold of an image of the Crucified and exclaimed: "O Jesus, Thou hast become foolish with love. I say it and I shall never grow weary repeating it, love has made Thee foolish, my Jesus." If faith had not assured us of the truth of the great mystery of our Redemption, who could believe it possible that the Creator of the universe willed to suffer and die for His creatures. If Jesus had not died for us, who would ever have dared to ask God to become man and suffer and die to redeem mankind? Who would not have considered such a thought the height of folly? Indeed, when the heathens were told of the death of Jesus Christ they regarded it as a fable and called it an incredible folly, as St. Paul tells us: "We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews indeed a stumbling block, and unto the Gentiles foolishness." (1 Cor. 1:23).

Yes, says St. Gregory, it seemed foolishness to them that the Author of life should die for men. How can we believe, they said, that a God who depends on no one and who in Himself is perfectly happy, should come down upon earth, assume human nature and die for His wretched creatures? That would be saying that for love of man God has become a fool. Yet it is a truth of our holy faith that for love of us poor ungrateful creatures, Jesus Christ, the true Son of God, gave Himself up to an ignominious death: "He hath loved us and delivered Himself for us." And why has Jesus done all this? He has done it, says St. Augustine, in order that man might recognize the inexpressible love which God bears him. Our Divine Redeemer Himself expressed the same idea in these words: "I have come to cast fire on the earth and what will I but that it be kindled!" (Luke 12:49). The fire of divine love I will kindle on earth and I desire nothing else but that the hearts of men be consumed with these holy flames.

With wonder and astonishment St. Bernard contemplates Our Lord bound like a criminal by the wicked soldiers. "O my Jesus," he exclaims, "how is it I see ropes and chains on Thy sacred body; art Thou not the King of Heaven and Holiness itself? It is we ungrateful servants who have deserved these ropes and chains." What has reduced Thee to such a pitiable condition, appearing like a wretched criminal? Ah, it is love. Love seems to forget its dignity when it seeks to win love in return. God, therefore, whom no man can vanquish, has been vanquished by love. His love for us induced Him to become man and to lose His life in a very ocean of suffering and sorrow.

As St. Bernard contemplates our Divine Redeemer before Pilate, he addresses Him in the following words: "Tell me, my beloved Jesus, Thou who art Innocence itself, what hast Thou done to deserve so cruel a sentence of death? Ah, I see now the cause of Thy death; I know what crime Thou hast committed, my Jesus! It is Thy love for us; yes, it is not Pilate, but Thy love that pronounces the sentence of death, and delivers the fatal blow." At the sight of a crucifix, St. Francis of Paul exclaimed: "O love, O love, O love!" And this is what we all must say at the sight of our crucified Lord: O love, O love, O love! Oh, that all men who look at the Cross of Christ would think of the love that God has borne each one of us! "With what love would we be inflamed," says St. Francis de Sales, "did we but see the flames of love that burn in the heart of Christ! What a happiness for us did we glow with the fire that consumes our Lord and God! What joy, to be bound with the bonds of love for God!" As St. Bonaventure has said, the wounds of our Saviour must move the most unfeeling hearts and warm the coldest souls with love.

How many are the darts of love that issue from these sacred wounds and pierce the hardest hearts! "What is man," says Job, "that thou shouldst magnify him? or why dost thou set thy heart upon him?" (Job 7:17). O my God, what is wretched man that Thou shouldst honor him so much? What good hast Thou ever received from him, that Thou shouldst be wholly intent, as it seems, upon bestowing benefits on him and showing him Thy love? St. Thomas says that the love which consumes the heart of God makes it appear as though in man He saw His God, and that He could not be happy unless man were happy too.

Truly, Christian soul, if you had been God could Jesus Christ have done more for you than He has done by His life of suffering and His ignominious death? And if there had been a question of our Redeemer saving the life of His own Eternal Father, could He have done more than He has done for you? But, O God, where is our gratitude? If an insignificant servant had suffered for us what our heavenly Spouse has endured, could we ever forget it? Could we live without loving him? In very truth, we ought to be fairly beside ourselves with love when reflecting on the death of Jesus Christ, and say with St. Paschal: "My Love is nailed to the Cross for me; my Love has died for me."

But what we have neglected to do in the past we can at least try to do in the future, as God still gives us time. Jesus died for us, says St. Paul, in order that His love might win a perfect mastery over our hearts: "For to this end Christ died and rose again; that he might be Lord both of the dead and of the living." (Rom. 14:9). "And Christ died for all," says the same Apostle, "that they also who live, may not now live to themselves, but unto him who died for them and rose again." (2 Cor. 5:15). With this intention of the Divine Redeemer the Saints have corresponded most perfectly. When considering the love that induced their Lord to suffer and die for them, they deemed it but little, for love of Him, to offer Him all they had, yes, even their very lives.

How many potentates, kings, queens and empresses have renounced their riches and relatives and given up their throne and country to enter a cloister and devote their lives to the love of Jesus Christ! How many martyrs have considered it a source of joy and happiness to surrender their lives in the midst of cruel torments for the love of their Lord and God! How many young men and women have rejected the most brilliant alliances and have gladly offered their lives as a token of their love for a God who died for love of them!

And you, Christian soul, what have you done for your Divine Redeemer! What proof of your love have you given Him? It is certain that Jesus died for you as well as for a St. Lucy, a St. Agatha, a St. Agnes. Think of the special graces He has given you and which He has denied to so many others. Think of the many He has permitted to be born in countries where infidelity and unbelief hold sway! How many of these unhappy creatures deprived of the Sacraments and means of eternal salvation are consigned to eternal perdition! And you have received the grace to be born in the bosom of the Church of God! Think of the great mercy that God has shown you, forgiving the many offenses you have committed against Him. To move Him to forgive you, all that was necessary was to repent and to ask for forgiveness; but, alas, you have treated Him with ingratitude and offended Him anew. And yet He was willing to pardon you again and with the same love. Instead of punishing you as you deserved, He showered upon you His graces and inspirations. At this very moment, while you are reading these words, He continues to invite you to His love. Well then! What do you propose to do? Is it possible you can resist any longer? Why do you still hesitate? Do you wish to wait until God ceases to call, and abandons you?

MEANS OF ADVANCING IN GOD'S LOVE

We shall now consider the means of advancing in the love of God. St. Teresa says that it is an extraordinary grace for a soul to be called to the perfect love of God. To these happy souls, you, dear reader, belong. In order, however, to dedicate yourself entirely to the love of your Divine Spouse, as He desires you to do, you must courageously make use of the means conducive to that end. The first means is an ardent desire for this perfect love. With such a desire you have already taken a considerable step. God distributes His graces in abundance to those only who hunger and thirst for them, as the Blessed Virgin says in her wonderful hymn of praise, the Magnificat: "He hath filled the hungry with good things." (Luke 1:53). But this desire is absolutely necessary for us, for otherwise we should never persevere in our efforts to obtain the treasure of the love of God. We take little or no pains in striving to obtain that for which we have little or no desire. On the other hand, all trouble is light and sweet when our efforts are prompted by an ardent desire. Hence it is that Our Lord calls those blessed who have not merely a desire, but a hunger—that is to say, a great desire—for holiness: "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after justice." (Matt. 5:6).

The second means of obtaining the perfect love of God consists in renouncing all love that does not refer to God. God desires to possess our hearts alone and will tolerate no rival. St. Augustine relates that the Roman Senate willingly acknowledged the 30,000 gods of the pagans, while they refused to worship the God of the Christians, because He was a jealous God who wished to be adored alone. Our God was right in claiming exclusive adoration, because He alone is the only true God. Accordingly, if we wish to arrive at the perfect love of God, we must banish from our heart every attachment that has not God for its object. The ardent St. Francis de Sales said: "If I knew that in my heart there was a single fiber that was not from God, in God, and for God, I would immediately tear it out." As long as the heart is not free from earthly inclinations, the love of God can find no entrance there; but as soon as it is detached from creatures the fire of divine love is enkindled and grows continually stronger. Therefore St. Teresa used to say: "Separate your heart from creatures and seek God; you will surely find Him then." Father Segneri the Younger wrote one day to a pious friend: "Divine love is a beneficent robber who takes from us all earthly inclinations, so that the soul can say to her beloved Spouse: What do I wish but Thee alone." St. Francis de Sales expresses himself in a similar manner: "The pure love of God consumes in the heart all that is not God, to turn everything into love, for all that man does for God is love."

"I count all things but as dung," says St. Paul, "that I may gain Christ." (Phil. 3:8). When the love of God has entered our hearts, we place no longer any value on what the world esteems: "If a man shall give all the substance of his house for love, he shall despise it as nothing." (Cant. 8:7). "If a house is on fire," says St. Francis de Sales, "they throw everything out the window." As soon as a heart is inflamed with the love of God it seeks to divest itself of everything earthly so as to love nothing but God. Does God ask too much when He desires the soul to love nothing but Him? "No," says St. Bonaventure, "God is infinitely amiable and supremely good, deserving of our undivided love; He is perfectly right when He desires that a heart which He has created, should belong to Him alone; and since He has given Himself in sacrifice for us, He has acquired a still greater claim to our undivided love."

SELF-DENIAL

In order to attain to the perfect love of God it is necessary, moreover, to deny oneself by gladly embracing what is opposed to self-love, and refusing oneself what self-love demands. One day when St. Teresa was sick, they brought her a very palatable dish; the Saint would not touch it. The attendant urged her to eat, saying that the dish was well-prepared. "That's just the reason I abstain from eating it," replied the Saint. And so with us; what pleases us most, in that we must deny ourselves, and just because it pleases us. For example, we must turn our eyes away from this or that object because it is beautiful; deny ourselves this or that pleasure because it is most agreeable to us; do a service to an ungrateful person just because he is ungrateful; take a bitter medicine just because it is bitter. According to St. Francis de Sales, our self-love wants to have a share in everything, even in things the most holy. For this very reason, says the Saint, we must love even virtue without attachment. For example, it is necessary to love prayer and solitude; but when obedience or charity prevent us from devoting ourselves to prayer and solitude we should not be disquieted, but accept resignedly everything that happens by the will of God to thwart our inclinations.

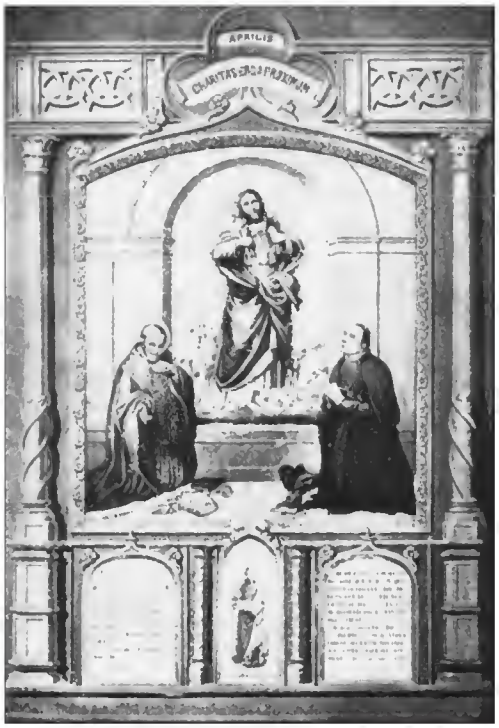
THE PASSION OF CHRIST

The fourth means of acquiring the perfect love of God consists in frequent meditation on the sufferings of Jesus Christ. St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi says that he who has given himself entirely to the love of his Crucified Lord needs but to look at the cross to be buried in the contemplation of the boundless love that Jesus Christ has borne him. It would seem as though our Redeemer endured so many different torments and insults, such as His betrayal, His agony, His scourging, His crowning and His Crucifixion in order to afford subjects for meditation to those souls that love Him. And yet we must not reflect on the sufferings of Jesus Christ for the sake of the consolation and sweetness it affords, but only to inflame our hearts with love for our suffering Saviour and to learn from Him what He desires us to do.

At the same time, we must declare ourselves ready to bear everything patiently for love of Him who suffered so much for love of us. The Lord once revealed to a pious hermit that no devotion was better calculated to enkindle the love of God in the heart than meditation on the sufferings of Christ. It has always been a favorite devotion with the Saints. St. Francis of Assisi became a seraph of love by meditating on the Passion of Christ. He was found one day bathed in tears and uttering loud sighs. When asked what was the cause of his grief he replied: "I am weeping over the pains and insults of my Divine Master. But what grieves me most is that men for whom He suffered so much never think of the torments He endured." If the Saint heard the bleating of a lamb, or saw anything that reminded him of the sufferings of Christ, he was forced to shed tears. Once when he was sick and someone advised him to read an edifying book, he replied: "My book is Jesus Crucified." He constantly exhorted his brethren to think of the Passion of Christ.

The fifth means of acquiring the treasure of God's love is prayer. The constant prayer of a Christian soul must be: "Jesus, give me Thy holy love;

Mary my Mother, obtain for me the love of God; my Guardian Angel and all my holy patrons, intercede for me that I may love my God with my whole heart and soul." The Lord is generous in the bestowal of His gifts; but He is especially bountiful in giving His love to those who seek it.



"This is My Commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you."—John 15:12.

Chapter 4

LOVE FOR OUR NEIGHBOR

"This is my commandment, that you love one another as I have loved you."—John 15:12

It is impossible to love the Lord our God without at the same time loving our neighbor. The commandment that obliges us to love our God, obliges us also to love our neighbor. "And this commandment we have from God, that he who loveth God, love also his brother." (1 John 4:21). From these words of the Apostle, St. Thomas Aquinas concludes that the one virtue of love embraces the love of God and the love of our neighbor. St. Jerome tells us that when the disciples of St. John the Evangelist asked him why he spoke so often of brotherly love, he replied: "Because it is the commandment of the Lord, and the fulfillment of this alone is sufficient for eternal salvation."

St. Catherine of Genoa once said to Our Lord: "O my God, Thou commandest me to love my neighbor, and I can love no one but Thee." Our Saviour replied: "My daughter, whoever loves Me loves everything that is loved by Me." Why, therefore, must we love our neighbor? Because he is loved by God. St. John was therefore right when he called him a liar who says that he loves God but hates his neighbor. Our Lord has promised that He will regard as done to Himself what we do for the least of our brethren: "Amen I say to you, as long as you did it to one of these, my least brethren, you did it to me." (Matt. 25:40). From this St. Catherine of Genoa concludes: "If you wish to know how much a person loves his God, see how much he loves his neighbor."

Christian charity is one of the principal fruits of the Redemption. The prophet Isaias had foretold this truth in the following words: "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid: the calf and the lion and the sheep shall abide together, and a little child shall lead them." (Is. 11:6). By these words he wished to say that the followers of Jesus Christ, though from different nations and different climes and of unlike characters and inclinations, would nevertheless live peacefully together, for brotherly love would induce them to practice mutual forbearance. And St. Luke, when speaking of the first Christians, says: "The multitude of believers had but one heart and one soul." (Acts 4:32).

This was the effect of the prayer which our Redeemer addressed to His heavenly Father on the eve of His Sacred Passion: "Holy Father, keep them in thy name whom thou hast given me; that they may be one, as we also are." (John 17:11).

RASH JUDGMENTS

Dear Christian reader, if you are desirous of practicing the beautiful virtue of charity, strive in the first place to reject every rash judgment, every distrust, and unfounded suspicion of your neighbor. It is a grave fault, without sufficient reason, to doubt the innocence of another. It is graver still to entertain a real suspicion, and far more so when without adequate reason we hold for certain that another has done wrong. He who judges in this manner will himself be judged: "Judge not," says our Divine Redeemer, "that you may not be judged; for with what judgment you judge, you shall be judged; and with what measure you mete, it shall be measured to you again." (Malt. 7:1–2). I say, "without sufficient reason," for when there are good grounds for suspecting or even believing evil of another, no sin is committed by such thoughts. However, it is, according to the teaching of the Apostle, always safer and more in harmony with charity to think well of others and to refrain from all unfavorable judgments and suspicions: "Charity thinketh no evil." (1 Cor. 13:5).

This advice is not intended, of course, for those who are entrusted with the guidance of others, for it is advisable and even at times necessary for such to entertain a certain distrust; otherwise great evils may arise as the result of an overweening confidence. But if you are not charged with the duty of watching over others, try always to think well of your fellow men. St. Jane de Chantal says: "In our neighbor we must direct our attention to the good and not to the evil. And if it should happen that we deceive ourselves by regarding as good what in reality is bad, we need not be disturbed, for St. Augustine says, charity is not grieved when by mistake it attributes something good to one who is evil."

Beware of trying to find out the faults of your neighbor. Do not imitate those who go about inquiring what is said of them and thereby fill their heart with suspicion, bitterness and aversion. Things are often represented to be different from what they really are. If you hear, therefore, that an unfavorable comment has been passed on you, do not attach much importance to the assertion and do not seek to know its origin or source. Act in such a manner that everyone must speak well of you, and then let others talk as they will. You might possibly say to yourself when your faults are spoken of: "That is the least they can say about me; what if they knew all!"

CALUMNY AND SLANDER

To practice charity in speech you must, above all things, avoid calumny and slander. He who has contracted this deplorable habit disfigures his own soul and is hated everywhere, as the Holy Ghost says: "He shall defile his own soul and shall be hated by all." (Ecclus. 21:31). If there are some who agree with him at times and encourage him in speaking ill of his neighbor, these very persons will later avoid him and be on their guard against his venomous tongue. They reason, and justly so, that if he speaks ill of others to them, he will speak ill of them to others. St. Jerome remarks that many who have renounced the other vices seem not to be able to keep from uncharitable talk. Even among those who have vowed to strive after perfection there are many who cannot move their tongue without wounding someone. God grant they may not end their life as did one unhappy slanderer; when on his deathbed, he bit his tongue in a fit of rage, and in this condition he died. St. Bernard speaks of another who was about to speak ill of St. Malachy when suddenly his tongue became swollen and was devoured by worms; after seven days of terrible agony he died a wretched death.

But, on the other hand, how dear to God and man is he who speaks well of everyone! "If in the course of his life, a man never spoke ill of his fellowman, I would consider him a saint," says St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi. Carefully guard against the habit of speaking unkindly of others, and especially of superiors. We render ourselves guilty of detraction not only when we reveal the hidden faults of our neighbor, but also when we interpret his good works amiss or assign to them an evil intention. It is a common fault with some people when speaking of their neighbor to begin with praise and end with blame. For example, "So and So is very capable; isn't it too bad he's so proud?" Or, "He is very generous, but he spoils it all by being revengeful."

Dear reader, try always to say only what is good of your neighbor. Speak of others as you would wish others to speak of you. And in regard to the absent, follow the beautiful advice of St. Mary Magdalen of Pazzi: "Say nothing of an absent brother that you would not wish to say in his presence." When you hear others speaking unkindly, be careful not to encourage them by manifesting an interest or pleasure in what they say; you might otherwise be a partner in their guilt.

"Six things there are," says the Wise Man, "which the Lord hateth and the seventh his soul detesteth." (Prov. 6:16). This seventh thing is the person who "soweth discord among brethren." The talebearer goes about telling people what he has heard others say of them. He scatters the seeds of discord, enmity, quarrels and revenge. How severe the account such tongues will have to give before the judgment seat of God. If in the heat of passion one person speaks ill of another, we can have patience with him; most likely he will repent of what he has said. But how can the Lord be patient with those who deliberately sow seeds of discord and strife and destroy the peace and happiness of their fellow men? "Hast thou heard a word against thy neighbor?" says the Holy Ghost; "let it die within thee, trusting that it will not burst thee." (Ecclus. 19:10). You must not be satisfied merely to enclose it in your heart; you must let it die there.

There are people who, on hearing a secret, seem to suffer the agonies of death until they can make it known in some way. Their secret is like a thorn that is piercing the heart and it must be torn out as soon as possible. Do not act in this way. If you know that your neighbor has committed a fault, be silent about it. Only then, when the good of others or of the guilty one demands it, may you reveal what you know.

In conversation, as far as possible avoid disputes. There are some people who have such a spirit of contradiction that they seem to take pleasure in always questioning what others say, even though it be of little or no importance. Thus little trifles sometimes give rise to a war of words; charity is wounded and the bonds of friendship are broken beyond repair. "Strive not in a matter which doth not concern thee," says the Wise Man. (Ecclus. 11:9).

But, you will say: "I am right; I cannot bear to hear such absurd talk." Listen to what Cardinal Bellarmine says: "An ounce of charity is better than tons of right." To yield in a war of words is to win a victory, for you grow in virtue and preserve peace, which is better far than obstinately maintaining your right.

When you are offended or spoken to in an angry way, try to reply with meekness. If you are too agitated to do so it is better to say nothing at all, for in the heat of passion you may think what you say is right and proper, but afterwards, when the excitement has passed away, you will regret what you have said. An eye that is disturbed by anger, says St. Bernard, cannot see what is right or wrong. Passion is like a black veil that is drawn before the eyes; while it is there we cannot see things in their proper light. When he who offends you asks pardon, be generous enough to grant it in a gracious manner. If you have offended another be quick to repair the harm you have done. St. Bernard says, the best way to heal the wound you have inflicted by uncharitableness is to humble yourself. The longer you delay, the harder it becomes, and eventually you may neglect it altogether. Our Blessed Saviour once said: "If thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there thou remember that thy brother hath anything against thee; leave thy offering before the altar, and go first to be reconciled to thy brother: and then coming thou shalt offer thy gift." (Matt. 5:23). But if it should happen that such self-humiliation would only anger the offended person the more, endeavor by some other means to quiet him.

ALMSGIVING

A very important duty of charity towards our neighbor consists in giving him alms when he is poor and needy and we ourselves are in a position to do so: "Of that which remaineth, give alms," says our Blessed Redeemer. (Luke 11:41). But we must distinguish: If our neighbor is in extreme want we are bound to assist him with what is not absolutely necessary for our own sustenance. If his necessity is not extreme, but very great, we must help him with what we ourselves do not need. "Alms delivereth from death," said the Archangel Raphael to Tobias, "and the same is that which purgeth away sins, and maketh to find mercy and life everlasting." (Tob. 12:9).

"He that hath mercy on the poor," says the Holy Ghost, "lendeth to the Lord; and he will repay him." (Prov. 19:17). If we can do nothing else let us at least recommend him to God, for prayer is also an alms. "He that shall see his brother in need," says St. John, "and shall shut up his heart against him, how doth the charity of God abide in him?" (1 John 3:17). "With what measure you mete it shall be measured to you again," says our Blessed Redeemer. (Matt. 7:2). St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi said she would feel happier by assisting her neighbor than if she were raised to heavenly contemplation: "If I am in contemplation," said she, "God is helping me; if I assist my neighbor I am helping God." This is very true, for Our Lord Himself said: "Whatsoever you do to the least of my brethren you do to me." (Matt. 25:40).

LOVE YOUR ENEMIES

Above all things I would recommend to you charity towards your enemies. "Love your enemies," says Our Lord, "do good to them that hate you; and pray for them that persecute and calumniate you, that you may be the children of your Father who is in heaven." (Matt. 5:44). How sad it is to see Christians who go to church and even to Holy Communion and still retain enmity in their hearts! If anyone has injured you, and you wish to be revenged, try to act as the Saints have done. St. Paulinus tells us that to love one's enemy is a heavenly revenge. St. Catherine of Siena took revenge on a woman who had attacked her honor, and this was her revenge: During a long and severe illness which the woman suffered, St. Catherine waited on her as a servant. St. Acacius sold his possessions in order to assist a man who had robbed him of his good name. St. Ambrose supported a man who had made an attempt on his life. Venustian, the Governor of Umbria, a persecutor of the Church, had the hands of St. Sabinus, Bishop of Spoleto, cut off because the Saint, instead of adoring an idol, broke it to pieces. Hereupon, the Governor was seized with such violent pains in the eyes that he called on the Saint to help him. Sabinus prayed for him and not only cured his body but also his soul; the Governor embraced the True Faith.

St. Chrysostom relates the following example. When St. Meletius, Patriarch of Antioch, saw the people about to stone the officer who was leading him into exile, the Saint stretched out his arms and embraced him, thus saving his life. But someone will say: "These were saints; I have no such strength and grace." St. Ambrose replies: "If strength is wanting, pray to God and He will give it you." If we forgive others, we are certain of forgiveness ourselves: "Forgive and you will be forgiven," says Our Lord. (Luke 6:37). "If I called a dead person to life," says St. Baptist Verani, "I would be less certain of being loved by God than when I am prepared to do good to him who has done evil to me." Our Lord Himself said one day to St. Angela de Foligno: "The surest sign of mutual love between Me and My servants consists in their loving someone who has offended them."

If you can do nothing else, dear reader, pray for those who have offended or injured you. Hersisters in religion used to say of St. Joanna of the Cross: "If you want Mother Joanna to pray for you, all that is necessary is to offend her." One day when St. Elizabeth, Queen of Hungary, was praying for a person who had injured her, she heard Our Lord say: "You have never uttered a prayer that was more agreeable to Me than this; in consequence I forgive you all your sins."

The love that is directed to the spiritual welfare of your neighbor is doubtless the best. In the eyes of God, says St. Bernard, a soul is worth more than the whole world. Could there be anything, therefore, more noble and sublime than to labor with Jesus Christ for the salvation of souls? But you may say: "I am not called to the service of the sanctuary; this is the work of the priests." St. Augustine replies: "If you truly love God, you will do all in your power to make others love Him." We may likewise say: If you truly love yourself, you will make every possible effort to win souls to God, for he who converts a sinner saves not only the sinner, but himself. When Jonathan with great danger to himself had delivered the Jews from the hands of the Philistines, he was condemned to death by his father because, in spite of a prohibition, he had eaten a little honey. But the people said to Saul: "Should Jonathan, who has delivered us all from death, himself die?" In this way they obtained his pardon and deliverance from death.

In a similar manner the souls that we help to save will plead beseechingly in our behalf before the judgment seat of God. And God will answer their pleading: "From henceforth they may rest from their labors, for their works follow them." (Apoc. 14:13). St. Gregory says we shall gain as many crowns as we win souls to God. "So let your light shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven." (Matt. 5:16). Our Lord said one day to St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi: "See how many Christians are in the hands of the devil; if My elect do not free them by prayer, these unfortunates will be eternally lost."

If you have an opportunity to assist the dying, remember that you are performing an act of charity very acceptable to God. St. Philip Neri often saw the angels putting words of consolation on the tongues of those who assisted the dying. See that the priest is called in time to administer the last Sacraments while the patient is still conscious. Suggest little acts of faith, hope, love and contrition. Assist the sufferer to pronounce the holy Names very often and to make acts of resignation to the Will of God. When the soul is departing, say the prayers for the dying and recommend the departed soul when it appears before the judgment seat of God. An evergreen wreath of prayers should be laid on the grave and frequent mementoes made during Holy Mass for a speedy entrance of the departed soul into the everlasting joys of our heavenly home.

Chapter 5

POVERTY AND DETACHMENT

"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."—Matt. 5:3

When the masters of the spiritual life speak of poverty in spirit, they generally understand it in a twofold sense. In the restricted sense it means a detachment of the heart from earthly possessions. In the broad sense, by poverty in spirit they mean detachment from everything earthly, no matter what it may be. In this sense, poverty in spirit is necessary for all who are striving after perfection.

Our heart cannot exist without love; it will either love God or creatures. If it does not love creatures, it certainly will love God. In order to become holy we must therefore banish from our heart all that is not for God. When anyone came to the Fathers of the desert and desired to be received by them he was asked: "Do you bring an empty heart that it may be filled by the Holy Ghost?" And they were right, for a heart that is filled with the things of earth has no room for the love of God. He who brings a vessel filled with earth to the spring will never be able to fill it with water until he empties it of the earth with which it is filled. How does it happen that so many pray and go frequently to Holy Communion, and still make no considerable progress in the love of God? The reason is doubtless because the heart is full of self-esteem, of vanity, self-will and attachment to creatures. He, therefore, who wishes to arrive at the perfect love of God must practice poverty in spirit. He must be detached from worldly possessions, from temporal honors, from his fellow creatures and from himself.

Our Divine Redeemer has said: "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." (Matt. 5:3). And again: "Woe to you rich." (Luke 6:24). What does He mean by these words? Does He mean that all the poor are happy and all the rich unhappy? Certainly not; He wishes rather to exhort all, both rich and poor, to the practice of the virtue of poverty and detachment. For there are many who are poor in the goods of this world, but their hearts cling tenaciously to the things of earth; while on the other hand, there are wealthy people whose hearts are entirely detached from their earthly possessions.

THE POOR IN SPIRIT

The poor of this world do not possess poverty of spirit from the mere fact that they suffer the want of the goods of this life. Poverty of spirit consists in the desire to possess nothing but God. "I meet a poor man," says St. Augustine, "and yet I find he is not poor"; that is to say: Many are poor in reality, few in spirit and desire. St. Teresa says that they who appear externally poor without being so in spirit deceive both the world and themselves. What will their poverty in possession avail them? He who is externally poor, but in his heart has an insatiable desire for wealth has only the burdens, but not the virtue of poverty. The truly virtuous poor desire nothing but God, and for that very reason they are immensely rich. Of them St. Paul speaks when he says: "Having nothing, they possess all things." (2 Cor. 6:10).

But how can they who are rich in the goods of this earth still possess poverty in spirit? They can do so by having no inordinate attachment to their riches. What are the goods of this earth? They are really goods only in appearance that can never satisfy the heart of man. "You have eaten," says the prophet Aggeus, "but you have not had enough." (Agg. 1:6). Instead of satisfying the hunger, says St. Bernard, they only increase it. If worldly goods could satisfy the heart of man, the rich and the mighty would be perfectly happy; but experience teaches the contrary. As a rule they are the most unhappy of men, for they are tortured by fears, jealousies and sadness. "Vanity of vanities and all is vanity." I have had all these things, said Solomon, "and behold all is vanity and vexation of spirit." (Eccles. 1:14).

Add to this the fact that those who are always intent upon increasing their earthly possessions are in great danger of being eternally lost. The Apostle warns us against this in his epistle to Timothy: "They that will become rich, fall into temptation and into the snare of the devil, and into many unprofitable and hurtful desires which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the desire of money is the root of all evils; which some coveting have erred from the faith, and have entangled themselves in many sorrows." (1 Tim. 6:9–10).

If we desire to belong to God, we must renounce all attachment to the goods of earth. He who strives for earthly goods, says St. Philip Neri, will never become a saint. The riches we must strive to gain, says St. Prosper, are not temporal goods but virtues, humility, meekness, chastity, piety, for these will constitute our greatness and glory in Heaven. "Lay not up to yourselves treasures on earth: where the rust and moth consume, and where thieves break through and steal." (Matt. 6:19). The wealthy can practice poverty in spirit by giving alms and performing good works. "O happy exchange," says St. Peter Damian, "we give earth and receive gold"; that is to say, we give our earthly possessions and receive in return graces from God and an eternal reward in Heaven. In all ages of the Christian era there have been people of distinguished rank who lived in great simplicity in order to be able to perform good works. Violanta Palombara, a lady of the nobility, clothed herself in ordinary linen. Her rosary was made of cheap wood. Just before her death she was heard to exclaim: "Oh, what do I see! My dress is become brilliant and my beads are sparkling like diamonds."

TRUE DETACHMENT

Our detachment from the things of this earth is proved by our resignation to the Will of God in temporal disasters, such as financial loss by accident or theft. Faith teaches us that nothing happens without the permission of God. If, therefore, we suffer the loss of our good name or our temporal possessions, God does not of course will the sin that is thereby committed, but He wills or permits the suffering that falls to our lot and He wills it for our good. When a messenger came to the pious Job and announced that the Sabeans had stolen all his belongings and murdered his children, the holy man replied: "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away." He did not say: "The Lord gave and the Sabeans have taken away," but: "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away: as it hath pleased the Lord, so is it done: blessed be the name of the Lord." (Job 1:21). Finally, we prove to evidence that we possess the spirit of detachment when we are ready to sacrifice everything we have—riches, honors, dignities, position—in short, every temporal advantage, rather than offend God.

Such were the sentiments of the holy martyrs. Dacian, the Governor of the Province of Tanigma, addressed the young deacon Vincent in the following words: "My boy, you are still young; the smiles and favors of fortune await you. To possess them, all you need do is to renounce your religion; obey the Emperor and escape an ignominious death." Vincent turned to Bishop Valerius, who with him stood before the Governor, and said: "My Father, if you wish, I shall answer for you too." The holy Bishop, who stood prepared to suffer everything for the love of Jesus Christ, replied: "Yes, my son; as I have already commissioned you to preach the word of God, now I commission you to confess our faith." Hereupon Vincent declared to the Governor that both Valerius and himself adored but one God and that they could not and would not adore devils, for such were the gods of the Roman empire. "Moreover," he said, "do not imagine you will influence us by threats or promises. There is nothing in this world to compare with the honor and the happiness of dying for Jesus Christ." Enraged at this fearlessness of the holy deacon, the Governor cried out: "Either sacrifice to the gods or your contempt will cost you your lives." The holy deacon replied with a loud voice: "I have already told you that you could do us no greater favor than to put us to death for Jesus Christ, and you may rest assured that you will grow weary torturing us before we are tired of being tormented."

Let us now consider some of the means that are necessary for acquiring this detachment from the things of earth. In the first place, to remove all inordinate attachment from the heart it is necessary to dwell on the thought of death. The day of death is called "the day of loss" because on this day the riches and honors and pleasures of earth are lost. On this account, says St. Ambrose, we should not really call these things our own because we cannot bring them with us into the next world, where only virtue can accompany us. That man was right therefore who, when realizing the vanity of the world, wrote on a skull the following words: "To one who thinks, everything here below seems deserving of contempt." But why are there so many unhappy lovers of this earth? Because there are so few who think of death.

Poor children of Adam, says the Holy Ghost, why do you not banish from your hearts all earthly attachment? "Why do you love vanity and seek after lying?" (Ps. 4:3). What happened to your forefathers will happen to you. They too loved the dwelling that is now yours; now they are no more; they have gone into eternity, and you shall follow them.

THE POVERTY OF CHRIST

The second means consists in frequent meditation on the poverty of Jesus Christ and the esteem which He had for this holy virtue. For our good, and in order to give us an example, our Divine Redeemer wished to lead so poor a life on earth that St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi called poverty the spouse of Jesus Christ. St. Bernard says: "Poverty was not to be found in Heaven, but it reigned on earth. Mankind, however, did not recognize its worth, and therefore the Son of God came down to choose poverty for His inseparable companion and to teach us to esteem it."

This thought is in keeping with what the Apostle writes to his disciples: "For you know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that being rich he became poor for your sakes; that through his poverty you might be rich." (2 Cor. 8:9). Although our Divine Redeemer was the Lord and Master of all the riches of Heaven and earth, He willed nevertheless to become poor in this world that through His example we might become rich. He wished to induce us to love poverty as He did, for poverty, by detaching us from earthly riches, enables us to share in the treasures of Heaven. The third means consists in frequently dwelling upon the teaching of our Blessed Lord that the poor in spirit shall have a great and certain reward. Their reward is certain, for when our Saviour enumerated the Beatitudes in the Gospel, He referred in most instances to the future, as "Blessed are the meek for they shall possess the land! Blessed are the pure of heart for they shall see God!" But to the poor in spirit He promises happiness even in this life: "Blessed are the poor in spirit for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." (Matt. 5:3). While here on earth, they receive special graces.

The reward of the poor in spirit is, secondly, very great. "The less we have here," says St. Teresa, "the greater will be our joy in Heaven, where our dwelling shall correspond to the love with which we imitated the life of poverty of our Divine Master here on earth." The truly poor in spirit enjoy a heavenly peace even here in this world. "Oh what happiness voluntary poverty bestows," says St. Lawrence Justinian; "the poor man possesses nothing and therefore has nothing to fear; he is always cheerful, for he always has an abundance, since he knows how to draw spiritual gain out of everything that is burdensome." According to the words of St. Bernard, a miser craves for riches like a beggar, because he can never satisfy his insatiable desire. He, on the other hand, who is poor from choice despises the possessions of this earth and is at the same time the master of all.

The fourth means consists in loving God without reserve. A soul that is thoroughly penetrated with divine love is inclined of itself, of course not without the aid of grace, to divest itself of all earthly things which might prevent it from belonging entirely to God. For the love of Jesus Christ, a certain rich man had renounced all his possessions. When one of his friends asked him how he had fallen into such poverty, he drew forth a copy of the Gospel and said: "This is what has robbed me of all I possessed." The Holy Ghost tells us that all the treasures of earth are as nothing in the eyes of one who loves God. If a soul directs all its love to God, that soul despises riches, pleasures, honors, kingdoms and everything else this world can give. It loves only God, and says without intermission: "O my God, Thee alone do I desire!" He who loves God is not anxious to gain the esteem and love of men; all his efforts are directed to one end, to please God, the only object of his love.

St. Hilary says: "All earthly honors are things of the devil." Indeed, the devil is working in the interest of Hell when he inspires a soul with a desire for the esteem of the world. For when a soul loses humility it runs the risk of being hurled into the abyss. A great servant of God once said: "When we hear that a Solomon, or a Tertullian, these cedars of Lebanon have fallen, we have a proof that they did not give themselves entirely to God, but nourished pride in their heart, and on that account strayed from the path of righteousness. We should tremble when we experience within ourselves the desire to shine before others and to be honored by them. Such promptings may be the beginning of our eternal misery." Many who have pretensions to piety are adorers of their own honor. They have a certain appearance of virtue, and at the same time a desire to be praised for all they do. If no one praises them, they praise themselves. They wish to appear better than others, and if they hear that their good name has been assailed, they lose all control of themselves, neglect Holy Communion and all their exercises of piety. They can find no rest until they have made good the supposed injury done to them.

Such is not the conduct of those who love God sincerely. Far from praising themselves or taking pleasure in hearing themselves praised, they are disturbed on account of the recognition they receive, and they rejoice when they are called upon to suffer contempt. "I am only that which I am before God," said St. Francis of Assisi. Of what use is it to be esteemed by men if we are contemptible in the sight of God? And what does it matter if we are despised by the world, provided we are acceptable before God? "He who praises us," says St. Augustine, "does not free us from the punishment we have deserved for our sins, and he who blames us is not able to rob us of the merit of our good works."

"O my God," exclaims St. Teresa, "what matters it whether we are loved or hated by creatures, provided we are without blame before Thee!" The only desire of the Saints was to live in obscurity and contempt. "What harm do they do us who have a bad opinion of us?" asks St. Francis de Sales. "Should not we have just such an opinion of ourselves? Is it right to wish others to think well of us, when we know very well that we are wicked?"

A HIDDEN LIFE

A hidden and obscure life affords great security to those who sincerely desire to love God. Our Divine Master Himself deigned to teach us this by His own example, for He spent 30 years in the obscurity of Nazareth and the workshop of a humble carpenter. In imitation of their Divine Model, many saints withdrew into the desert and lived in remote caves to escape the esteem of men. The desire to put ourselves forward and merit the plaudits of men, to be regarded as very successful in our undertakings, is, according to St. Vincent de Paul, an evil which causes us to forget our God; it vitiates our holiest actions and more than anything else impedes our progress in the spiritual life.

To be pleasing and acceptable in the sight of God, we must therefore banish from our hearts the desire to appear before men to win their approval and applause, and especially the desire to rule over others. "Inordinate ambition," writes Peter of Blois, "imitates charity but in a perverse manner. Charity endureth all things, but only for the sake of eternal goods; ambition endureth all things, but only for the wretched honors of this world. Charity is full of gentleness, especially towards the poor and despised; ambition is full of gentleness, but only towards the influential of this world who are in a position to satisfy its cravings. Charity believeth and hopeth all that pertains to eternal glory; ambition believes and hopes in everything that leads to the vain honor and glory of this world."

And granted that we attain the supposed honor for which we strive, what have we gained? What else but a little smoke that usually, instead of raising us, lowers us in the eyes of others. Honor vanishes, says St. Teresa, in consequence of the desire we have had to attain it. The greater the honor we receive, the greater the disgrace for having striven for it. St. Jane Chantal says: "The more worthy we think ourselves of some office or employment, the less worthy we are to have it, for we show that we are lacking in humility, which would be our best qualification." When St. Vincent Carafa of the Society of Jesus visited a sick friend who had just been appointed to a very important but dangerous office, the sick man begged him to pray for his recovery. St. Vincent replied: "No, my friend, I will not be unfaithful to my love for you. Now that you are in the state of grace, God calls you into the next world because He desires your salvation. Did He permit you to live, I know not whether you would save your soul in your new office." Hereupon the sick man quietly accepted death from the hand of God and died with perfect resignation.

TRUE DETACHMENT

Detachment from human beings does not mean that we are to love no one on this earth, but it means that our inclinations are to be in accordance with the Will of God and pleasing to Him. Both nature and religion impose upon us the obligation of loving our parents, relatives and benefactors. But this love becomes inordinate and bad when it leads us to offend God, and impedes our progress in a virtuous life. Many Christians would make great progress on the road to perfection were they freed from all earthly attachments. But because they foster some inordinate attachment in their hearts and are unwilling to renounce it, they continue in their lamentable condition, without advancing a single step on the way of virtue. St. John of the Cross says: "A soul that is attached to any creature will never attain perfect union with God, even though that soul possess many other virtues." It matters very little whether a bird is bound with a strong or a weak cord, for the bird remains a captive and unable to fly as long as the cord is not broken. It is sad to see so many souls who are otherwise rich in virtues and graces, but who never reach a perfect union with God because they have not courage to renounce some little attachment. All that is necessary is one generous effort to break the cord that binds them and constitutes the only obstacle to their happiness.

To arrive at a perfect union with God, it is necessary, therefore, to be entirely detached from creatures. In particular we must renounce every inordinate attachment for our relatives. Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ tells us that he who is too much attached to relatives cannot be His disciple. And why? Because it often happens that we have no greater enemies of our soul than our own relatives. "A man's enemies are those of his household." (Matt. 10:36). St. Charles Borromeo said that as often as he visited his relatives, he returned with less zeal for the glory of God. When Father Antony Mendoza was asked why he never visited his parental home he replied: "Because I am aware that there is no place where religious so easily lose the spirit of piety as among their relatives."

He who has truly renounced inordinate attachment for his relatives will not be immoderately cast down when death claims someone who is near and dear to him. There are many who are inconsolable at the death of a relative or friend. They weep and moan and deliver themselves up to such unrestrained sadness and impatience that no one dares to approach them. I wonder whom they think they are pleasing by such unreasonable sadness and such a flood of tears! Is it God? Surely not; for God desires us to be resigned to His holy Will. Is it the soul of the deceased? Again, no; for if that soul is in Hell it spurns those tears and the one who sheds them. If it is saved and already in Heaven, then its greatest desire is that relatives and friends unite with it in thanking God. If the soul is still in Purgatory, it ardently longs for the prayers of its friends, and perfect resignation to God's Will so that all may be reunited one day in Heaven. To what purpose, therefore, such excessive weeping and lamentation? One day when the Venerable Theatine, Joseph Caracciolo, was visiting his relatives who constantly bemoaned the death of his brother, he said to them: "All, let us spare our tears for a more worthy object; let us shed them for the death of Jesus Christ, who is our Father, our Brother and our Spouse, and who suffered death for love of us." On such occasions we ought to imitate the pious Job, who on the death of his children said with beautiful resignation: "The Lord gave; the Lord hath taken away: as it hath pleased the Lord so is it done: blessed be the name of the Lord." (Job 1:21).

In the year 1624, the son of a pious Japanese was condemned to death. When the young man took leave of his mother, he spoke to her in the following words: "Dear mother, at last the hour is come for which I have yearned so long, and for which I have so often prayed to God. I am now going to die. Pardon me all the trouble and sorrow I have caused you, and give me a mother's blessing." He then knelt to receive her blessing. His mother embraced him tenderly and said: "My dear boy, may God bless you and grant you the grace to die a holy death. It pains my heart to lose you; but I am consoled with the thought that you die for Jesus Christ. May He be forever blessed for this great grace He bestows on you." Hereupon the young man betook himself to the executioner to receive the stroke of death. What a magnificent example of detachment from relatives!

RESIGNATION TO GOD'S WILL

Detachment, moreover, requires us to be resigned to God's Will in the loss of those who are useful to us in our temporal or spiritual concerns. In this regard pious souls often commit serious faults by a want of resignation to the disposition of Divine Providence regarding their confessor. It is not confessors, but God, who makes us holy. When He gives them to us He desires us to profit by their sacred ministry in the affairs of our conscience; if He takes them from us, He wishes us to redouble our confidence in His goodness and to speak to Him in this manner: "Lord, Thou hast given me this assistance; now Thou takest it from me again; Thy holy will be done! Come Thou Thyself to my aid and teach me what I must do to be faithful to Thee!" Jesus Christ is our true Consolation, our true Leader, our true Love, yes, the only Love of our soul. He does not wish us to seek consolation outside Him. To be sure, God wills that we should not leave our spiritual director as long as we can have him; but when He Himself takes him away, He will give us another or supply his assistance in some other way.

Above all things, we must be detached from ourselves, that is, from our own will. He who knows how to overcome himself will easily conquer all other difficulties. It was this self-conquest that St. Francis Xavier so earnestly recommended to all who are striving after perfection. "If anyone will come after me," says our Blessed Lord, "let him deny himself." (Matt. 16:24). The epitome of all we must do to become holy is found in the single word, self-denial. We must therefore love God as God wishes and not as we desire. But God desires our soul to be empty of everything earthly in order to unite it to Himself and to fill it with His love. There are many who desire to attain to perfect union with God; but they are unwilling to bear the contradictions that God sends them. As long as they are not perfectly resigned to the Will of God, there is no thought of perfect union. "The way to union with God," says St. Catherine of Siena, "leads through afflictions and sorrows." These are the means God uses to purify us from all evil inclinations. Sickness, poverty, contempt, temptation and contradiction are permitted by God to give us an opportunity to battle against our inclinations and obtain the victory over our passions.

According to St. John of the Cross, "We must mortify our senses and desires." With regard to the senses we must, from love of Jesus Christ, reject every gratification that does not refer to the honor of God. For example, should a desire arise within us to see or hear things that are not calculated to bring us nearer to God, we must suppress such a desire. Moreover, our preference must be for the uncomfortable, the disagreeable and the bitter things that nature tries so hard to avoid. In one word, he who sincerely loves Jesus Christ will banish from his heart all attachment to earthly goods, and divest himself of everything in order to be perfectly united to his Blessed Redeemer. All his desires are centered in Jesus Christ. He is ever thinking of Him, ever yearning for Him. In every place and on all occasions he wishes to please Him alone. But to arrive at this sincere love it is necessary to banish from the heart all inclinations and attachments that are not for God.

What, therefore, must a soul do to give herself entirely to God? She must avoid whatever displeases God and do whatever is pleasing to Him. Secondly, she must accept whatever is sent her from the hand of God, however hard or disagreeable it may be. And thirdly, in all things she must prefer the Will of God to her own. In this manner we make a complete and worthy offering of the heart to God.

"Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God."—Matt. 5:8.

Chapter 6

CHASTITY

"Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God."—Matt. 5:8

No one knows the value of chastity better than God Himself. Now God says: "No price is worthy of a continent soul." (Ecclus. 26:20). All that man prizes and esteems, riches, pleasures, honors, bear no comparison to a continent soul. St. Ephrem calls chastity "the life of the spirit." St. Peter Damian styles it "the queen of virtues," and St. Cyprian says by means of chastity we celebrate the most glorious triumphs. He who conquers the vice opposed to this virtue will easily triumph over the rest. On the contrary, he who permits himself to be ruled by incontinency falls an easy prey to the other vices such as hatred, injustice, etc. Chastity, says St. Ephrem, renders us in a certain sense like angels. This comparison is altogether justified, for the life of angels is far from being a life of carnal gratifications. Angels are pure by nature; chaste souls are pure by reason of virtue. "On account of the merit of this virtue," says Cassian, "human beings are placed on a level with the angels." "Of course there is a difference," says St. Bernard, "between the chaste man and the angel, but it is not a difference of virtue; it is only one of happiness. If the chastity of the angels is more blessed, the chastity of man is more courageous."

St. Basil tells us that "chastity makes man very similar to God Himself, who is a pure spirit." On this account Our Lord chose a virgin for His Mother, a virgin for His foster father, St. Joseph, a virgin for His precursor, St. John the Baptist. St. Jerome says that Our Lord loved St. John the Apostle more than the rest on account of this virtue. To the virgin disciple He entrusted His Immaculate Mother, just as He now confides His Holy Church and His Sacred Presence in the Holy Eucharist to the care of the celibate priest. "O holy purity," says St. Athanasius, "thou art the dwelling place of the Holy Spirit, the life of angels and the crown of saints." How great, therefore, is the value of chastity! But how frightful the war that the flesh wages to rob us of this precious pearl!

Our body is the most powerful weapon the devil possesses to make us his slaves. On this account it is seldom that a man comes forth victorious from this conflict. "The struggle for chastity," says St. Augustine, "is the most violent of all; the battle is renewed every day, and victory is rare." "How many unfortunate persons there are," says St. Lawrence Justinian, "who having spent long years in solitude amid prayer, fasting and mortification, yielded at last to sensuality, gave up their holy life, and with the loss of chastity suffered the loss of God."

GREAT VIGILANCE NECESSARY

He, therefore, who would preserve the virtue of chastity must use the greatest precaution. "It is impossible for you to remain chaste," says St. Charles Borromeo, "unless you constantly watch over yourself. Negligence in this regard leads almost invariably to the loss of virtue." With regard to evil thoughts, there may be a twofold delusion. God-fearing souls who have little or no gift of discernment, and are inclined to scruples, think that every wicked thought that enters their mind is a sin. This is a mistake, for it is not the wicked thoughts in themselves that are sins, but the yielding or consenting to them. The wickedness of mortal sin consists in the perverse will which deliberately yields to sin with a complete knowledge of its wickedness and with full consent. And therefore St. Augustine teaches that when the consent of the will is absent, there is no sin. However much we may be tormented by temptations, the rebellion of the senses, or the inordinate motions of the inferior part of the soul, as long as there is no consent, there is no sin.

For the comfort of such anxious souls, let me suggest a good rule of conduct that is taught by all masters in the spiritual life. If a person who fears God and hates sin doubts whether he has consented to an evil thought or not, he is not bound to confess it, because it is morally certain that he has not given consent. For had he actually committed a mortal sin he would have no doubt about it, as mortal sin is such a monster in the eyes of one who fears God that its entrance into the heart could not take place without its being known.

Others, on the contrary, whose conscience is lax and not well-informed, think that evil thoughts and desires, though consented to, are not sins provided they are not followed by sinful actions. This error is worse than the one mentioned above. What we may not do, we may not desire. Therefore an evil thought or desire to which we consent comprises in itself all the wickedness of an evil deed. As sinful actions separate us from God, so wicked thoughts rob us of His grace. "Perverse thoughts separate us from God," says the Book of Wisdom (1:3).

From what has been said, it follows that not all evil thoughts are sinful and not all sinful thoughts are equal in malice. We must therefore distinguish between an evil thought that is a mortal sin, one that is venial, and one that is no sin at all. With regard to sins of thought, three things are to be taken into consideration: enticement, pleasure and consent. By enticement, or allurement, is meant the first thought that prompts us to commit the sin suggested to our senses. This enticement or suggestion is no sin; indeed, if it is rejected at once by the will it becomes a source of merit. "As often as you resist temptation," says St. Antoninus, "so often do you merit a crown." Even the Saints were tormented by such thoughts. To overcome a temptation of impurity St. Benedict rolled himself in a bed of thorns, and St. Peter of Alcantara plunged into the ice-cold water of a pond. St. Paul tells us he was tempted against holy purity! "And lest the greatness of the revelations should exalt me, there was given me a sting of my flesh, an angel of Satan to buffet me. For which thing thrice I besought the Lord, that it might depart from me. And he said to me: My grace is sufficient for thee: for power is made perfect in infirmity." (2 Cor. 12:7–9).

"When a thief is trying to break in a door," says St. Francis de Sales, "it is a sign he is not yet in the house. So, too, when the devil continues to tempt a soul it is a sign that soul is still in the grace of God." St. Catherine of Siena was once violently assaulted by the devil for the space of three days with temptations against holy purity. When Our Lord appeared to her to comfort her she cried out: "Ah my Saviour, where hast Thou been these three days?" Jesus answered: "I was in your heart, and it was I who gave you strength to resist those temptations." Our Lord then gave her to understand that her heart was purer after the assault than before.

Next to the enticement comes the pleasure. If the temptation is not rejected at once, a certain pleasure is experienced, and this it is that hurries one on to consent. As long as the will does not fully acquiesce, there is no mortal sin; at most it is venial. But if instant recourse is not had to God and every effort made to resist the temptation, the will is very apt to yield full consent and fall into grievous sin. A certain woman who was regarded as a saint was tempted one day by an evil thought. Failing to reject it at once, she became guilty of grievous sin. From false shame she neglected to confess the sinful thought she had yielded to, and shortly after, died. Now the Bishop of the place had considered her a saint, and accordingly he had her buried in his own chapel. On the following day the unfortunate soul appeared to him and declared that, owing to a sinful thought to which she had consented, she was eternally lost.

When assailed by such temptations, therefore, we must have instant recourse to the means necessary to overcome them. The first means consists in humbling oneself continually before God. David acknowledged that he had fallen into sin because he had not been humble and had trusted too much in himself. "Before I was humbled, I offended." (Ps. 118:67). Distrustful of self, therefore, we must place all our confidence in God. The second means is to have immediate recourse to God without stopping to consider the temptation. The best thing to do is to pronounce the holy names of Jesus and Mary and continue to pronounce them until the temptation is overcome. If it is a violent temptation it may be well to repeat the following resolution: "Oh my God, I will rather die than offend Thee! Oh my Jesus, help me! Mary, my Mother, assist me!" The names of Jesus and Mary have particular efficacy against the temptations of the devil.

The third means consists in often receiving the Sacraments of Penance and Holy Eucharist. It is of the greatest importance to reveal our temptations to our confessor. "A temptation revealed," says St. Philip Neri, "is half overcome." If one has the misfortune to yield to such temptations, no time should be lost in confessing it. As for Holy Communion, it is well to remember that this heavenly Food affords us great strength to resist temptations. The precious Blood of Jesus Christ which we receive in Holy Communion is called a "wine springing forth virgins." (Zach. 9:17). Earthly wine is a snare for chastity. This heavenly wine is its preservative.

A fourth means is devotion to the Immaculate Mother of God, the Virgin of virgins. Oh, how many have kept themselves pure as angels by devotion to this Blessed Queen of angels! Other means will suggest themselves to each individual, such as the avoidance of idleness, for "Idleness is the devil's workshop"; modesty of the eyes, and diligence in avoiding dangerous or proximate occasions. Nearly all the passions that assail us have their origin in the unrestrained liberty of the eyes, for as a rule it is our unguarded looks that awaken in us inordinate inclinations and passions. "I made a covenant with my eyes, that I would not so much as think upon a virgin," said Job (31:1). Why does he say: "so much as to think upon?" Should he not have said: "I have made a covenant not to look upon"? No, he was right in expressing himself as he did, for the thought and the look are so closely united as to be inseparable. In order, therefore, to have no evil thought, the holy man had resolved not to look at a virgin.

St. Augustine says: "From the look proceeds the thought and from the thought the desire." Had Eve not looked at the forbidden fruit, she would not have fallen into sin. But she took pleasure in looking at it, and the fruit seemed beautiful and good. She took it and ate and was guilty of disobedience. We see here how the devil tempts man first to look, then to desire, and at last to consent. Therefore, as St. Jerome says, the devil needs on our part only a beginning. It is enough if we only half open the door for him; he will then force it open all the way. A voluntary glance at a person of the opposite sex may be an infernal spark that will cause the ruin of the soul. "The first arrows that strike chaste souls," says St. Bernard, "and frequently cause deadly wounds, pierce through the eyes." It was the eyes that occasioned the fall of David, a man according to God's own heart. And so too with Solomon, who before had been the chosen instrument of the Holy Spirit. And many others have gone to destruction through their eyes. Seneca says that blindness is very useful for the preservation of innocence. In accordance with this principle, as Tertullian relates, a heathen philosopher deliberately deprived himself of sight in order to preserve chastity.

A Christian would not be permitted to do such a thing; but if we wish to preserve chastity, we must be blind insofar that we look at nothing which would awaken unclean thoughts within us. To this end we are exhorted by the Holy Ghost: "Gaze not upon another's beauty, for hereby lust is enkindled as a fire." (Ecclus. 9:8–9). The deliberate gaze is followed by sinful imaginations which enkindle the unholy fire. Therefore, St. Francis de Sales says: "He who does not wish the enemy to force his way into the fortress must keep the gates closed."

For this very reason the Saints have been exceedingly cautious about their eyes. For fear lest they should accidentally fall on some dangerous object they kept them nearly always cast down, and denied themselves the satisfaction of looking even at innocent objects. After St. Bernard had been a whole year in the novitiate, he did not know whether the ceiling of his cell was flat or arched. In the church of the monastery there were three windows; but St. Bernard did not know how many there were, for during that whole year he had not raised his eyes to gaze about. The holy Bishop Hugo never looked into the face of a woman with whom he happened to be speaking. St. Clare resolved never to look at the face of a man. One day when she raised her eyes to look at the Sacred Host she chanced to see the countenance of the priest, and she was very much disturbed.

When we consider these great precautions of the saints of God, how very imprudent and rash seems the conduct of those who, without the virtue of a St. Bernard or a St. Clare, gaze unconcernedly at persons of the opposite sex, and yet expect to remain free from temptations and the danger of sin. St. Jerome had retired into the grotto of Bethlehem, where he constantly prayed and mortified his body; and yet he was frightfully tormented by the recollection of those women whom he had seen long before at Rome. "What is injurious to us," says St. Francis de Sales, "is not so much the casual glance, but rather the intentional gaze." When Brother Roger, a Franciscan who was noted for his exceptional purity, was asked why he was so guarded in his looks, especially concerning women, he replied: "If man shuns the occasion, God protects him; if he deliberately puts himself in danger, the Lord abandons him and he easily falls into grievous sin."

If we suffer no other harm from the liberty we accord our eyes, we are at least deprived of recollection during prayer, because what we have seen will present itself again before the eyes of our soul and cause us endless distractions. Now, it is certain that a Christian who lives without interior recollection cannot practice the virtues, such as humility, patience, and mortification, in a proper manner. We must be careful, therefore, to direct our gaze to objects that will lead us to God and not from Him. "Downcast eyes," says St. Bernard, "direct the heart to Heaven." And St. Gregory Nazianzen writes: "'Where Christ dwells with His love, there recollection reigns."

A MEANS OF EDIFICATION

It is well to remember that the custody of the eyes is useful not only for our own sanctification, but also for the edification of others. God alone sees our heart; man sees only our external actions, and is either edified or scandalized by them. "A man is known by his look," says Holy Scripture (Ecclus. 19:26); that is to say, from the exterior we judge of the interior. Every Christian should therefore be what our Redeemer called St. John the Baptist: "a burning and a shining light." (John 5:35). Our interior should glow with divine love; our exterior should shine by Christian modesty. What St. Paul said to his disciples should apply also to us: "We are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels and to men." (1 Cor. 4:9). "Let your modesty be known to all men." (Phil. 4:5). It is related in the life of St. Francis of Assisi that one day he invited a religious brother to accompany him on a walk, saying he wished to preach. While going along he kept his eyes modestly cast down. After walking for a while he returned home. "When are you going to preach your sermon?" inquired his companion. "It is already preached," replied the Saint; "our sermon today consisted in mortifying our eyes, by which we edified all whom we met."

St. Ambrose says that the recollection of virtuous people is for the worldly-minded an excellent admonition. "What a beautiful thing it is," says the Saint, "that their mere appearance does good to others!" In this regard it is related of St. Bernardine of Siena that while still a young man in the world, his appearance was sufficient to restrain the unguarded remarks of his young companions. As soon as they saw him coming they would say to one another: "Be quiet; here comes Bernardine"; and they would either remain silent or begin some other topic of conversation. According to St. Gregory of Nyssa, St. Ephrem was so recollected that the very sight of him moved one to devotion, and one could not come in contact with him without feeling better for it.

More wonderful still is what Surius relates of the holy priest and martyr Lucian: "By his modesty and recollection alone he converted many heathens to the True Faith. The Emperor Maximian hearing this, and fearing that he too might be converted to Christianity, did not wish to look at him. When, therefore, he was summoned before the tribunal, the Emperor ordered him to stand behind a curtain so that he might talk to him without fear."

Our most perfect model in the practice of mortification of the eyes was our Divine Redeemer Himself. As a learned author remarks, the Evangelist expressly mentions that on certain occasions Jesus raised His eyes, indicating thereby that ordinarily He kept them cast down. Therefore the Apostle, when writing to his disciples, praises the modesty of his Divine Master: "I beseech you by the mildness and modesty of Christ." (2 Cor. 10:1).

Let us conclude these remarks with the words of St. Basil to his monks: "My dear sons, if we desire our soul to direct its gaze to Heaven, we must keep our eyes fixed on the earth. In the early morning as soon as we awake let us say with the royal Psalmist: 'Turn away my eyes that they may not behold vanity.'" (Ps. 118:37).

VIRGINITY

"They are the noblest portion of the Church of Christ," says St. Cyprian, when speaking of virgins who consecrate themselves to the love of their heavenly Spouse. Some of the holy Fathers, as St. Ephrem, St. Ambrose, and St. Chrysostom, have written whole books in praise of virginity. It is not my intention here to dwell at length on this beautiful subject, but merely to give a few ideas from which the devout reader may judge of its surpassing excellence.

In the first place, virginal souls are particularly dear in the sight of God. "They shall be as the angels of God in heaven," said our Blessed Redeemer. (Matt. 22:30). Baronius relates that at the death of a virgin named Georgia, doves were seen flying about, and when her corpse was brought into the church they hovered over the spot where her remains were placed, nor did they leave until the virgin was buried. It was thought that these doves were angels who desired in this manner to show a last honor to her virginal body.

Virginal souls who consecrate themselves to the love of Jesus Christ become His chosen spouses. Wherefore St. Paul, when writing to his disciples, does not hesitate to say: "I have espoused you to Jesus Christ." In the parable of the virgins, Our Lord appears as the Bridegroom. By the faithful in general our Saviour is called Master, Shepherd, Father or Lord; by virginal souls He desires to be called Spouse. This espousal with the Divine Redeemer takes place through faith: "I will espouse thee to me in faith." (Osee 2:20). The virtue of virginity is, in an especial manner, the fruit of the merits of Jesus Christ; therefore we read in the Apocalypse that they "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth: These were purchased from among men, the first fruits to God and to the Lamb." (Apoc. 14:4).

The Divine Mother once revealed to a pious soul that those consecrated to Jesus Christ must, above all virtues, love holy purity, for it is this in particular that makes them similar to their heavenly Spouse. Prudent people of the world who desire to enter the state of matrimony are careful to inquire and find out who would most likely be the worthiest and most desirable partner for life. Those who enter the religious life are espoused to Christ by their holy vows. Let us turn, therefore, to the spouse in the Canticles to see what she has to say of the Divine Bridegroom. "My beloved is white and ruddy," she says (Cant. 5:10), white by reason of His purity, and ruddy on account of the glow of love with which He is inflamed towards His spouse. In a word, He is so beautiful, so perfect in every virtue, so kind and friendly that there is not and cannot be a nobler or more amiable spouse than He. St. Eucherius says: "There is nothing to compare with His majesty, His beauty, or His generosity."

A PRECIOUS TREASURE

St. Clare of Montefalco said that she prized her virginity so highly that she would rather suffer the torments of Hell during her whole lifetime than lose this precious treasure. Virtuous young women have even refused the proposal of marriage with kings in order to remain the spouses of Jesus Christ. Blessed Joanna, Infanta of Portugal, rejected the hand of Louis XI, King of France. St. Agnes of Prague renounced a matrimonial alliance with the Emperor Frederick II; Elizabeth, the daughter of the King of Hungary and heiress to the throne, refused to be wedded to the Archduke of Austria. When Domitilla, the niece of the Emperor Domitian, was urged to marry the Count Aurelian, she replied: "If a person had the choice between a great monarch and a poor peasant, which would she choose as her bridegroom? Were I to marry Aurelian I would have to give up the King of Heaven; that would be the greatest folly, and I shall never be guilty of it." To her crown of virginity was added the crown of martyrdom, for her rejected lover had her burned to death.

A virgin who gives herself to the Lord, says Theodora, is freed from useless cares. She has nothing else to do but to deal confidently with the Lord. "Had she no other reward to expect," says St. Ambrose, "she would be happy indeed in being freed from worldly cares and anxieties and in occupying herself solely with God." But the peace and happiness she enjoys here on earth is but a foretaste of the great happiness and glory that await her in Heaven.

ACCEPTABLE TO GOD

Virgins who consecrate to God the lily of their chastity are as pleasing to Him as the holy angels. St. John was called the favorite Apostle of Our Lord, the Apostle whom Jesus loved, because he had preserved his virginity intact. For this very reason he was loved more than all the rest, and when our Saviour was dying on the Cross He committed His Immaculate Mother to the care of His virgin disciple, St. John. The great value of virginity is enhanced in our eyes by the extraordinary praise which the Holy Ghost bestows upon it: "No price is worthy of a continent soul." (Ecclus. 26:20). The Blessed Virgin Mary taught us this when the Archangel Gabriel brought her the message from on high: that God wished to become man and to choose her for His Mother. To the angel's words Mary humbly replied: "How can this be, for I know not man?" (Luke 1:34). By these words our Blessed Lady showed that she preferred to renounce the dignity of the Mother of God than to lose the treasure of her virginity. According to St. Cyprian, virginal purity is the queen of all virtues and the perfection of all goods. They who preserve their purity for the love of Jesus Christ, says St. Ephrem, are particularly favored by Him. St. Bernardine adds that virginity disposes the soul in an especial manner to see God by faith in this life and by the light of eternal glory in the next. One day God showed His great servant, Lucretia Orsini, the throne of glory prepared for those who serve Jesus Christ in virginal purity. Ravished in ecstasy, the Saint exclaimed: "Oh how dear to God and His holy Mother are virginal souls!"

"My son, when thou comest to the service of the Lord prepare thy soul for temptation." (Ecclus. 2:1). Be prepared therefore to suffer with humility and patience, for "silver and gold are tried by fire." No man can serve two masters, God and the world. He, therefore, who desires to consecrate himself to God, must renounce the world and say with all sincerity: God alone is my treasure and my only good. A heart that truly loves God despises the world and all that the world can offer; in a word, it despises all that is not God.

The venerable Francisca Farnese knew no more effectual means of exhorting her religious Sisters to the practice of perfection than to remind them that they were the spouses of Jesus Christ. "It is certain," she would say, "that each one of you is chosen by God to become a saint, since He has given you the great honor of being His spouse." And in very truth this is an inestimable grace which deserves our most generous cooperation. St. Augustine, when writing to a virgin consecrated to God, made use of these words: "You must know that you have a Spouse who is more beautiful than anything that earth or Heaven contains, and in choosing you to be His bride He has given you a most certain pledge of His love. From this you will recognize your obligation to love Him in return."

Should the world attempt to win your love, O spouse of Jesus Christ, answer in the words of the noble St. Agnes: "Away, away; you seek my love, but I can love none other than my God who has loved me first." "As you are the spouse of a God," says St. Jerome, "you should be proud of such a distinction." People of the world feel highly honored and make much ado about matrimonial alliances with the noble and wealthy. You have something more than this to be proud of, since you are affianced to the King of Heaven Himself. You can well say with a holy pride and joy: "I have found Him whom my soul loveth; I will embrace Him with my love, and I will never leave Him."

Love is the bond which unites the soul to God. Say often in the words of the Apostle St. Paul: "Who shall separate me from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress or famine, or nakedness, or danger or persecution or the sword? . . . I am sure that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present nor things to come, nor might, nor height, nor depth nor any other creature shall be able to separate me from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus Our Lord." (Rom. 8:38–39).

"You are My friends, if you do the things that I command you."—John 15:14.

Chapter 7

OBEDIENCE

"You are my friends, if you do the things that I command you."—John 15:14

Perfection consists in the conformity of our will to the Will of God. Now what is the surest means of knowing God's Will, and of regulating our lives according to it? It is obedience towards our lawful superiors. "Never is the Will of God more perfectly fulfilled," says St. Vincent de Paul, "than when we obey our superiors."

The greatest sacrifice that a soul can make to God consists in obedience to lawfully constituted superiors; for as, in the opinion of St. Thomas, "nothing is dearer to us than the liberty of our will," we can offer to God no more acceptable gift than this very liberty. "Obedience is better than sacrifices," says the Holy Ghost (1 Kings 15:22); that is to say, God prefers obedience to all other sacrifices. He who gives his property to God, by distributing it among the poor; his honor, by patiently bearing contempt; his body, by fasts and penitential works, gives Him a part of himself. But he who offers God his will, by subjecting it to obedience, gives Him all he has, and can truly say: "My Lord, after I have given Thee my will, I have nothing more to give." As St. Gregory says: "By the other virtues we give to God what belongs to us; by obedience we give Him ourselves." The same Saint teaches that all the other virtues follow in the train of obedience and by its influence are preserved in the soul.

A GREAT REWARD

According to the Venerable Sertorius Caputo, the reward of obedience is similar to that of martyrdom. In martyrdom we offer to God the head of our body; by obedience we offer Him our will, which is the head of the soul. Therefore the Wise Man assures us that "an obedient man shall speak of victory." (Prov. 21:28). It is easy, says St. Gregory, for those who obey, to overcome all the attacks of Hell; for, since by obedience they subject their will to men, they rise superior to the demons who fell on account of their disobedience. Cassian adds that if we mortify our self-will, we can easily root out all vices, because the latter spring from the former.

St. Augustine says that while Adam through disobedience brought destruction upon himself and all his posterity, the Son of God became man to redeem us and to teach us true wisdom by His life of obedience. For this reason He began as a child to practice obedience when He was subject to Mary and Joseph: "He was subject to them," says St. Luke (2:51). What our Saviour began as a child He continued His whole life, so that St. Paul could say: "He was obedient unto death, even to the death of the cross." (Phil. 2:8). The Mother of God revealed to one of her servants that Our Lord when dying for us entertained a very special love for obedient souls. To increase our merit, Our Lord desires us to be guided by faith. Therefore, instead of speaking to us Himself, He makes His Will known to us by means of our superiors.

When Jesus appeared to St. Paul and converted him on the road to Damascus, the future Apostle said: "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" The Lord could easily have instructed him then and there, but He did not; He merely said: "Arise and go into the city, and there it shall be told thee what thou must do." (Acts 9:7). Accordingly, St. Giles maintains that we gain more merit by obeying man for the love of God than by obeying God Himself. When we obey lawful superiors we are more sure of doing the Will of God than if Jesus Christ Himself would appear and speak to us. Such an apparition might afford us no certainty that it really was our Saviour who appeared and spoke; the evil spirit can appear as an angel of light in order to deceive us. But when we receive a command from our superiors, we are certain that in obeying them we are obeying Jesus Christ Himself. "He that heareth you, heareth me." (Luke 10:16).

A SOURCE OF MERIT

It is a delusion, therefore, to imagine that we can do anything better than that which is prescribed by obedience. To leave the occupation we are in duty bound to perform, in order to be united with God in meditation or spiritual reading is rather, according to St. Francis de Sales, to leave God in order to follow more closely the dictates of our self-love. From a soul that is resolved to serve God, says St. Teresa, God desires but one thing, and that one thing is obedience. "What we do from obedience," says Rodriguez, "is of more value than any other work we can perform."

It is more meritorious to pick up a straw from the ground, out of obedience, than from self-will to make a long meditation or scourge ourselves to blood. St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi preferred an exercise prescribed by obedience even to prayer. "When I am acting out of obedience," she said, "I am certain that I am doing the Will of God, but at other times this is not the case." All the masters of the spiritual life are unanimous in asserting that it is better to omit a pious exercise from obedience than to perform it against obedience. The Blessed Virgin revealed to St. Bridget that he who from obedience omits an act of mortification gains a double merit: that of the mortification he would like to perform, and that of obedience for the sake of which he omits it. St. Teresa was therefore right in saying that obedience is the shortest way to perfection. Christian soul, if you desire to walk securely, be guided in all your actions by obedience. Merchants and business men have their property insured in order not to suffer loss from its destruction. In order to render safe your eternal reward, make sure to get the security of obedience for all your actions.

QUALITIES OF OBEDIENCE

Obedience, however, to have this high value must be supernatural. To obey the Church, our parents, our confessor, in a word, our spiritual and temporal superiors in a meritorious way, we must be persuaded that obedience towards our superiors is obedience shown to God, and contempt for their commands is contempt shown to our Divine Master Himself, for He has said to our superiors: "He that heareth you heareth me, and he that despiseth you despiseth me." (Luke 10:16). The Apostle St. Paul, writing to his disciples, says: "Obey, not serving to the eye, as it were pleasing men, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart." (Eph. 6:6).

If, then, an order is given you by your parents, your confessor or your superiors, you must execute it not merely to please them, but principally to please God, whose will is made known to you by your superiors. By so doing you are more certain of fulfilling the Will of God than if an angel came down from Heaven and revealed it to you. St. Paul, when writing to the Galatians, says: "If an angel from Heaven preach a gospel to you besides that which we have preached to you, let him be anathema." (Gal. 1:8). Keep this truth constantly before your eyes: when you obey your superiors you are obeying God. If Our Lord came in person and charged you with some office or some particular work, would you hesitate a moment to obey? Would you begin to excuse yourself and oppose obstacles to the fulfillment of His command? But, says St. Bernard, whether it is God Himself or one who takes His place that gives the command, you must render the same prompt and cheerful obedience.

OBEDIENCE TO PARENTS

With regard to the obedience due to parents, St. Paul says: "Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is just." (Eph. 6:1). It must here be observed that the Apostle says, "obey your parents in the Lord," that is to say, in those things that are pleasing to the Lord, but not in those that displease Him. If, for example, a mother were to command her son to steal, or to injure another, would he be obliged to obey? Certainly not; were he to obey in such a case he would be guilty of sin. Again, St. Thomas teaches that children are not obliged to obey their parents when there is question of the choice of a state of life. With reference to the married state, Pinamonti with Sanchez, Konink and others, maintains that young people are obliged to consult their parents, since they are more experienced, and may often prevent serious mistakes. Moreover, to ignore them in a matter which they have so much at heart is most certain to wound them keenly. But with regard to vocation to the religious life, a child is not in the least bound to ask his parents' advice, because in this matter they have no experience and their prejudices generally make them hostile. Parents who unreasonably prevent their children from following a vocation to the priesthood or the religious life are guilty of unspeakable cruelty towards their own offspring. "A man's enemies shall be they of his own household." (Matt. 10:36).

The condition of servants is lowly and contemptible in the eyes of the world, but not so to the eyes of faith. This we learn from the example of our Blessed Redeemer Himself, who, though Lord of Heaven and earth, "emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and in habit found as a man." (Phil. 2:7). He humbly obeyed His Blessed Mother and St. Joseph, eminently holy creatures it is true, but infinitely below Him in dignity: "He was subject to them." (Luke 2:51). When instructing His Apostles He said: "He that will be first among you let him be your servant. Even as the Son of man is not come to be ministered unto, but to minister." (Matt. 20:28).

It is hardly necessary to say that servants are not bound to obey when they are commanded to do what God forbids. When the tyrant Antiochus wished to force the old man Eleazar to disregard the law which interdicted the use of pork to the Hebrews, the friends of the aged Eleazar took pity on him and suggested that he might escape death by pretending to eat of the forbidden food. But Eleazar replied: "It doth not become our age to dissemble: whereby many young persons might think that Eleazar, at the age of fourscore and ten years, was gone over to the life of the heathens; and so they, through my dissimulation, and for a little time of a corruptible life, should be deceived, and hereby I should bring a stain and a curse upon my old age. For though at the present time I should be delivered from the punishments of men, yet should I not escape the hand of the Almighty neither alive nor dead. Wherefore by departing manfully out of this life I shall show myself worthy of my old age, and I shall leave an example of fortitude to young men, if with a ready mind and constancy I suffer an honorable death, for the most venerable and most holy laws." (2 Mach. 6:24–28).

OBEDIENCE TO OUR SPIRITUAL DIRECTOR

Obedience to our spiritual director is of the greatest importance if we desire to please God and make progress in perfection. "It is true," says St. Gregory, "that some saints have been guided directly by God"; "but," he continues, "such examples are rather to be admired than imitated, for, thinking ourselves above the guidance of men, we might easily be led into error." Virtue is found in the golden mean; as idleness in the spiritual life is a fault, so too is intemperate zeal. It is the duty of the spiritual director to war against the former and to moderate the latter. Almighty God could direct us very well without the aid of another, but to keep us humble He desires us to submit to the authority and guidance of His servants.

Our Lord has indeed bestowed a great benefit on us in giving us spiritual guides to prevent us from going astray. Many people think that sanctity consists in performing works of penance. But if a person of weak constitution were to perform works of penance, and thereby seriously endanger his life, would he be laboring at his sanctification? Assuredly not; he would rather be guilty of sin. Others imagine that sanctity consists in much praying. But if the father of a family neglected the care of his children in order to go into solitude and pray, he would be guilty of sin. Still others imagine that sanctity consists in the frequent reception of Holy Communion. But suppose that the mother of a family would neglect her household duties and inconvenience her husband and her children for the sake of going to Holy Communion every day—she would have to give an account of her conduct to God.

In what, then, does sanctity consist? It consists in the perfect fulfillment of God's Will. But how shall we know what God desires of us? Thank God that He has given us a means of knowing. He tells us that by obeying our spiritual director we are obeying Him: "He that heareth you, heareth me." St. Teresa says: "We must make our confessor our judge and then be at rest with regard to the affairs of our soul, placing all our confidence in the words of Our Lord: 'He that heareth you, heareth me.'" This is the surest way, she says, of fulfilling the Will of God. The Saint tells us that she herself, by obedience to her confessor, learned to know and love God.

Speaking on this subject, St. Francis de Sales said: "We find the most important of all admonitions in the words of the devout Avila: 'Yo u may seek where you will, nowhere will you so surely find the Will of God as on the road of this humble obedience which all the Saints have recommended and practiced.'"

Obedience to our spiritual director is very pleasing to God, whether it is exercised in praying, in receiving Holy Communion, in mortifying ourselves or in omitting these holy exercises. We are always gaining merit, whether we eat or drink or recreate ourselves; for while we are obeying our confessor we are doing the Will of God. Holy Scripture says that obedience is more pleasing to God than all the other sacrifices we could make. Obey your spiritual Father, says St. Paul (Heb. 13:17), and be without fear regarding what you do out of obedience, for it is not you but he that will have to render an account of your actions. St. Philip Neri says: Those who desire to make progress in the way to perfection must choose a well-informed confessor and obey him as they would God Himself. Whoever does this is sure to have no account to give before God of what he has done or left undone. If, therefore, on judgment day Jesus Christ were to ask you: Why have you chosen this state of life? Why have you omitted this or that act of mortification? You can, provided you have practiced obedience, reply in these words: Lord, my confessor ordered me to do so—and then the Divine Judge must needs sanction what you have done.

On the other hand, if we refuse to obey the voice of our spiritual director we run the risk of being eternally lost. "He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me." (Luke 10:16). God said the same thing to Samuel when he complained that the people whom the Lord had entrusted to his care, had despised him: "They have not rejected thee, but me." (1 Kings 8:7). As a ship that is abandoned by its pilot, or a patient that is forsaken by his physician, so is the soul that is deprived of the guidance of a spiritual director.

We must be convinced, however, that no spiritual director can lead us to sanctity unless we are determined to renounce our own will. And as for peace of heart, remember well it is to be looked for not from the confessor, but from God Himself.

THE VOW OF OBEDIENCE

St. Thomas teaches that it is the vow of obedience that makes the religious. On this account St. Teresa used to say that a religious who is not obedient is not deserving of the name of religious. On the other hand, a religious who practices obedience is on the shortest road to perfection. "O virtue of obedience," she cries out, "thou dost accomplish everything!" St. Catherine of Bologna said that obedience alone is more pleasing to God than all other good works. When the Venerable Leonardi, Founder of the Clerics Regular of the Mother of God, was asked by his disciples to give them a Rule, he wrote on a sheet of paper just this one word: "Obedience." By this he wished to show, as Sertorious Caputo remarks, that in religious life obedience and sanctity are one and the same thing. Thoroughly convinced of this truth, St. Anselm on becoming Archbishop of Canterbury and finding no one above him, induced the Holy Father to make his chaplain his superior, whom he obeyed in everything. According to the opinion of St. Bonaventure, all the perfection of the religious life consists in the renunciation of self-will. Obedience to the rules and the commands of superiors is the greatest sacrifice a soul can make to God. It is certain that a religious who obeys exactly acquires rich treasures of merit.

St. Aloysius Gonzaga compared the religious life to a sailboat on which a person can make progress without the use of oars. And it is very true, for in religious life not only when we fast, or pray, or meditate, but also when we take our meals, our rest or recreation, we are acquiring merit; for as all this is done out of obedience, the Will of God is accomplished and merit is thereby gained. In the life of the ancient Fathers it is related that one of them saw two choirs of the blessed in Heaven; one of the choirs consisted of those who had left the world and had lived in solitude, devoted to a life of prayer and penance; the other choir was made up of those who had subjected themselves to a life of obedience for the love of Jesus Christ and had lived entirely according to the will of their superiors. These latter enjoyed a greater degree of glory than the former; for though the hermits had pleased God by their spiritual exercises, they nevertheless had done their own will, whereas the others, by means of the vow of obedience had given their will to God, the best offering they could make Him.

St. Dorotheus relates something similar in reference to his disciple St. Dositheus. The latter had very poor health, and in consequence was unable to perform the customary exercises with the rest of the community; in order not to lose any merit thereby, he made a perfect renunciation of his will and devoted himself entirely to the practice of obedience. After five years he departed this life. Now, God revealed to the Abbot Dorotheus that this holy youth had obtained in Heaven a reward equal to that of the holy hermits, St. Paul and St. Antony. The monks were surprised that Dositheus should have attained such great glory, as he had not even done as much as the others; but God made known to them that it was due to his obedience that Dositheus had been so richly rewarded.

If you ask me what is the best and most effectual means of obeying in a meritorious manner, I answer: "Be thoroughly persuaded that when you are obeying your superior, you are obeying God, and when you despise the command of your superior you are despising the Divine Redeemer Himself." St. John Climacus relates that the superior of a cloister once called an old monk, and, to give the others an example, he bade him remain standing for a long time. When later they asked the old monk what were his sentiments during this mortification, he replied: "I imagined that I stood before Jesus Christ, and that He Himself had imposed upon me this humiliation, and therefore I had not the slightest thought against obedience."

OBSERVANCE OF THE RULE

To St. Francis de Sales are attributed these very significant words: "The predestination of religious is bound up with the observance of their rule." St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi was accustomed to say that obedience to the rule is the shortest and surest way to sanctity and eternal happiness. Indeed for religious, the observance of the rule is the only means of becoming holy; no other way leads to this coveted goal. A religious who would habitually violate the rules of the institute would not advance a single step in the love of Jesus Christ, even though he performed works of penance and were devoted to spiritual exercises. The efforts of such religious are all in vain and in them are fulfilled the words of the Holy Ghost: "He that rejecteth wisdom and discipline is unhappy; and their hope is vain, and their labors without fruit and their works unprofitable." (Wis. 3:11).

The rules of a religious are, no doubt, a burden, but a burden like that of wings, by means of which we are borne aloft to God. "The burden of Jesus Christ," says St. Augustine, "has wings that enable us to rise above the earth." The rules of a religious are bonds, but bonds of love that unite us to the highest and greatest good. If it seems hard to us that the rule forbids what self-love demands, let us say joyfully with the Apostle: "I am a prisoner of the Lord" (Eph. 4:1), but I rejoice in my bonds because they unite me more closely to my God and secure for me an eternal crown.

It may be that you can do nothing great for the Lord; you are unable to perform severe penances or to spend much time at prayer. You can at least be exact in the observance of the rule, and this alone is sufficient in a short time to further your progress in perfection. St. Bonaventure says: "The best way to strive after perfection is to observe everything that is prescribed." The measure of our generosity in this regard will be the measure of God's bounty toward us. St. Augustine called the rules the mirror of religious because from our zeal in observing them we can know what we look like in the eyes of God. "It is better," says a learned author, "to be a finger united to the body than an eye separated from it." An apparently good work, but one not in accordance with the rule, is not acceptable to God, and is only an obstacle to our striving after perfection. In the eyes of the world many of the rules of religious life are insignificant trifles, but they are not so when considered in the light of faith. When Michael Angelo was asked why he paid so much attention to trifles, he said: "Trifles go to make up perfection, and perfection is no trifle." St. Giles once said: "By a little negligence we may lose a great grace."

In order to observe the rules perfectly, says St. Ignatius, love must be our motive, not fear; in other words, we must observe our rules not merely to avoid the reproofs of our superiors or to be praised by others, but simply and solely for the love of Jesus Christ. To be perfect, says Father Pavone of the Society of Jesus, obedience must walk on both feet. By this he meant that perfect obedience includes both the will and the intellect. St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi expressed a similar sentiment when she said: "Perfect obedience requires a soul without a will, and a will without a judgment." One day St. Ignatius remarked that if the Pope were to command him to make a voyage on the high sea in a little boat without rudder or sail, he would blindly obey. When someone objected that it would be very imprudent to put himself in such danger of death, the Saint replied: "Prudence is required of superiors; the prudence of subjects must consist in obeying without prudence."

The great St. Bernard said: "If, instead of obeying blindly, we wish to know why the superior has ordered this or that, we show that our obedience is very imperfect." It was in this way that the devil tempted Eve and brought about her fall. "Why," said he, "has God forbidden you to eat of all the trees in the garden?" Eve would not have fallen into sin had she answered: "It is not for us to inquire into the reason of this prohibition; we have only to obey." But unfortunately, she began to wonder why it was that such a command had been given, and replied: "Lest perhaps we should die." From that one word "perhaps" the devil perceived that she had begun to waver, and at once he said: "Do not fear; you will not die." And Eve fell, and misfortune came upon the whole human race.

"Learn of Me, because I am meek and humble of heart."—Matt. 11:29.

Chapter 8

MEEKNESS AND HUMILITY

"Learn of me, because I am meek and humble of heart."—Matt. 11:29

Humility is called by the saints the foundation and safeguard of all the virtues. If it is not the most prominent among the virtues, it occupies, according to St. Thomas, the first place as the foundation of the rest. In the erection of a building, the basement comes before the walls and pillars, even though the latter be of gold. And so in the spiritual life humility must precede everything else in order to banish pride, to which God is so opposed. He, therefore, who endeavors to acquire the other virtues without humility, says St. Gregory, is scattering dust before the wind.

The virtue of humility was little known and less loved on earth; indeed, it was thoroughly despised. Pride reigned everywhere, for it was an unfortunate inheritance of the human race bequeathed to his posterity by Adam. The Son of God descended from Heaven to teach man by word and example the value of humility, and with this end in view He went so far as to "empty himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and in habit found as a man. He humbled himself . . . even to the death of the cross." (Phil. 2:7). His first appearance on earth was in the humble stable of Bethlehem; the greater portion of His mortal life was spent in humble retirement at Nazareth. He departed this life, humbled and despised, on the summit of Mt. Calvary; and He calls out to each one of us: "I have given you an example that as I have done, so you do also." (John 13:15). By this He means to say: "My dear children, I have endured all this humiliation and contempt that you might follow My example." With regard to the humility of Jesus Christ, St. Augustine says: "If this medicine does not cure us of pride, I know not what other remedy can do so."

PRIDE AN ABOMINATION TO THE LORD

"Every proud man is an abomination to the Lord," says the Holy Ghost. (Prov. 16:5). The proud man is a thief because he appropriates what belongs to God from whom, as St. Paul says, he has received everything.

If a horse were decked with gorgeous trappings would it—supposing it were able to do so—pride itself on having such fine adornments, knowing that at a moment's notice its master could take them away? The proud man is guilty of falsehood, for all the goods that he possesses both in the order of nature and grace are the gifts of God. "By the grace of God I am what I am," says the Apostle (1 Cor. 15:10), for "we are not sufficient to think any thing of ourselves, as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God." (2 Cor. 3:5).

"Humble yourself," says St. Augustine, "and God will descend to unite Himself with you; but if you are proud He will depart from you." The Royal Prophet had said the same thing long before: God looks upon the humble with loving eyes, but the proud He sees from afar. When the rebel angels grew proud, God drove them from His sight and cast them into the abyss, for God's Word must be fulfilled: "Whosoever shall exalt himself, shall be humbled." (Matt. 23:12). St. Peter Damian relates that a certain proud man once heard these words of Our Lord read in the Gospel at Holy Mass. "That is not true," he said, "for if I humbled myself I would lose my possessions and the respect of my fellowmen." Now what happened? He fought a duel in defense of his property, and his antagonist, striking him in the mouth with his weapon, pierced his blasphemous tongue and stretched him dead on the ground.

The Lord has promised to hear all who call upon Him: "Everyone that asketh, receiveth." (Matt. 7:8). But to the proud man God will not listen. "God resisteth the proud," says St. James, "and giveth grace to the humble." (Jas. 4:6). Yes, God hastens to open His hand and bestow upon the humble what they desire. "Lord, give me the treasure of humility," prayed St. Augustine. Humility is called a treasure because the Lord sees to it that the humble abound in good things. When man's heart is full of himself, there is no room for God's gifts. Man must therefore, as it were, be emptied of himself by the knowledge of his own nothingness. "He that is mighty hath done great things to me" said the Blessed Virgin Mary, "because he hath regarded the humility of his handmaid" (Luke 1:48); that is to say, He hath considered the knowledge I have of my own nothingness.

A SOURCE OF BLESSINGS

St. Teresa tells us that she received the greatest graces from God when she humbled herself most profoundly in His presence. "The prayer of him that humbleth himself shall pierce the clouds; and he will not depart till the most High behold." (Ecclus. 35:21). St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say: "If you desire to be holy, be humble; if you desire to be very holy, be very humble." This advice was given by a devout man to St. Francis Borgia before he had entered the religious life: "If you want to become a saint, think of your own misery and wretchedness." Following this advice, the Saint spent two hours every day trying to obtain a knowledge and contempt of himself. "As pride," says St. Gregory, "is the most evident characteristic of the reprobate, humility is the clearest sign of the elect." When St. Anthony, the hermit, saw the world full of the snares of the devil, he cried out: "Who can ever escape so many dangers?" He heard a voice say: "Anthony, humility alone walks securely; he who goes with head bowed down, need not fear to fall into these snares." In a word, if we do not become children—not of course in age, but in humility—we cannot, as our Saviour said, enter the Kingdom of Heaven. "Learn of me, for I am meek, and humble of heart: and you shall find rest to your souls." (Matt. 11:29).

The proud man has no peace or rest, for he is seldom, if ever, treated in a manner corresponding to the exalted opinion he has of himself. If he is honored, he is dissatisfied that others are honored more than he. There is always a little more honor that he might have had, the absence of which annoys him more than what he has affords him pleasure. What great honor, for example, did not Aman enjoy at the court of Assuerus? It was his privilege to eat at the king's table, and yet he was unhappy because Mardochai would not salute him. "And whereas I have all these things, I think I have nothing, so long as I see Mardochai sitting before the King's gate." (Esther 5:13). St. Jerome says that true honor avoids him who seeks it and seeks him who avoids it; it is like a shadow that follows the one who flees from it and flees from the one who follows it.

The humble man, on the contrary, is always content. If honor is shown to him, he regards it as above his deserts; if he is offended, he considers himself as deserving of worse treatment than he has received, and he says with Job: "I have sinned and indeed I have offended, and I have not received what I have deserved." (Job 33:27).

On one occasion when St. Francis Borgia was travelling, he was advised to send someone ahead to secure a lodging and prevent the inconveniences attending an unexpected arrival. The Saint replied: "As far as that is concerned, I always send a quartermaster ahead. My quartermaster is the thought of the Hell that I have deserved. As a result, every lodging is like a king's palace for me compared to the place where I deserve to be."

HUMILITY OF INTELLECT

The virtue of humility is twofold, namely, humility of the intellect and humility of the will. According to St. Bernard, humility of the intellect consists in having an humble opinion of ourselves and in regarding ourselves as deserving of contempt. Humility is truth, writes St. Teresa, and therefore the Lord loves the humble so much because He loves the truth. It is certainly true that of ourselves we are nothing; we are ignorant and blind and incapable of accomplishing any good. On the one hand, we have nothing of our own but sin, which makes us still more contemptible. On the other hand, of ourselves we can do nothing but commit sin. Everything good that we may have or can do, comes from God and belongs to God. Now the humble man has this truth ever before his eyes, and consequently he ascribes nothing to himself but sin, which makes him deserving of contempt. He cannot bear to have merit ascribed to him that he does not deserve, but he rejoices in his soul when he is called upon to suffer contempt.

We must therefore say with the great St. Augustine: "Grant, O Lord, that I may know who I am and who Thou art." Thou art the source of all good and I am nothing but misery and wretchedness. "Only by the humble," says the Wise Man, "is God truly honored." (Ecclus. 3:21). If you wish therefore to honor God, humbly acknowledge your own wretchedness and protest your willingness to receive whatever treatment God's providence has in store for you. Never boast of your good works. Read the lives of the Saints to see what they have done, and then feel ashamed of yourself for having accomplished so little. The Venerable John of Avila relates that a celebrated man who had married a peasant girl insisted that she should not destroy her poor clothes, but keep them so that she might not grow proud when she saw herself surrounded by servants and clad in costly attire. We must act in a similar manner. When we perceive anything good in ourselves, we must look at our old clothes. In other words we must recall to mind what we once were, and draw the conclusion that everything good that we possess is an alms bestowed by God. Whenever St. Teresa performed a good work or saw one performed, she hastened to thank God for it.

In the next place, we must try to realize that without God's assistance we can do nothing, absolutely nothing. This will lead us to distrust ourselves and place implicit confidence in God. St. Peter trusted in his own strength when he said: "Even though I should die with thee, I will not deny thee." (Matt. 26:35). But we know how soon after he not only denied, but protested under oath that he did not know Our Lord. Put your confidence in God and say with St. Paul: "I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me." (Phil. 4:13). When St. Catherine of Siena was tempted she humbled herself and put all her confidence in God. One day the devil cried out in a rage: "Cursed be thou, and cursed be he who taught thee this means of overcoming me."

HUMILITY OF WILL

Humility of the intellect, as we have seen, consists in acknowledging that we are nothing and deserving only of contempt. Humility of the will consists in the desire to be despised by others and in the pleasure such contempt affords us. Humility of the will Our Lord had especially in view when He said: "Learn of me, because I am meek, and humble of heart." (Matt. 11:29). Many are humble with their lips but not in their heart. They acknowledge that they are wicked and deserving of punishment, but when they are reproved they deny that they are at fault. "To humble oneself for the sake of being praised," says St. Bernard, "is not humility at all; in fact it is destructive of humility, for by such conduct humility itself becomes an object of pride." "He," says St. Joseph Calasanctius, "who loves God, does not wish to appear holy, but desires to be so." The saints have not become saints in the midst of approval and applause; it was rather amid insults and contempt. The holy martyr Ignatius, when Bishop, enjoyed universal esteem and reverence; he was afterwards dragged to Rome, as a criminal, to be cast to the wild beasts. On the journey thither the guards loaded him with insults and outrages of all kinds. The Saint cried out with joy: "Now I begin to be a disciple of Christ."

He who knows not how to bear an insult shows plainly that he has lost sight of Jesus Crucified. The Venerable Mary of the Incarnation said to her sister religious one day at the sight of the crucifix: "Is it possible, dear Sisters, that we can refuse to suffer contempt when we see Jesus Christ so despised?" Our Saviour once appeared to St. John with a cross on His shoulder and a crown of thorns encircling His head. "John," said He, "ask of me what you wish." The Saint replied: "Lord, I desire to suffer and to be despised for Thee."

A very devout person had the beautiful custom of going before the Blessed Sacrament whenever she was insulted or offended. Kneeling before the tabernacle, she would say: "O my God, I am too poor to offer Thee anything precious or costly; therefore I offer Thee this little gift that I have just received." If, therefore, Christian soul, you desire to attain great sanctity, you must be prepared to suffer humiliation and contempt. Does this seem hard for poor human nature? Then remember the promise of our Saviour Jesus Christ: "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and speak all that is evil against you, untruly, for my sake: Be glad and rejoice, for your reward is very great in heaven." (Matt. 5:11).

MEEKNESS

Humility and meekness were the favorite virtues of Jesus Christ, and He recommended them in a particular manner to His disciples when He said: "Learn of me, because I am meek, and humble of heart." (Matt. 11:29). Our Divine Redeemer was called the "Lamb of God," not only on account of the Sacrifice He was to make of Himself on the Cross in expiation for sin, but also on account of the meekness that characterized His whole life and particularly during His bitter Passion. When He was rudely buffeted by the servant of Caiphas and charged with a want of respect for the high priest, He meekly replied: "If I have spoken ill, give testimony thereof; but if well, why strikest thou me?" (John 18:23). When He hung upon the Cross and His enemies loaded Him with insults and ignominy, He turned to His heavenly Father and said: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." (Luke 23:34).

How dear to God are those meek souls who bear with all manner of offenses and indignities without giving way to anger! Their prayer is acceptable to God, says Holy Scripture (Jdth. 9:16); that is, it will always be heard. "Heaven," says Father Alvarez, "is, in a particular manner, the home and country of those who on earth are despised and trampled under foot." Indeed it is to these, and not to the proud who are honored and esteemed by the world, that the possession of the Kingdom of Heaven is promised. The Royal Psalmist assures us that the meek will not only possess happiness in the life to come, but even in this life: "They shall delight in abundance of peace." (Ps. 36:11).

St. Teresa says that she seemed to experience a more than ordinary love for those who spoke ill of her. In the acts of Canonization we read that by injuries one could obtain her love in an especial degree. To such meekness we can never attain without deep humility, a humble opinion of ourselves, and a desire to be treated with contempt. Pride is angry and vindictive because of the high opinion we have of ourselves and the craving for honors that we think we deserve.

The spirit of God is a spirit of meekness. "My spirit is sweet as honey." (Ecclus. 24:27). St. Francis de Sales, a master and model of holy meekness, says: "Humble meekness is the virtue of virtues, which our Divine Redeemer has most urgently recommended to us; therefore we must practice it everywhere and at all times." Meekness must be exercised especially towards the poor and the sick; towards the poor because, on account of their poverty, they are often harshly treated; towards the sick because they suffer so much and are often left without assistance. Superiors should act with meekness towards their subjects, and when giving an order, they should ask rather than command. St. Vincent de Paul says that superiors have no better means of winning the affection and obedience of their subjects than by meekness.

This was also the opinion of St. Jane Chantal. "I have tried all kinds of treatment," she says; "the mild and patient is the best." "Nothing is so edifying," says St. Francis de Sales, "as amiable meekness." On the lips of this servant of God there hovered a continual smile. His countenance, his conversation, his whole being breathed meekness. St. Vincent de Paul declared that he had never known a meeker man than the Bishop of Geneva. He saw in him a living copy of the goodness and kindness of Jesus Christ. Even when, not to burden his conscience, he had to refuse a request, he couched his refusal in such gentleness and love as to win the cheerful assent of the petitioner; and in spite of a refusal, the latter went away contented. He was meek towards everyone, his superiors, his equals and his inferiors; towards the members of his household and towards strangers. He never complained about his servants; seldom did he reprove them, and then always with gentleness. What a contrast between this saint and those who, according to St. Francis' own words, "seem to be angels abroad and devils at home."

MEEK CORRECTION

If you, Christian reader, are called upon to administer a reproof, do so as St. Francis did, with meekness. To correct emphatically is one thing; to reprove harshly is another. To reprehend in a very positive manner is sometimes necessary, when the fault committed is a serious one or when repeated warnings have been in vain. But we must guard against using an angry tone which betrays an absence of self-control; this often does more harm than good. It is this bitter zeal that St. James deprecates so much. Many imagine that the best and only way to treat subordinates is by harsh deportment, to fill them with reverential awe and dread. But St. James, the Apostle, is of quite a different opinion. He says: "If you have bitter zeal, glory not. This is not wisdom descending from above, but earthly, sensual, devilish. But the wisdom that is from above is . . . peaceable, modest, full of mercy and good fruits." (James 3:14, 15, 17). If you are obliged to speak in a stern manner to impress the culprit with the gravity of his fault, at least conclude your remarks with some kind words to take the sting out of the reproof. Like the good Samaritan, you must heal the wound with oil and wine.

When oil is mixed with other liquids it always comes to the top; so you too, says St. Francis de Sales, in all that you do, let meekness and gentleness predominate. If the person you wish to reprove is very much agitated, it is better to wait until he has grown calm; otherwise you only aggravate him the more. If a house is on fire, it is not the proper thing to throw wood on it.

"You know not of what spirit you are." (Luke 9:55). So spoke the Blessed Redeemer to St. John and his brother St. James when they wished Him to chastise the Samaritans. Ah, what sort of a spirit is that! Our Redeemer wished to say: It is not My spirit; My spirit is meekness and gentleness. "The Son of man came not to destroy souls, but to save" (Luke 9:56), and you wish Me to bring about their destruction.

OUR SAVIOUR'S MEEKNESS

With what meekness and gentleness did not Our Lord speak to the woman taken in sin! "Woman," said He, "hath no man condemned thee? Who said: No man, Lord. And Jesus said: Neither will I condemn thee. Go, and now sin no more." (John 8:10–11). With similar meekness He spoke to and converted the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well. At first He merely asked for a drink of water; and then He said: "O didst thou but know who it is that saith to thee: 'Give me to drink!'" (John 4:10). Finally He revealed to her that He was the promised Messias. What touching tenderness our Saviour displayed towards the treacherous Apostle Judas. He permitted him to eat from the same dish with Himself; He knelt and washed his feet; at the very moment when he was consummating his crime our Saviour warned him with these touching words: "Judas, dost thou betray the Son of man with a kiss?" (Luke 22:48). How did He win back St. Peter after the Apostle had denied Him? He did not reproach him. When passing from the house of the high priest, He turned and looked tenderly upon Peter, and that tender look wrought such a conversion in the heart of the Apostle that during the remainder of his life he wept bitterly over the offense he had given his Divine Master.

Meekness accomplishes far more than anger and bitterness. St. Francis de Sales says there is nothing so bitter as a green walnut; put it in preserve, and it becomes sweet and agreeable. In like manner reproofs, however unpleasant they may be in themselves, become acceptable and productive of good results when administered with meekness and love. By reason of his wonderful meekness, St. Francis de Sales could do whatever he wished; he even succeeded in leading the most obstinate sinners back to God. St. Vincent de Paul was animated with a like spirit and he wished it to be the characteristic of his disciples. "Gentleness, love and humility," he was wont to say, "have a wonderful effect in winning the hearts of men and in causing them to do willingly what is opposed to human nature."

You must endeavor to be mild and amiable to everyone, under all circumstances and at all times. "There are many," says St. Bernard, "who are full of sweetness as long as things go their way; but when they meet with contradiction they break forth in fire and flames, and fume like a veritable Vesuvius. They are like the coals that glow beneath the ashes." He who desires to become a saint must live like a lily among thorns; it is always a lily no matter how much the thorns may prick it. In other words he must always be meek and amiable. The exterior of a soul that loves God will reflect the peace that reigns within alike in prosperity and adversity. If we must answer one who offends us, let us do so with meekness. "A mild answer breaketh wrath," says Holy Scripture. (Prov. 15:1). If we are too excited, it is better to remain silent. In the heat of passion it seems right to say everything that comes to the tongue; but when anger has subsided we find we have committed as many faults as we have spoken words.

MEEKNESS TOWARDS ONESELF

Should we have the misfortune to commit a fault, we must exercise meekness even towards ourselves. To be angry with oneself after committing a fault is not a sign of humility, but of secret pride; it shows that we do not regard ourselves as the weak and wretched creatures that we really are. St. Aloysius said: "The devil likes to fish in troubled waters, where we can distinguish nothing." If a soul is distracted and disturbed it is very hard for it to recognize God and its duties. When, therefore, we have committed a fault, we must turn to the Lord with humility and confidence, beg Him for pardon and say with St. Catherine of Genoa: "Lord, see, here is fruit from my own garden! But pardon me, I beg Thee! I repent from my heart of having offended Thee; I will do so no more; give me the aid of Thy holy grace." "Never," says St. Francis de Sales, "permit anger to enter the soul under any pretext whatever; for once the violent passion has found lodgment in the heart, it is not in our power to banish it."

Seek to control the emotions of anger at once by remaining silent, or by thinking of something else. Do as the Apostles did when they were tossed about by the stormy sea; they had instant recourse to their Divine Master; He alone can still the storms of the human heart. If in consequence of weakness, anger has entered your heart, do all in your power to regain your composure and act humbly and meekly towards him who was the occasion of your angry feelings. St. Francis tells us that it cost him much labor to overcome his two predominant passions, anger and love. To conquer his angry passion he struggled for twelve long years. With regard to love, he changed its object, detaching himself entirely from creatures and giving his whole love to God.

It was a practice with the Saints during prayer and meditation to bring to mind all the annoyance and obstacles they were apt to encounter in the course of the day, and to prepare themselves in advance to endure them with meekness and humility. Thus they were enabled to put into practice the counsel of their gentle Saviour: "Learn of me, because I am meek, and humble of heart: and you shall find rest to your souls." (Matt. 11:29).

"He that hateth his life in this world, keepeth it unto life eternal."—John 12:25.

Chapter 9

MORTIFICATION

"He that hateth his life in this world, keepeth it unto life eternal."—John 12:25

The virtue of mortification is twofold, exterior and interior. Exterior mortification consists in doing and suffering what is opposed to the exterior senses, and in depriving oneself of what is agreeable to them. In as far as it is necessary to avoid sin, every Christian is bound to practice mortification. With regard to those things which we may lawfully enjoy, mortification is not obligatory, but it is very useful and meritorious. For those, however, who are striving after perfection, mortification, even in things that are lawful, is absolutely necessary. As poor children of Adam, we must fight till our dying day; "For the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, for these are contrary, one to another: so that you do not the things that you would." (Gal. 5:17).

It is proper to animals to gratify their senses; it is characteristic of angels to do the Will of God. From this a learned author concludes that we become angels when we strive to do God's Will, but we become like animals when we seek to gratify our senses. Either the soul must subject the body or the body will make the soul its slave. Accordingly, we must treat our body as a rider treats a wild horse; he draws the reins tight, lest he should be thrown off. A physician at times prescribes medicines that are very distasteful to the patient, and he strictly forbids injurious foods and drinks, though the patient may desire them. He would be a cruel physician indeed who could be dissuaded from administering medicines because his patient objected on account of their being bitter, and who would allow the sick man to eat and drink what he pleased. How much greater is the cruelty of the sensual man who strives to avoid everything that is disagreeable or painful to his body in this life, and thereby puts both body and soul in the greatest danger of suffering incomparably greater pains for all eternity. "This false love," says St. Bernard, "destroys the true love we should have for our body."

Such misplaced sympathy is in reality only cruelty; for while we spare the body we kill the soul. The same Saint, addressing those worldly-minded people who ridicule the servants of God for mortifying themselves, makes use of the following words: "Yes, we are cruel, if you will, towards our bodies when we afflict them with penance; but you are far more cruel towards yourselves when you gratify your sensual cravings, for by so doing you condemn both body and soul to an eternity of frightful torments." Our Lord once said to St. Francis of Assisi: "If you desire Me, take the bitter things of life as sweet and the sweet as bitter." It is useless to assert, as some do, that perfection does not consist in chastising the body, but in mortifying the will. To this Pinamonti replies: "If the vineyard does not bear fruit because it is surrounded by a hedge of thorns, at least the hedge helps to preserve the fruit, for Holy Scripture says: 'Where there is no hedge, the possession shall be spoiled.'" (Ecclus. 36:27).

St. Aloysius Gonzaga had very poor health. Nevertheless, he was so intent on crucifying his body that he sought for nothing but mortification and works of penance. One day someone said to him that sanctity did not consist in these things, but in the renunciation of self-will. He meekly replied in the words of the Gospel: "These things you ought to have done, and not to leave those undone." (Matt. 23:23). By this he meant to say: Although it is necessary to mortify the will, we must also mortify the body to keep it in check and subject to reason. On this account the Apostle said: "I chastise my body and bring it into subjection." (1 Cor. 9:27). If the body is not mortified, it is very difficult to make it obedient to the law of God.

WE OURSELVES OUR WORST ENEMY

It is certainly true that the world and the devil are great enemies to our salvation; but the greatest enemy of all is our own body because it is always with us. "The enemy that dwells with us in the same house," says St. Bernard, "injures us most." A fort has no more dangerous enemies than those within, for it is harder to protect oneself from these than from the enemy without. While worldly-minded people are intent solely on gratifying their bodies by the pleasures of sense, souls that love God think only of mortifying themselves as much as they can. St. Peter of Alcantara thus addressed his body: "Be assured of the fact that in this life I will give you no rest; afflictions are your lot; when we are in Heaven we shall enjoy a rest without end." In the same spirit St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi acted, and shortly before her death she could say she did not remember ever having found pleasure in anything except God.

SELF-DENIAL

But, you will say, I have a weak constitution and poor health, and my confessor forbids me to practice works of penance. Very well, obey him; but at least bear patiently with the discomforts and fatigue resulting from your bodily condition; try not to complain of the inclemency of the weather and the excessive heat and cold. If you are unable to practice works of penance, at least abstain occasionally from some lawful pleasure. When St. Francis Borgia was out hunting, at the moment the falcon would seize its prey he used to cast down his eyes, to deprive himself of the pleasure such a sight would afford him. If you deny your body lawful pleasures, it is not apt to seek unlawful ones; but if you indulge in all the lawful enjoyments you will soon cross the line into forbidden territory. A great servant of God, Vincent Carafa, S.J., says that the Lord has given us the joys and pleasures of this world not only that we may enjoy them, but also that we might have an opportunity of making a sacrifice, by depriving ourselves of them for love of Him. Poisons properly compounded, and taken in very small quantity, are sometimes beneficial to the health of the body, but they are and always will be poisons. And so it is with pleasures; they must be indulged in with great precaution and moderation and solely with the view of serving God more faithfully.

Moreover, we must be on our guard lest anxiety and solicitude for our bodily welfare endanger the health of the soul. "The sickness of the body," says St. Bernard, "excites my compassion, but the sickness of the soul causes me greater affliction because it is much more dangerous." We are very apt to make our bodily ailments a pretext for exemption from our spiritual duties. "We omit prayer today," says St. Teresa, "because we have a headache; tomorrow because we had a headache, and the next day because we fear we might get one."

ADVANTAGES OF MORTIFICATION

It may be profitable to dwell for a moment on the advantages of mortification, for such a consideration is calculated to inspire us with more courage and generosity. By mortification we may expiate the temporal punishment due to our sins. We are aware of the fact that though the guilt of sin is remitted by a contrite Confession, there still remains a temporal punishment to be endured. If in the present life we neglect to make atonement, we shall have to suffer in the fire of Purgatory. "Except they do penance for their deeds," says Holy Scripture, "they shall be in very great tribulation." (Apoc. 2:22). St. Antonine relates that the choice was offered to a sick man (by his guardian angel) either to suffer three days in Purgatory or to remain two years longer on his sickbed. The patient chose the three days in Purgatory. He had hardly been there an hour when he complained to the angel that instead of a few days he had already spent several years in terrible torments. "What is it you say," replied the angel; "your body is still warm on the deathbed, and you speak of years?" If therefore, Christian soul, you have anything to suffer, say to yourself: This must be my Purgatory; I shall bear this suffering patiently to atone for my sins, and to gain merit for eternal life.

IT ELEVATES THE SOUL

Mortification raises the soul to God. St. Francis de Sales says: "The soul can never ascend to God unless the body is brought into subjection by penance." "Souls that truly love God," says St. Teresa, "have no desire for bodily rest and indulgence." But by mortification we may attain great glory in Heaven. "If contestants," says St. Paul, "abstain from everything that might weaken the body and prevent them from winning a perishable crown, with what greater zeal ought not we to mortify ourselves in order to obtain a priceless and eternal crown!" St. John saw the blessed in Heaven with palm branches in their hands. From this it is evident that to be numbered among the elect we must all be martyrs, either by the sword of the tyrant or by mortification. But "The sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory to come, that shall be revealed in us" (Rom. 8:18), and our present tribulations are momentary and light, but they "work for us above measure exceedingly an eternal weight of glory." (2 Cor. 4:17). Let us therefore reanimate our faith. We have but a short time to live on this earth; our true home and eternal rest is beyond the grave. St. Peter says that the blessed are the living stones with which the heavenly Jerusalem is built. But as Holy Church sings in the Divine Office, these stones must be cut and shaped by the chisel of mortification.

INTERIOR MORTIFICATION

Interior mortification consists in restraining our inordinate self-love and self-will. There is a twofold love of self, the one good and the other bad. The former spurs us on to strive for eternal life, for which God has created us; the latter prompts us to seek for the good things of this earth, to the great detriment of our immortal soul. Christ Our Lord has said: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself." (Matt. 16:24). Now, all the perfection of a soul consists in this very self-denial, for St. Augustine says, "The less one seeks to gratify the passions, the more one truly loves God, and when one desires nothing but God, one's love of God is perfect." In the present condition of our sinful nature, it is impossible to be entirely free from the promptings of self-love. Jesus Christ alone among men and the Blessed Virgin Mary among women were entirely exempt. As for all the other Saints, they have had to battle with their inordinate inclinations. Interior mortification, therefore, consists principally in restraining and keeping in check these inordinate inclinations of self-love. The soul has other enemies, it is true, but the worst enemy of all is self-love.

According to St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi, "Self-love is like the worm that gnaws at the root and destroys not only the fruit, but even the very life of the plant." The same Saint adds: "The traitor that we have to fear most is self-love, for self-love betrays us as Judas betrayed Our Lord with a kiss. He who conquers self-love has conquered all." Pray, therefore, without ceasing, to the Lord: O God, do not let me fall a prey to my passions, which rob me of Thy holy fear and of reason itself. "Man's life on earth is a warfare." (Job 7:1). He who encounters an enemy in battle must have his weapons in hand to defend himself; if he neglects to fight, he is lost. No matter how many victories we may have won, we cannot afford to lay down our arms; for our passions, in spite of repeated defeats, are never entirely destroyed.

They are like weeds, says St. Bernard, that crop out again as often as they are cut off; even when you think you have rooted them out entirely, they soon appear again. In the struggle with our passions, the most we can hope to attain is that their attacks become less frequent and less violent, and we ourselves better able to overcome them. One day a monk complained to the Abbot Theodore that he had fought for eight long years against his passions and had not as yet succeeded in subduing them. The Abbot replied: "My brother, you complain of a war of eight years; I have spent sixty years in solitude and there was not a single day of that time but I was disquieted by some passion or other." The passions, therefore, will always molest us; but, as St. Gregory says, "It is a different thing to see these wild beasts prowling around us and to hear their ferocious howl than to have them in our very heart and to suffer them to strangle us."

SELF-CONQUEST

Our heart is a garden in which wild and noxious weeds continue to grow. We must therefore have the hoe of mortification always in hand to re move this noxious growth, otherwise the garden will soon be choked with thorns and thistles. "Overcome yourself," was a favorite saying with St. Ignatius of Loyola. It was always on his lips; again and again he returned to it when addressing his religious brethren. "Overcome your self-love; break your self-will," he would say. The reason why so few of those who practice mental prayer become saints is because so few are intent upon over-coming themselves. Of a hundred persons who practice mental prayer, more than ninety follow their own head. Therefore, the Saint placed greater value on a single act of self-denial than on a whole hour's prayer filled with spiritual consolation. "Of what benefit is it to a fortress," says the Abbot Gilbert, "that the gates are closed if hunger, the enemy within, lays low the occupants?" He wished to say: Of what use is it to mortify the exterior senses and perform many exercises of piety if we harbor some passion in our heart and refuse to give up our own will?

St. Francis Borgia said that prayer introduces the love of God into the heart, but mortification prepares the way by removing everything that might prove an obstacle or hindrance to it. If you wish to fill a vase with water you must first empty out the earth that is in it, otherwise there will be a disagreeable mixture. Regarding the relation of interior mortification to prayer, Father Balthasar Alvarez says: "Prayer without mortification is either a delusion, or will soon come to an end." St. Ignatius tells us that a mortified soul is more intimately united to God in one quarter of an hour than an unmortified person in many hours of prayer. And if the Saint heard it said of anyone that he prayed much, he would add: "That is a sign that he is very mortified."

Many Christians perform acts of devotion, go frequently to Holy Communion, fast and spend much time at prayer, but they neglect to mortify their passions, and harbor feelings of revenge and aversion, and entertain dangerous attachments. They make no effort to bear with contradictions, to give up certain associations and to be subject to obedience and the Will of God. What progress can such hope to make on the way to perfection? They always have the same faults, and according to St. Augustine they are outside the right way. "They run well," says the Saint, "but outside the path." "Watch over thyself," says Thomas à Kempis, "stir up thyself, admonish thyself; and whatsoever becometh of others, neglect not thyself. The greater violence thou offerest to thyself the greater progress thou wilt make." (Im. Bk. 1, 24).

I have not the slightest intention to underestimate the value of vocal prayer, works of penance and other spiritual exercises; but they must be performed with this end in view, to obtain the victory over your passions. All exercises of piety are nothing else but means to arrive at virtue. Consequently at Holy Communion, during meditation, while visiting the Blessed Sacrament and performing other acts of devotion we must always ask God for the grace to be humble, mortified, obedient and conformed to His holy will. To act only from self-love is a fault in every Christian; but it is a greater fault in him who has received a greater measure of grace and is on that account bound to strive more earnestly after perfection. "By means of self-denial," says Lactantius, "God calls men to eternal life; by the gratification of self-love Satan calls them to eternal death."

St. Joseph Calasanctius used to say: "The day spent without mortification is a day lost." In order to teach us the value and necessity of mortification, our Blessed Lord chose to live a mortified life, a life without sensible consolation, a life of sorrow and shame. "Having joy set before him," says the Apostle, "he endured the cross, despising the shame." (Heb. 12:2). "Go through the whole life of Jesus Christ" says St. Bernard, "you will always find Him suffering on the cross." St. Catherine of Siena remarks: "As a mother takes bitter medicine to cure her sick child, so during His life on earth Our Lord drank the chalice of sufferings to cure our poor sick souls."

SELF-WILL

There is no obstacle more harmful in striving after perfection than the gratification of self-will. "If," says St. Bernard, "you can induce men to give up their self-will, there is no Hell for them to fear." According to St. Peter Damian, self-will destroys all the virtues. "As the will of God is the source of all good," says St. Anselm, "the will of man is the origin of all evil." "He," says St. Bernard, "who constitutes himself a master and follows the suggestions of self-will subjects himself to a veritable fool."

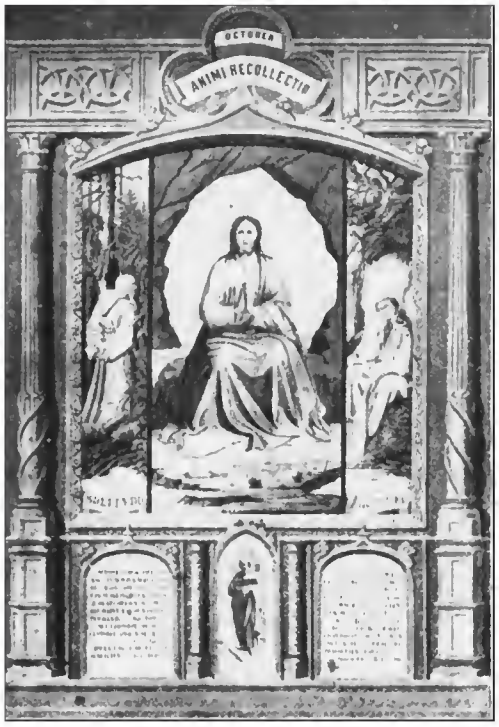
The devil, as St. Augustine remarks, became what he is by self-will. Therefore, in his war against pious souls, his most effective and deadly weapon is their self-will. Cassian relates that the Abbot Achilles, when asked by a disciple what weapons the devil employed in attacking the souls that are consecrated to God, replied: Against the great ones of this world, he uses pride; against men of business, avarice; against the young, incontinence; but against those who are given to piety, his principal weapon is self-will. The Abbot Pastor expresses the same idea in different words: "When we follow our own will, the devil has no need of assailing us, for our self-will then takes the place of the devil, and indeed of the worst that there is." The Holy Ghost admonishes us: "Turn away from thy own will. If thou give to thy soul her desires, she will make thee a joy to thy enemies." (Ecclus. 18:30–31). An action has its greatest value from the obedience through which it is performed. The worst feature of any action is when it is prompted by self-will.

Consequently, says Trithemius, the devil hates nothing more than obedience, for, in the words of St. Teresa, "The devil well knows that on obedienc e the salvation of our souls depends. This is why he tries so hard to prevent it." It was the custom of St. Philip Neri to exhort all his penitents to practice renunciation of their own will, for in this, he used to say, true sanctity consists. "The more you take away from your self-will, the more you add to virtue," says St. Jerome. "In the sight of God," says St. Coletta, "the renunciation of self-will is more meritorious than the sacrifice of all the riches of the world."

"I wish for very little," says St. Francis de Sales, "and for this little I have but feeble desire." He meant to say that in his desires his own will was never considered, but simply the Will of God; so that he was prepared to give up everything as soon as he saw that it was not in conformity with the divine Will. "O what sweetness," says St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi, "there is in the words 'The Will of God.'"

If you, Christian soul, desire to become holy and enjoy uninterrupted peace, strive as often as you can to mortify your will. Do nothing for your own satisfaction, but everything to please God. To this end renounce all vain desires and inordinate inclinations. Worldly-minded people are intent upon following their own will as much as they possibly can; it is the constant aim of the Saints to mortify their will, and they seek opportunities for doing so. St. Andrew Avellino made a vow always to oppose his own will. Make it a practice at least every day to perform a few acts of self-denial.

Let us conclude with the words which Father Torres wrote to a devout person to encourage her in the practice of self-denial: "As God has given you an opportunity to suffer and endure abandonment, endeavor to increase His love in your heart, a love that is as strong as death. May this love detach you from all creatures and from your very self in order that nothing may hinder you in clinging to your Lord with all your thoughts, desires and inclinations. Do all for Him and in union with Him. Before your crucified Saviour make a daily renunciation of all the inclinations and attachments you find within your soul. Protest that you desire no other honor but the shame of Jesus Christ; no other treasure but His love; no other comforts but His Cross; no other object but Himself, your Lord and God."



"Having dismissed the multitude, he went into a mountain alone to pray."—Matt. 14:23.

Chapter 10

RECOLLECTION

"Having dismissed the multitude, he went into a mountain alone to pray."—Matt. 14:23

To preserve recollection of spirit or the constant union of the soul with God, three things are necessary: solitude, silence, and the recollection of the presence of God. It was these three things which the angel of God referred to when, addressing St. Arsenius, he said: "Flee, be silent and rest." In other words: seek solitude, practice silence, and rest in God by keeping the thought of His presence ever before you.

Souls that love God feel a strong attraction for solitude, for they know that God converses familiarly with those who shun the noise and distractions of the world. "O blessed solitude," exclaims St. Jerome, "in which God with loving condescension deals familiarly with chosen souls!" God does not speak in those places where time is squandered in loud laughter and idle talk. "The Lord is not in the earthquake" (3 Kgs. 19:11), but He says, on the contrary, in the words of the prophet Osee: "I will lead her into the wilderness and I will speak to her heart." (Osee 2:14). God speaks to the soul in solitude, and by His words the heart is inflamed with divine love. "My soul melted when my beloved spoke," said the spouse in the Canticle (5:6).

St. Eucherius relates that a person who desired to be perfect once asked a spiritual director what he had to do, and this was the answer he received: "Solitude is the place where man finds God. In solitude, virtue is easily preserved; in intercourse with the world it is easily lost." St. Bernard tells us that he learned more about God and divine things in solitude under the oaks and beeches than from the books and schools of the learned. For this reason the Saints felt an irresistible yearning to leave the noise and bustle of the world and retire into solitude; for this reason the mountains and forests and caves were inexpressibly dear to them. In the prophecy of Isaias we read: "The land that was desolate and impassable shall be glad, and the wilderness shall rejoice, and shall flourish like the lily. It shall bud forth and blossom, and shall rejoice with joy and praise: the glory of Libanus is given to it; the beauty of Carmel, and Saron, they shall see the glory of the Lord, and the beauty of our God." (Is. 35:1). In other words, for interior souls, solitude is the source of abundant delights, for it is there they look upon and contemplate the majesty and beauty of God.

THE THOUGHT OF GOD

In order to remain united to God, we must endeavor to keep alive within us a vivid recollection of Him and of the immeasurable goods He bestows on them that love Him. By constant intercourse with the world, these spiritual truths are apt to become obscured in the maze of earthly thoughts and considerations, and piety vanishes from the heart. Worldly-minded people shun solitude, and it is quite natural for them to do so; for it is in retirement that they are troubled with qualms of conscience. They seek the society and excitement of the world so that the voice of conscience may be drowned in the noise that reigns there. Those, on the contrary, whose conscience is at rest, love solitude and retirement; and when at times they are obliged by circumstances to appear in the noisy world, they are ill at ease and feel altogether out of their element.

It is true, man naturally loves the society of his fellow man; but what can be found more beautiful than the society of God? "His conversation hath no bitterness," says Holy Scripture, "and his company no tediousness, but joy and gladness." (Wis. 8:16). A life of solitude is not a life of sadness; it is rather a foretaste of Heaven; it is the beginning of the life of the blessed whose sole happiness is found in the love and praise of God. This is what St. Jerome said when he fled from the society of Rome and hid himself in the grotto of Bethlehem: "Solitude is my Heaven," he wrote. In solitude the Saints seem to be entirely alone, but this is not so. St. Bernard said: "Never am I less alone than when alone"; for when I am alone I am with God, who gives me greater joy than the society of all creatures could afford. If the Saints seem to be sad, in reality they are not so. Because the world sees them deprived of all earthly joys and pleasures, it regards them as most unhappy; and yet the very opposite is the case.

According to the words of the Apostle, they enjoy a constant and immeasurable peace. (2 Thess. 3:16). Now, in order to find this delightful solitude it is not necessary to withdraw into a desert and live in a cave; you can find it in your home and in the midst of your family. Busy yourself with the outside world only in as far as the duties of your state, obedience, or charity require, and you will be living in that solitude that best accords with your circumstances and that God requires of you. In the midst of the weightiest affairs of state, King David knew how to find a solitude: "Behold I fled away and dwelt in solitude." (Ps. 54:8). St. Philip Neri for some time entertained the desire to retire into a desert, but the Lord commanded him not to leave the city of Rome, and to live there as if he were in a hermitage.

SOLITUDE OF THE SPIRIT

Hitherto we have spoken of the solitude and retirement of the body; there is also a solitude of the soul, and the latter is more necessary than the former, for St. Gregory says: "Of what use is the solitude of the body without the solitude of the spirit?" Of what benefit is it, the Saint wishes to say, to live in a desert if the soul clings to the things of this earth? "A soul that is free from earthly attachments," says St. Peter Chrysologus, "finds solitude even on the streets and in public places." Of what advantage is it to remain quiet at home or in church if our heart is centered on the things of earth, and the noise of these earthly things prevents us from hearing the voice of God? One day the Lord said to St. Teresa: "Oh, how gladly would I speak to many souls! But the world makes so much noise in their hearts that they cannot hear My voice. Would that they might retire a little from the world!" In what does solitude of the heart consist? It consists in banishing from the heart all desires and inclinations that are not for God, and in performing our actions simply with God's good pleasure in view. The Psalmist expresses this truth in the following words: "What have I in heaven, and besides thee what do I desire upon earth? Thou art the God of my heart and the God that is my portion forever." (Ps. 72:25–26). In one word, the solitude of the heart consists in being able to say: "My God, Thee alone do I desire and nothing else."

HOW TO FIND GOD

Many complain that they are unable to find God, but to such St. Teresa replies: "Tear your heart away from everything else; then seek God and you will surely find Him." If a crystal vase is filled with earth, the rays of the sun cannot penetrate it. The light of God cannot illumine a heart that is full of attachments for the joys, the pleasures and the honors of this world. "When thou shalt pray," says Our Lord, "enter into thy chamber, and having shut the door, pray to thy Father in secret." (Matt. 6:6). In other words, to be united to God in prayer, man must enter into his own heart—which St. Augustine says is the chamber mentioned by Our Lord—and shut out all earthly attachments and inclinations. It is not to be supposed that solitude and retirement are synonymous with idleness. Many live in retirement, but it is an inactive and useless retirement of which they shall have to render an account. Devout souls, on the contrary, are like bees that are never tired preparing honey for their cells. No time must be lost, but every moment employed in praying, in reading or in performing the duties of your state of life.

"Idleness is the mother of vice," says the proverb, and the foundation of this proverb is the words of Holy Scripture: "Idleness hath taught much evil." (Ecclus. 33:29). According to St. Bonaventure, the idle man is tortured by a thousand temptations, while the man that is busily occupied has comparatively few. We cannot pray all the time; therefore, we must devote ourselves to work. In the life of St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi it is said that she did more work than four lay sisters together.

It would be an error to suppose that work is injurious to health; on the contrary, it is very conducive to our bodily welfare. Work is moreover an effective remedy against temptations. One day St. Anthony the hermit was assailed by numerous temptations and with a sudden aversion for his solitude; he scarcely knew which way to turn. An angel appeared and led him into the garden; thereupon he picked up a hoe and began to cultivate the ground. Afterwards he prayed for a while, and then returned to work. From this the Saint learned how he was to act, and the subsequent interchange of prayer and labor made his solitude very agreeable, while at the same time it protected him from many temptations.

But even labor need not prevent us from prayer. One day St. Bernard saw a monk praying while doing his work. "Continue in this way, my brother," said he, "and after death you will have no Purgatory." While our hands are occupied with external occupations, our heart can be fixed on God. The good intention we make in performing our labors sanctifies them in the sight of God and even makes of labor a prayer, for prayer has been called "the raising of the mind and heart to God."

SILENCE

Silence is one of the principal means to attain the spirit of prayer and to fit oneself for uninterrupted intercourse with God. It is hard to find a truly pious person who talks much. But they who have the spirit of prayer love silence, which has deservedly been called a protectress of innocence, a shield against temptations and a fruitful source of prayer. Silence promotes recollection and awakens good thoughts in the heart. According to St. Bernard, it forces the soul, as it were, to think of God and heavenly things. For this reason the Saints of God were great lovers of silence.

In the prophecy of Isaias we read: "The work of justice shall be peace, and the service of justice quietness, and security forever." (Is. 32:17). On the one hand, silence preserves us from many sins by removing the occasion of uncharitable talk, rancor and curiosity; on the other it aids us in the attainment of many virtues. For example: What an excellent opportunity we have for the practice of humility by modestly keeping silence while others speak! How well we may practice mortification by refraining from relating something we very much desire to tell! What a splendid chance to exercise meekness by not replying to unjust accusations and insults!

Unrestrained and immoderate talking, on the other hand, has many disastrous consequences. If devotion is preserved by silence, it is certainly lost by much talking. A person may be ever so recollected at meditation; if afterwards he does not restrain his tongue, he will be as distracted as if he had made no meditation at all.

If you open the doors of a furnace, the heat will escape. "Guard against much talking," says St. Dorotheus, "for it puts to flight devout thoughts and recollection in God." It is certain that a person who talks much with creatures, will converse little with God, and on His part God will speak little to such a one, for He says: "I will lead her into the wilderness and will speak to her heart." (Osee 2:14). "In the multitude of words," says the Holy Ghost, "there shall not want sin, but he that refraineth his lips is most wise." (Prov. 10:19). St. James says that "the tongue is a world of iniquity" (James 3:6), for as a learned author remarks, very many sins are occasioned by talking or listening to the talk of others.

Ah, how many souls will be lost on judgment day because they have not watched over their tongue! "The man full of tongue," says the Psalmist, "shall wander about without a guide" (Ps. 139), and go into a thousand and one byways with no hope of returning. "He that keepeth his mouth, keepeth his soul," says the Wise Man, "but he that hath no guard on his speech shall meet with evils." (Prov. 13:3). And St. James writes: "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man." (James 3:2). For he who for the love of God keeps silence will likewise be given to meditation, spiritual reading and prayer before the Blessed Sacrament. It is impossible, says St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi, for one who does not love silence to take pleasure in divine things; before long he will throw himself into the very midst of the pleasures of the world.

THE VALUE OF SILENCE

The virtue of silence does not consist in never speaking, but in keeping silent when there is no good reason to speak. Solomon says: "There is a time to keep silence and a time to speak." (Eccles. 3:7). In reference to these words, St. Gregory of Nyssa remarks: "The time to keep silence is mentioned first, because by silence we learn the art of speaking well." When therefore should a Christian, who desires to become holy, be silent, and when should he speak? He should be silent when it is not necessary to speak and he should speak when necessity or charity requires it. St. Chrysostom gives the following rule: "Speak only when it is more useful to speak than to be silent."

St. Arsenius acknowledges that he often regretted having spoken, but never, having kept silence. St. Ephrem says: "Speak much with God but little with men." If in your presence unbecoming and sinful language is used, leave the company if it is possible to do so. At least cast down your eyes and remain silent, or lead the conversation to some other topic, thus making a silent protest against such unsavory talk. Be not over eager to hear the news; curiosity leads to many faults. The Abbot John used to say: "He who would hold his tongue in check, must close his ears by suppressing the desire to hear the news." And when you do speak, weigh well what you intend to say. "Put your words in the balance," says the Holy Ghost. (Ecclus. 28:29). St. Francis de Sales quaintly remarked: "To avoid faults in speech we must have the lips buttoned together, so that while unbuttoning them we may think of what we are going to say."

THE PRESENCE OF GOD

A powerful aid in preserving recollection is the remembrance of the presence of God. Not only does it conduce to recollection of spirit, but it is also one of the most effective means of advancing in the spiritual life; it helps us to avoid sin; it spurs us on in the practice of virtue, and it brings about an intimate union of the soul with God.

There is no more excellent means of quieting the passions and of resisting the temptation to sin than the thought of the presence of God. St. Thomas says: "If we thought of the presence of God at all times we would never, or very seldom, do anything to displease Him." According to St. Jerome, the recollection of God's presence closes the door on all sins. For, if in the presence of our rulers, our parents or superiors, we do not care to transgress their commands, how could we violate the commandments of God if we remembered that His eyes were upon us?

St. Ambrose tells us that during a sacrifice which Alexander the Great was offering in the temple, a certain page who held a lighted torch allowed it to burn his hand rather than be guilty of irreverence by letting it fall. And the holy Doctor adds: If respect for the presence of the king could overcome the impulse of nature itself in this boy, how much more ought not the thought of the presence of God to prevail with a faithful soul in overcoming temptations and in suffering every imaginable torture rather than offend God before His very eyes.

Men fall into sin because they lose sight of the presence of God. "The cause of all evil," says St. Teresa, "lies in the fact that we do not think of the presence of God, but imagine Him far away from us." A man who loses sight of the presence of God will easily become a prey to sinful and sensual desires and have no strength to resist them.

On the other hand, by the thought of God's ever vigilant eye upon them, the Saints have had strength to resist and overcome all the attacks of the evil one. It was this thought that gave the chaste Susanna courage to spurn the wicked advances of the men who tried to seduce her and even threatened her with death. "It is better for me," she said, "to fall into your hands without doing evil, than to sin in the sight of the Lord." (*Dan.*13:23). The same thought converted a wicked woman who dared to tempt St. Ephrem to sin. The Saint replied that if she wished to sin, she would have to go with him into the public square. "But," she inquired, "how is it possible to commit sin in the presence of so many people?" "And how is it possible," rejoined the Saint, "to commit sin in the presence of God, who sees us everywhere?" At these words the poor sinner broke out into tears, threw herself at his feet and begged the Saint's pardon, beseeching him to lead her into the way of salvation. The Saint secured her admission into a convent, where she led an edifying life and bewailed her sins to her dying day.

Something similar is narrated in the life of the Abbot Paphnutius. A certain sinful woman named Thais thought she might induce him to do wrong by saying that no one but God would be a witness to the deed. The Saint replied in a very earnest tone: "You believe, then, that God really sees you, and nevertheless you wish to sin?" These words made such an impression on her that she began to conceive a horror of her wicked life. She brought all the jewels and clothing she had secured by a life of sin, heaped them together in the public marketplace, and set them on fire. Then she entered a convent and fasted for three years on bread and water, constantly repeating the following words: "Thou who hast created me, have mercy on me." At the end of three years she died a holy death. It was shortly after revealed to a disciple of the Abbot Anthony that the happy penitent had merited a crown of glory among the Saints. Therefore St. Chrysostom says: "If we keep ourselves in the presence of God we shall neither think nor say nor do what is wrong, convinced as we are that God is the witness of all our thoughts and words and actions."

A GREAT INCENTIVE

As far as the practice of the Christian virtues is concerned, the recollection of God's presence affords us a powerful stimulus. How bravely will not soldiers fight in the presence of their general! The thought that his eyes are upon them, and that he will either reward or punish them, animates their courage and strength in a high degree. If we, too, would bear in mind that in all we do God's eyes are upon us, would we not try to do everything well and from the purest of intentions? St. Basil once said: "If you happened to be in the presence of a prince and a peasant, would you not naturally try to make your conduct agreeable to the prince, regardless of what the peasant might like you to do; in a similar manner, he who walks in the presence of God is little concerned about what creatures may think or say; his whole concern is to please God, who sees his every action."

Union of the soul with God is the third happy result of walking constantly in His presence. Love is always strengthened by the presence of the object loved. If this is the case with human beings, in spite of the many defects their presence must needs reveal, how much more so will it be between the soul and God. The more we walk in the presence of God, the better we recognize those beautiful qualities that are calculated to increase and strengthen His love in our hearts.

But in order to remain intimately united to God it is not sufficient to make a morning and evening meditation. St. Chrysostom says: If you remove boiling water from the stove, it will soon cool off. So it is with the human soul; to keep the fire of God's love aglow, the thought of His presence must be constantly before us. Blessed Henry Suso devoted himself to this holy exercise with the greatest zeal and eventually reached a most intimate union with God. Of St. Gertrude, Our Lord once said to St. Mechtildis: "This holy soul that I love so much, walks continually in My presence and is solely intent upon doing My will and performing her actions for My greater glory." David was filled with joy and consolation whenever he thought of God: "I remembered God and was delighted." (Ps. 76:4).

HOW TO WALK IN GOD'S PRESENCE

Now a good means of walking in God's presence is to picture Our Lord as present with us wherever we may happen to be. We may think of Him at times as a little babe in the crib of Bethlehem; as a poor exile on His way to Egypt; as an apprentice in the workshop of Nazareth; a man of sorrows who was condemned a criminal to suffer and die; as scourged and crowned and crucified. St. Teresa praised this practice very much. It is necessary to observe, however, that in this pious exercise we must avoid all straining of the imagination, which is apt to be very fatiguing and might possibly be injurious.

Another and better means of walking in the presence of God is based on the truths of holy faith. It consists in seeing God with the eyes of faith and being thoroughly persuaded that He is present and a witness of our actions. It matters not that we are unable to see Him with our bodily eyes; we cannot see the air around us, and we never doubt for a moment that it exists and that without it we could not possibly live. We do not see God, but faith tells us He is everywhere present. The Apostle St. Paul says: "In him we live and move and are." (Acts 17:28). This is an easy practice and is not tiring to the mind. It is sufficient to make little acts of faith such as the following: My God, I firmly believe that Thou art here present. With this may be joined acts of love, of conformity and of good intention.

Still another beautiful practice is that of seeing God in His creatures. The beauties of nature such as the rising and setting of the sun, a magnificent landscape, a majestic river, a garden of beautiful flowers are so many reflexes of the beauty of the Creator. The thought of a learned or handsome or holy man can lead us to admire the wisdom and beauty and sanctity of God and return Him thanks for permitting His creatures to share in His holy attributes.

The most perfect method, however, of keeping alive the thought of God's presence consists in beholding God within our very selves. It is not necessary to ascend to Heaven to find the Lord God; we need only to recollect ourselves, and we shall find Him within us. He who, at prayer, pictures the Lord at a great distance from him is preparing for himself a source of abundant distractions. St. Teresa says: "I never really knew what it meant to pray well until the Lord Himself taught me the proper way to converse with Him. I entered within my very self and found this practice exceedingly profitable for my soul."

God is within us in a different manner from what He is in other creatures; in us He dwells as the Lord in His temple and in His house. "Know you not," says St. Paul, "that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" (1 Cor. 3:16). And our Divine Saviour Himself has said: "If anyone love me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our abode with him." (John 14:23). Endeavor, therefore, to reanimate your faith in this consoling truth. Humble yourself profoundly before so exalted a Majesty who deigns to dwell within you. Excite yourself to frequent acts of confidence, of oblation and of love towards the boundless goodness of God. St. Catherine of Siena tells us that she built a little cell in the innermost part of her soul; there she entertained herself in loving converse with her God. Once, when speaking of this presence of God in our heart, St. Teresa said: "Those who withdraw into the little heaven of their soul, where He who created them is enthroned, can be certain that in a brief space of time they will have advanced far on the road to perfection."

The happiness of the elect in Heaven consists in seeing and loving God. Our happiness here on earth must likewise consist in loving and seeing Our Lord, not indeed face to face as the Saints and angels do, but by means of the light of faith. Thus we begin in this valley of tears, this earthly exile, the life of the blessed in Heaven, a life of endless joy in the fruition of the vision of God.

"We ought always to pray, and not to faint."—Luke 18:1

Chapter 11

PRAYER

"We ought always to pray and not to faint."—Luke 18:1

According to the teaching of the angelic St. Thomas, the worship of God takes the first place in the order of moral virtues; it is occupied more with God and leads us nearer to Him than the others. For every Christian, therefore, who is striving after perfection it must be a matter of no little concern to make this virtue his own in the highest degree. Now the easiest means of doing so, a means that we can employ at all times and in all places, is found in prayer. Whether it be the prayer of praise or thanksgiving or impenetration or propitiation, we are worshipping God, for every prayer is a humble acknowledgment of the greatness or goodness or fidelity or mercy of God.

QUALITIES OF VOCAL PRAYER

In order, however, that vocal prayer may tend to God's glory and our own salvation, it must be accompanied by attention and devotion. Not only the pronouncing of the words, says St. Gregory, but also the devotion of the heart is required for true prayer; for in the eyes of God, our sentiments are of greater worth than the sound of our voice. If we wish, therefore, to please God we must pray not only with the lips, but also with the heart. How could the Lord, continues the same Saint, hear the prayers of him who knows not what he wants, and does not even wish to be heard? How can you expect the Lord to hear you when you cannot hear yourself? says St. Cyprian. Prayer made with attention and devotion is like sweet-smelling incense that is agreeable to God and wins for us treasures of graces. On the other hand, prayer without recollection is insulting and offensive to God and calls down His wrath on the offender.

If a subject came into the presence of his sovereign, and while petitioning some favor, gazed about and occupied himself with irrelevant matters in such wise that he scarcely knew what he was saying, would not that sovereign be justly offended? For this reason St. Thomas teaches that he who permits his mind to wander about during prayer cannot be excused from sin, because by such conduct he seems to be guilty of contempt of God. The Lord might well say of many Christians what He once said of the Jews: "They honor me with their lips but their heart is far from me." (Matt. 15:8).

It is easy to understand why the devil is so intent upon turning our thoughts towards worldly affairs during prayer. On the one hand, he desires to rob us of the benefit we derive from fervent prayer; and on the other he wishes to make us guilty of disrespect towards God, and therefore, deserving of punishment. But just on this account we ought to strive most earnestly to pray with the greatest attention and devotion. Before entering the church, let us follow the advice of St. John Chrysostom and dismiss all worldly thoughts. The Holy Ghost exhorts us in the following words: "Before prayer prepare thy soul; and be not as a man that tempteth God." (Ecclus. 18:23). Try to bring yourself to realize that you are going to praise God and to beg for His mercy, both for yourself and for others. Remember that the angels are looking upon you and are standing, as Blessed Herman saw them one day, with golden censers, prepared to offer your prayers and holy affections to God as sweet-smelling incense. The angels that St. John the Evangelist saw held golden vials of incense and odors which were the prayers of the Saints. (Apoc. 5:8). In a word, think before prayer that you are going to converse with God and to treat with Him about some very important affairs. Then the Lord will look upon you with a gracious eye and turn an attentive ear to your petitions.

Offer Him beforehand the prayers you intend to say, and beg Him to preserve you from distractions. During prayer, avoid haste. Many people, when praying, seem to be intent only on reaching the end of their prayers, as if it were a torture that must be endured, but during the shortest possible time. Such irreverent haste can hardly be pleasing to God or profitable to ourselves. "Zeal and fervor," says St. Augustine, "gradually cool off and, like a fire, become extinct unless they are kept alive." Endeavor from time to time to renew your attention while at your prayers and devotions.

Attention during prayer must be both interior and exterior. Exterior attention requires that you abstain from everything that is incompatible with interior recollection. For example, it would hardly be proper during prayer to speak with others or to listen to a conversation that is going on, or to gaze about at every distracting object. Interior attention is threefold: it may be directed to the words you utter, or to their sense, or, finally, to God. Attention is directed to the words when you are careful to pronounce them well; it is directed to the sense of the words when you try to understand their meaning in order to unite suitable affections of the heart with the verbal utterance. You direct your attention to God, and this is the best kind of attention, when during prayer your mind is fixed on God with a view to adore Him, to thank Him, to love Him or to ask Him for His graces.

DISTRACTIONS

As long as you strive to preserve the proper attention at prayer, you need not be disturbed by involuntary distractions; provided you do not consent to them, they can do you no harm. The Lord has compassion on our weakness. Distracting thoughts often enter the mind when we have given no occasion for them whatever. Such thoughts cannot spoil the effects of our prayer. According to the illustrious St. Thomas, even favored souls cannot always remain in the heights of contemplation. The weight of human infirmities bows them down and occasions some involuntary distractions. On the other hand, says the same holy Doctor, he cannot be excused from sin nor expect a reward for his prayer who entertains distractions that are voluntary.

As a good will makes our thoughts worthy of spiritual fruit, says St. Bernard, an indolent will makes them unworthy of the Lord; and therefore, instead of a reward, they receive only punishment. The annals of Citeaux contain the following vision which St. Bernard had one day when at prayer with his religious brethren. At the side of each of the brethren, he saw an angel who stood and wrote. Some of the angels wrote with gold, others with silver, still others with ink, and some with water—while a number held the pen in their hand without writing at all. At the same time God enlightened the Saint to know what this meant: the gold denoted that the prayers of these particular brethren were said with the greatest fervor; the silver indicated that the devotion of others left something to be desired; the writing in ink meant that the words were carefully spoken, but that no devotion accompanied them; the water was intended to show that the words were carelessly pronounced, and little or no attention paid to what was said; finally, the angels who wrote nothing at all were standing beside the brethren who knowingly entertained voluntary distractions.

"The devout words which the lips pronounce awaken devotion in the heart," says the Angelic Doctor. For this very reason the Lord has taught us to use vocal prayer in order that the heart within may desire what the lips externally express. In regard to the words of David: "I have cried to the Lord with my voice" (Ps. 141:2), St. Augustine writes: "Many call upon the Lord, but not with their voice; that is to say, they call on the Lord not with the voice of the soul, but with the voice of the body. Call with your thoughts, call with your heart, and then the Lord will certainly hear you."

EJACULATIONS

The easiest means of practicing vocal prayer consists in uttering fervent ejaculations. These pious outpourings of the heart need not be restricted to any particular place or time. They are in order at all times and in all places, at work, at meals, at recreation, at home or away from home. They may take the form of acts of desire, conformity, love, oblation, or self-denial; they may be acts of petition, thanksgiving, humility, confidence and the like. The Saints of God placed greater value on these little prayers than on long devotions because the former are more calculated to keep us in the presence of God.

St. John Chrysostom says that he who frequently utters ejaculations closes the door against Satan and prevents his constant annoyance with wicked thoughts. It is by acts of love, conformity and self-oblation, together with the invocation of the holy names of Jesus and Mary, that we give the greatest pleasure to God. One who loves, thinks constantly of the object of his love. A soul that loves God will therefore always think of Him and seek occasions, by fervent sighs and ejaculations, to manifest her love. Be careful on all occasions, alone as well as in company, to say frequently to your heavenly Bridegroom: "O my God, I desire only Thee and nothing else"; or, "I give myself wholly to Thee; I desire what Thou desirest; do with me according to Thy good pleasure." These few words alone are enough: "My God, I love Thee"; or "My Love, my All!" You may also, without uttering a word, raise your eyes to Heaven or cast a loving glance at the tabernacle or the crucifix. These silent acts are especially to be recommended because they require no effort, they can more frequently be made, and are often attended with greater fervor than other ejaculations. The best acts of love, of course, are those that well up from the depth of the heart at the impulse of the Holy Ghost.

The perfection of divine love consists in the union of our will with the Will of God. Therefore, we may not desire anything but that which God desires. If we do His holy will, no matter to what station in life the Lord may call us, we shall surely arrive at sanctity. It will be profitable, then, to select choice passages from Holy Scripture and to repeat them often in order to foster a union of our will with the Divine. For example, say often with the Apostle: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" (Acts 9:6). In contradictions and afflictions of body and soul, say with our Blessed Redeemer: "My God and my Father, be it done to me as thou wilt." (Matt. 11:26). "Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven." The Lord recommended to St. Catherine of Genoa, every time she said the Our Father, to pay particular attention to these words: "Thy will be done," and to beg for the grace to fulfill the Will of God as perfectly as the Saints in Heaven.

THE HOLY NAMES

Among all ejaculations and prayers, the invocation of the holy names of Jesus, Mary and Joseph should have the first place. All that we love and desire and hope to possess is summed up in these beautiful names. The holy name of Jesus fills us with consolation, for when we invoke Him who bears it we find comfort in all our troubles. The name of Jesus is called by the Holy Ghost "oil poured out." (Cant. 1:2). And rightly so; for as oil serves as light, as food and as medicine, the holy name, according to St. Bernard, is a light; by this most sacred name we are happy children of the true light, i.e., faith in the true Church of God. The holy name is food for the nourishment of our souls, for it strengthens the faithful and affords them peace and consolation in the midst of the misery and persecutions of this world. Finally, the holy name is medicine for him who invokes it. "When the light of this name appears," says St. Bernard, "the clouds are dispersed and the heavens remain serene. When the soul is tossed about by the storms of trouble and sorrow, she needs but to call on the name of Jesus, and the storm will subside and calm will be restored. Should you have the misfortune to fall into sin and grow diffident of pardon, invoke the sacred names, and hope of forgiveness will revive in your soul."

St. Peter tells us that "there is no other name under heaven given to men, whereby we must be saved." (Acts 4:12). Jesus Christ has not saved us only once; He is continually saving us by His merits, when in accordance with His promise, He frees us from the danger of sin as often as we invoke His holy name. "Whatsoever you shall ask the Father in my name, that will I do." (John 14:13). Therefore St. Paul exhorts us not to neglect this great means of salvation, assuring us that "whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord, shall be saved." (Rom. 10:13).

With the holy name of Jesus we must unite the beautiful name of Mary. The name of Mary, like that of Jesus, is a name from Heaven above, and it is so powerful that all Hell trembles when it is pronounced. At the same time, it is a name of exceeding sweetness because it denotes that exalted Queen who is at once the Mother of God and our mother, a mother of mercy, a mother of beautiful love.

As breath is a sign of life, says St. Germanus, the frequent invocation of the name of Mary is a sign that the grace of God is within us or will very soon be there. The holy name of Mary has particular efficacy in overcoming temptations against holy purity. "Happy is he," says St. Bonaventure, "who loves thy holy name, O Mary! Thy name is a glorious and wonderful name; they who invoke thy powerful name at the hour of death have nothing to fear from the assaults of Hell."

Finally, it has always been the laudable practice of devout Christians to unite with the names of Our Lord and His holy Mother the beautiful name of St. Joseph. If the King of Heaven and earth conferred on him the honor of being the foster father of His Beloved Son and the protector of the holy and Immaculate Mother, surely it behooves us to honor him and invoke his powerful intercession. St. Teresa says that she never remembers to have sought his aid in vain. "Jesus, Mary and Joseph, I give you my heart and my soul; Jesus, Mary and Joseph, assist me in my last agony; Jesus, Mary and Joseph, may I breathe forth my soul in peace with you."

MENTAL PRAYER OR MEDITATION

Our Divine Redeemer had no need, as St. Ambrose says, to retire to a lonely place to pray; for as His blessed soul was constantly in the presence of His heavenly Father, in every place and in all circumstances He thought of Him and continually interceded for us. Nevertheless, as St. Matthew relates, "Having dismissed the multitude he went into a mountain alone to pray. And when it was evening he was there alone." (Matt. 14:23). He did this to teach us the necessity of interior prayer or meditation.

The eternal truths are spiritual things; they cannot be seen with the bodily eyes, but only with the eyes of the soul, that is to say, by reflection and meditation. It is for want of reflection that, as the Holy Ghost says, "all the land is made desolate because there is none that considereth in the heart." (Jer. 12:11). Hence the exhortation of Our Lord: "Let your loins be girt and lamps burning in your hands." (Luke 12:35). These lamps, says St.

Bonaventure, are devout meditations, for during interior prayer the Lord speaks to us and enlightens us. "Thy word is a lamp to my feet and a light to my paths." (Ps. 118:105).

St. Bernard compares mental prayer to a mirror, and the comparison is very apt; for if you happen to have a speck of dirt on the face and you come before a looking glass, you see the dirt at once and remove it. Had you not looked in the mirror, you would not have thought of the dirt nor washed it away. So it is with mental prayer: While at meditation we are standing, as it were, before a mirror of the soul. It is then we recognize our faults and the danger we are in, and accordingly we take measures to rid ourselves of the faults and to escape from the danger that threatens us. St. Teresa once wrote to the Bishop of Osma: "Although we appear to have no imperfections, we discover that we have very many when God opens the eyes of the soul, as He does in meditation." "He," says St. Bernard, "who does not meditate will scarcely ever perceive his faults, and as a result will have no horror of them."

Without meditation or mental prayer we are lacking in strength to resist the assaults of the enemies of our soul and to practice the Christian virtues. Meditation affects the soul as fire does iron. If iron is cold, it is very hard and cannot be worked without great difficulty. But put it in the fire, and at once it softens and easily yields to the efforts of the blacksmith. In order to observe the commandments and counsels of God, we have need of a pliable, that is to say, a docile heart, a heart that will easily receive the impressions of heavenly inspirations and as readily respond. It was for such a heart that Solomon prayed: "Give to thy servant, O Lord, an understanding heart, to discern between good and evil. And the word was pleasing to the Lord that Solomon had asked such a thing." (3 Kgs. 3:9–10).

NECESSITY OF MENTAL PRAYER

Without mental prayer we shall never practice the prayer of petition as we ought, and this prayer of petition is absolutely necessary for eternal salvation. "Pray without ceasing," says the Apostle. (1 Thess. 5:17). We are all poor beggars, as David once said of himself: "I am a beggar and poor." (Ps. 39:18). Now, the only hope of the poor is to ask alms from the rich. In our spiritual poverty our only recourse is to beg God, by prayer, for the graces of which we stand in need. St. John Chrysostom says: "Without prayer it is absolutely impossible to lead a virtuous life." Whence the universal depravity of morals, asks the learned Bishop Abelly, if not from the neglect of prayer? As we have seen before, the absence of meditation makes us blind to our own condition and needs; hence we are led to neglect the prayer of petition. A great servant of God once said: "Meditation and sin cannot exist together"; and experience teaches that those who are zealous in the practice of meditation rarely, if ever, fall into God's displeasure. A soul that loves meditation, says the Royal Psalmist, is like a tree that is planted by the running waters; it bringeth forth fruit in due season, and all its actions are meritorious before God. (Ps. 1:2–3).

THE METHOD OF ST. ALPHONSUS

For the exercise of mental prayer it is well to follow some approved method. The method of St. Alphonsus is a very commendable one because it is both simple and practical. He divides the meditation into three parts: the preparation, the consideration and the conclusion. With regard to the preparation he says: Endeavor to dispose both soul and body for this important exercise. Dismiss all distracting thoughts and say what St. Bernard said on entering a church: "Remain here, all you earthly and distracting thoughts. I may have leisure for you after meditation." Recite briefly an act of faith in the presence of God, together with profound adoration of His infinite Majesty. Humbly ask pardon for your past offenses, and beg for light and grace to make your meditation well. Recommend yourself to the Blessed Virgin, St. Joseph, your Guardian Angel and your holy patrons. These acts must be very fervent but brief, so as to proceed at once with the consideration. For the meditation proper it is good to use a book, at least in the beginning, so as to hold the attention on the subject for consideration. Pause from time to time when you are particularly impressed in order that, like the bee, you may extract the honey from the flower, or like the dove, take a drink and then look up to Heaven before taking another.

The importance of mental prayer, however, consists not so much in the consideration as in the affections, petitions, and resolutions which must accompany it. The consideration may be likened to a needle, and the affections, petitions and resolutions are the thread of gold that follows it. The affections will consist of short and fervent acts of humility, confidence and gratitude; frequently repeat aspirations of love and contrition, for these are the links of the golden chain that unites the soul to God. One act of perfect love is sufficient to obtain the pardon of all your sins. "Charity covereth a multitude of sins," says St. Peter (1 Ptr. 4:8). St. Thomas teaches that every act of love merits a new degree of glory. Perhaps the most important part of the meditation is the petitions which you address to God. The Lord loves to be importuned; and, therefore, never weary asking Him for light and grace, for conformity to His holy Will and perseverance in good; above all things, beg Him earnestly to grant you His holy love. With love, says St. Francis de Sales, we receive all other graces.

Before the Venerable Father Segneri studied theology, he contented himself while at meditation with considerations and affections; but finally, says he himself, "God opened my eyes and from that time on I devoted myself to petitions, and if there is aught of good in me now I owe it to this beautiful custom." Follow the example of this holy man and ask in the name of Jesus Christ for all the graces you need, for God has promised to hear and answer your prayers: "Amen, amen, I say to you: if you ask the Father anything in my name he will give it you." (John 16:23). At the end of meditation proper it is very useful to make a special resolution to avoid some particular fault, or to be more zealous in the practice of a particular virtue. This resolution must be repeated until the desired end is attained. Outside the time of meditation we must endeavor to profit by the opportunities afforded to carry out our resolutions.

The conclusion of the meditation consists in the following acts: First, thank God for the enlightenment you have received; secondly, express your determination to carry out the resolutions you have made; thirdly, ask the heavenly Father, for the love of Jesus and Mary, to grant you the grace to be faithful to your resolutions.

It is a beautiful custom, at the end of meditation, to recommend to God the souls in Purgatory and all poor sinners. "Nothing," says St. John Chrysostom, "proves our love for Jesus Christ better than the zeal we have to pray for our brethren." St. Francis de Sales counsels us to gather a little spiritual nosegay from the meditation and to enjoy its perfume through the day. He wishes to say that we should select one or two thoughts that have impressed us in the morning meditation, and recall them frequently during the day to reanimate our fervor and to preserve the fruit of the morning meditation.

If you are annoyed by distractions during mental prayer, recall to mind the words of St. Francis de Sales: "If you are occupied during the whole meditation in fighting distractions and temptations you will have made a good meditation. The Lord looks to the good intention we have and the effort we make, and these He rewards." In another place he says: "In prayer we must not seek the delights of God, but the God of delights." "Ask and it shall be given you; seek and you shall find; knock and it shall be opened to you." (Matt. 7:7). "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." (1 Kgs. 3:9).

"If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me."—Matt. 16:24.

Chapter 12

SELF-DENIAL AND LOVE OF THE CROSS

"If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me."—Matt. 16:24

The love which our Divine Master Jesus entertained for the cross was so great that He embraced it from the first moment of His Incarnation. The will of His heavenly Father had decreed that His life on earth should be the way of the cross; accordingly, He began His sorrowful journey to Calvary's Mount the very moment that "the Word was made flesh and dwelt amongst us." If we desire to be made conformable to the image of the Word Incarnate, we must needs love God's will and carry our cross with patience and resignation. The cross is the nuptial couch to which our Saviour invites us. "He that taketh not up his cross and followeth me is not worthy of me." (Matt. 10:38). Hand in hand with the love of the cross is the virtue of self-denial, for he who is attached to the comforts of life or to himself lacks courage to walk in the bloodstained footsteps of the suffering Saviour.

"Patience hath a perfect work," says the Apostle (James 1:4), for by patience in bearing the crosses of life we make a perfect sacrifice to God. With resignation to His holy will we embrace the cross which He sends us and esteem it more highly even than one of our own choosing.

Patience, says the Wise Man, is to be preferred to the courage of the hero: "The patient man is better than the valiant: and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh cities." (Prov. 16:32). Many a man will display great courage in undertaking and bringing to completion some pious work; but he may not have patience enough to bear with the little annoyances and contradictions he encounters. For such a one it were better to be steadfast in patient suffering than courageous in great undertakings. We are in this world to gain merit; therefore this earth is not a place of rest, but of work and suffering. Merits are not gained by repose and rest, but by labor and constant effort. All men must suffer, the just as well as the sinner. One is lacking in this, another is deprived of that. This man is noble but not wealthy; that man is rich but has no claim to nobility, while still another is both noble and rich, but he has lost his health. In a word we all have something to endure, be we high or low, rich or poor, learned or unlearned, sinners or saints.

PEACE OF HEART

Accordingly, we can enjoy true peace of heart only when we carry our cross with patience and resignation. The Holy Ghost warns us not to act as irrational animals which become enraged when they cannot gratify their desires: "Do not become like the horse and the mule who have no understanding." (Ps. 31:9). Of what use is it to be impatient in trouble and contradictions? We only increase our burden thereby. The two thieves who were crucified with our Blessed Redeemer were suffering similar torments; but the good thief was saved because he bore them with patience, while the bad thief was eternally lost because he suffered impatiently and rebelled. The same trial, says St. Augustine, leads the good to glory because they suffer with patience and resignation, but the wicked to eternal destruction from a want of patience and conformity to God's will.

When we try to avoid a cross that the Lord has sent us, we often meet with another, and a much heavier one. "They that fear the hoary frost," says Job, "the snow shall fall upon them." (6:16). Only take this cross from me, you say; any other I am willing to bear. Ah yes, but that other cross may be heavier still and you have little or no merit for carrying it. Therefore embrace the cross that God sends you, no matter what it may be; it is lighter and more meritorious than any other, for you are doing God's will and not your own.

St. Augustine says the whole life of a Christian must be one perpetual cross. This is especially true of those who are striving after perfection. St. Gregory Nazianzen says that "with great and generous souls riches consist in poverty, honor in contempt, and joy in the absence of all earthly pleasures." When asked who it is that really strives after perfection, St. John Climacus replied: "He who constantly does violence to himself." And when will the necessity of doing violence to oneself cease? Only when life is at an end, for St. Prosper says: "The struggle will be over only when we are certain of the victory, that is, when we have entered the Kingdom of Heaven."

VALUE OF SUFFERING

If you are forced to acknowledge, dear Christian reader, that you have offended your God, and you wish at the same time to sanctify your immortal soul, you should rejoice when God sends you suffering. "Sin," says St. John Chrysostom, "is an ulcer of the soul; if suffering does not come to remove the corrupted matter the soul will be lost." When God gives you something to suffer, says St. Augustine, He acts as a physician, and the suffering He sends is not a punishment but a remedy. "Whom the Lord loveth, he chastiseth, and he scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." (Heb. 12:6). "If everything goes well," says St. Augustine, "acknowledge the Father who caresses you; if you have suffering to endure, acknowledge the Father who chastises you." "Hasten, O Lord," cries St. Bonaventure, "hasten and wound Thy servants with the wounds of love and salvation, that we may not succumb to the wounds of anger and eternal death." "God is never more angry," says St. Bernard, "than when He is not angry with the sinner and fails to punish him."

But suffering is not only an excellent means of atoning for past sins, it is also an abundant source of merit. "When there is question of winning Heaven," says St. Joseph Calasanctius, "all pains must be regarded as trifling and insignificant." The Apostle had said long before: "For I reckon that the sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory to come that shall be revealed in us." (Rom. 8:18). It would be little if we had to endure all the sufferings of this world for one moment of the joys of Heaven. How much more, therefore, ought we to bear patiently every cross that God sends us when we know that the brief suffering of this life will be followed by the eternal happiness of the next. "For that which is at present momentary and light of our tribulation worketh for us above measure exceedingly an eternal weight of glory." (2 Cor. 4:17). The greater our merits here, the greater our glory hereafter. Hence St. James says: "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he hath been proved, he shall receive the crown of life which God hath promised to them that love him." (James 1:12).

Animated with this thought St. Agapitus, a youth of fifteen years, displayed most admirable heroism while suffering martyrdom. When the tyrant had burning coals placed on his head, the youthful martyr cried out: "It matters very little indeed that this head is burned with coals on earth, as long as it will be crowned with glory in Heaven." It was this same thought that prompted holy Job to say: "If we have received good things at the hand of the Lord, why should we not receive evil?" (Job 2:10). The good that I expect, says St. Francis de Sales, is so exceeding great that every pain becomes for me a pleasure: "In view of all I hope to gain, my labors here have naught of pain."

A PROOF OF LOVE

Suffering is the touchstone of love. There are many, says the Wise Man, who are friends in the time of prosperity—but with the advent of adversity they disappear. "For there is a friend for his own occasion, and he will not abide in the day of thy trouble." (Ecclus. 6:8). But the surest proof of genuine love is shown by the man who voluntarily suffers for his friend. Consequently, we offer a most agreeable sacrifice to God when we willingly embrace the cross that He sends. "Love is patient," says St. Paul, "it beareth all things." (1 Cor. 13:4, 7). It patiently carries the external as well as the internal cross: for example, the loss of health, of fortune, of honor, of relatives and friends; anguish, temptations, pains and spiritual aridity. By patience virtue is tried. On this account such stress is laid, in the lives of the Saints, on their patience in contradictions. The devil tempts us to try our patience. "Gold and silver are tried in the fire, but acceptable men in the furnace of humiliation." (Ecclus. 2:5). "Because thou wast acceptable to God, it was necessary that temptation should prove thee." (Tob. 12:13). When the Lord gives one an occasion of suffering much, says St. John Chrysostom, He shows a greater love for such a one than if He gave him the power to raise the dead to life; for when we work miracles we are debtors to God, but when we suffer patiently, God becomes so to say a debtor to us.

How is it possible to look at a crucifix and see a God who died in an ocean of sufferings and contempt, without bearing patiently for love of Him all the sufferings that God may choose to send us? St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi once said: "Every pain, howsoever great, becomes sweet when we contemplate Jesus on the Cross." When the learned Justus Lipsius was enduring great suffering, one of the bystanders encouraged him to be patient by recalling the example of some pagan philosophers. The sufferer raised his eyes to the crucifix and said: "Here is true patience." He wished to say: the example of a God who suffered so much for love of us is sufficient incentive for us to suffer all pains for love of Him. "He who loves the Crucified," says St. Bernard, "loves suffering and contempt." When St. Eleazar was asked by his saintly spouse Delphina how he could bear so many insults from boorish men, without resentment, he replied: "You must not imagine that I am not sensitive to these insults; I feel them very keenly; but I turn to Jesus Crucified and continue to gaze upon Him until my mind is quiet, and a balm is laid upon my wounded feelings."

Whether we will it or no, we must all bear the sufferings that God's Providence has allotted to us. It is to our advantage, therefore, to suffer with merit, and that means to suffer with patience. Pray God earnestly for this precious gift, the grace to suffer the trials and tribulations of life with patience and conformity to His holy will. "To him who overcometh I will give a hidden manna." (Apoc. 2:17). Patience is to be exercised above all during sickness. Character and disposition are revealed by this infallible touchstone and shown to be genuine gold or sham.

Many people are cheerful, patient and devout as long as they enjoy good health; but as soon as they are visited by sickness, they commit innumerable faults; they grow impatient toward everyone around them and find fault with the care or want of care that is shown them; they complain of every little pain they suffer and allow their imagination to increase their troubles. "If we only knew what a treasure we possess in hidden sufferings," said St. Vincent de Paul, "we would accept them as gladly as the greatest benefits." St. Vincent himself suffered without complaint the most violent pains, which often left him without rest both day and night; and yet he was cheerful, as though he had nothing whatever to endure. Oh, how edifying it is at the time of suffering to preserve a cheerful peace and resignation!

Whenever St. Francis de Sales was ill, he simply stated the matter to the physician and then obeyed him exactly, taking the medicines prescribed, however repugnant they might be. After this he remained perfectly quiet and never complained of what he had to suffer. "Learn to suffer for the love of God," says St. Teresa, "and don't be anxious for everyone to find it out." By a special grace of God the saintly Father Louis de Ponte was permitted one Good Friday to suffer a special pain in every part of his body. This he told to one of his friends, but he had scarcely done so when he regretted it to such an extent that he made a vow never after to tell others what he had to suffer. I say it was "by a special grace" that he suffered, for the Saints accept sufferings and tribulations as manifestations of God's favor.

A very devout woman lay grievously sick and was tortured with violent pains; they placed a crucifix in her hands and told her to pray to the Lord to free her from suffering. "How can you counsel me," she said, "to come down from the cross of suffering while I hold my Crucified Saviour in my hands? I will gladly suffer for love of Him who endured greater torments for love of me."

This is what Our Lord said one day to St. Teresa when she was sick and suffered great pain. He appeared to her covered with wounds and spoke to her as follows: "Look at these wounds, My daughter; your pains will never be as great as Mine." This led the Saint ever afterward to say: "When I think of Our Lord, who was so innocent and yet suffered so much, I cannot see how I can complain of my ailments." "Many," says Salvian, "would never have reached sanctity had they enjoyed good health." And it seems very true, for if you read the lives of the Saints you will be astonished at the sufferings so many of them had to endure. These sufferings were stepping-stones to great holiness and intimate union with God.

I complain, not because I am sick, you will say, but because I cannot go to church, and receive Holy Communion and pray; moreover I am a burden to others. But tell me, why do you wish to go to church and to receive Holy Communion? Is it not to please God? Very well, but now if it is more pleasing to God that you remain away from church and Holy Communion, and suffer instead on a bed of pain, what reason have you to be disturbed? Listen to what Venerable John of Avila wrote one day to a priest who was very ill: "My friend, do not think now of what you would do if you were well, but be content to remain sick as long as it pleases God. If you are seeking the will of God, what matters it whether you are sick or well?" St. Francis de Sales maintained that we can serve God better by suffering than by laboring.

TO SUFFER IS TO PRAY

You say you cannot pray? Why not? I will grant that you cannot meditate for any length of time, but what prevents you from turning your eyes to Jesus Crucified and offering Him the sufferings you must endure. The best prayer you can say is to resign yourself to the will of God in the midst of your sufferings, uniting your pains to the pains of Jesus Christ and offering them as a sacrifice to God. It was thus St. Vincent de Paul acted when he was mortally ill. He placed himself in the presence of God, and from time to time made an act of love, of confidence, of gratitude or of resignation, especially when his pains became very violent. St. Francis de Sales said: "Sufferings in themselves are very abhorrent to our inclinations; but when considered with reference to the will of God they cause us joy and pleasure." And finally you say you are a burden to others. It must be evident to all that your helpless condition is not of your own choosing, but is simply in accordance with the will of God. Therefore the complaints you make cannot proceed from the love of God, but are the expressions of self-love; we would like to serve the Lord, but in our own way, and not as He desires.

Father Balthasar Alvarez was one day permitted to see the glory that God had prepared for a religious as the reward of her patient endurance of suffering, and he asserted that this holy person had gained more merit in eight months of suffering than other zealous religious had gained in several years. While St. Ludwina was suffering great pain she entertained the desire to die a martyr's death. One day when she experienced a particular yearning for this grace, she saw a brilliant but unfinished crown and she was given to understand that this crown was intended for her. Desiring the crown to be perfectly finished, she prayed God to increase her sufferings. The Lord heard her prayer. Some brutal soldiers entered and, after insulting her with the vilest epithets, cruelly beat her. An angel at once appeared with the beautiful crown completed and said that her last sufferings added to the crown the jewels which had been wanting. When the angel had finished speaking, the virgin expired.

Another opportunity is afforded us for the practice of patience by the persecutions to which we are sometimes exposed. "I have done nothing to deserve these insults and this persecution," you may say; "why should I have to endure them?" But do you remember what Our Lord said to St. Peter the Martyr when the Saint complained that he was imprisoned unjustly? "O Lord, what evil have I done that I should suffer this persecution?" Our Saviour made answer: "And what evil have I done that I should be nailed to this Cross?"

A SOURCE OF MERIT

In the writings of St. Teresa we find these remarkable words: "He who strives after perfection must be careful never to say: someone has done me a wrong. If you are willing to carry no other cross but that which you deserve, you have no claim to perfection." When St. Philip Neri lived near the church of St. Jerome in Rome, he suffered continually from the insults and annoyances of the evil-minded men of the neighborhood, and this for a period of 30 years. When finally he was urged by his spiritual sons to leave his old abode and live in a new monastery recently founded, he refused to do so, and could be prevailed upon only by an express command of the Holy Father.

The Saints have all had to suffer persecution of some kind. St. Basil was accused of heresy before Pope Damasus. St. Cyril of Alexandria was condemned by a council of 40 bishops and deprived of this episcopal see. St. Athanasius was accused of witchcraft, and St. Chrysostom of immorality. When more than 100 years old, St. Romuald was charged with a heinous crime, and they said he deserved to be burnt alive. And so on, from the first to the last in the calendar of the Saints of God. Indeed it could not be otherwise, for as the Apostle says: "All they that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." (2 Tim. 3:12).

If therefore, says St. Augustine, you do not care to suffer persecution, there is reason to fear that you have not begun to follow Jesus Christ. Who was holier than Our Lord and God? And yet He was persecuted to such an extent that He died on a cruel cross, the victim of calumny and injustice. How can we complain when we see our Master and Model before us! "If you do not believe my words, believe my works." (John 10:38). "They have dug my hands and feet; they have numbered all my bones." (Ps. 21:17–18).

SPIRITUAL ARIDITY

There is a great need of patience in bearing the cross of spiritual abandonment, for it is one of the hardest trials that a soul who loves God can endure. When a devout person is enjoying spiritual consolations, all manner of external trials are unable to disturb him. On the contrary, they only seem to increase the joy of his heart as they afford him an opportunity to offer his sufferings to the Lord and thus become more closely united to Him. But to experience no devotion, no zeal, no holy desires, but on the contrary only coldness and dryness at prayer and at Holy Communion is the most bitter pain that a soul that loves God can endure. St. Teresa says that such a soul gives the surest proof of her love when, without any apparent incentive, and even in spite of interior repugnance and agony of soul, she continues patiently on her way. "By aridity of spirit and temptations," says the Saint, "the Lord proves those whom He loves." When St. Angela of Foligno was once suffering from this spiritual dryness, she complained to the Lord that He had abandoned her. "No, My daughter," replied the Lord, "I love you now more than before, and regard you as more closely united to Me than ever."

It is a delusion, says St. Francis de Sales, to judge piety according to the measure of consolations that we experience in the service of God. True piety, he continues, consists in the determined will to do all that is pleasing to God. By means of spiritual aridity, God unites Himself intimately with the souls He loves in an especial manner. What hinders us from being truly united to God is attachment to our inordinate inclinations. When God, therefore, desires to lead a soul to His perfect love, He endeavors first to free her from all attachment to created things. To this end He deprives her little by little of earthly goods such as riches, honors, relatives, bodily health and so forth. Then follow contradictions and humiliations of every sort. These are so many means that the Lord makes use of to divest the soul of all attachments to creatures and to self.

In the beginning of the soul's conversion, God often gives her a flood of consolations. In consequence of this, the soul is gradually weaned from attachment to creatures and gives herself to God; but not as yet in a perfect manner, for she acts more for the sake of the consolations of God than for the God of consolations, as St. Francis de Sales so beautifully says. It is a common fault of our fallen nature that in everything we do, we seek our own gratification. The love of God and Christian perfection do not consist in sweet feelings and sensible consolations, but in overcoming our self-love and in fulfilling the Will of God. In the lives of God's greatest servants and saints we see the milk of consolations give place to the more substantial food of afflictions; and this it is that enables them to bear the burden of the cross on their journey to Calvary's Mount. To a very holy person who suffered from spiritual aridity St. John of the Cross wrote as follows: "Never were you in a better condition than now, because you were never so humbled and so detached from the world, and never did you recognize your misery so well, as at this very moment. Never were you so indifferent about yourself and never did you seek yourself less."

Oh, how dear to the heart of God are acts of confidence and resignation in the midst of the darkness of spiritual aridity. Let us, therefore, place our unbounded trust in God, who, as St. Teresa says, loves us more than we love ourselves.

THE HOUR OF DEATH

When the hour of death is at hand it is above all necessary to be resigned to the Will of God. Our life on earth is a continued storm in which we are in constant danger of perishing. St. Aloysius Gonzaga, who died in the bloom of youth, accepted death with joy, saying: "I am now, I hope, in the grace of God; I do not know what may happen to me later; therefore I gladly accept death at this moment, if it pleases God to call me out of this life."

But then you will say: Aloysius was a saint, and I am a sinner. Listen to what the Venerable John of Avila says: "If our soul is only in a moderately good condition, we should desire death, in order to escape the danger of losing the grace of God." But you may say: I have not yet gained any merit for my soul; I would like to live a little longer and do some good before I die. Who gives you the assurance that if your life is prolonged you will not be even worse than before, and perhaps be eternally lost? "Why do you desire to live," says St. Bernard, "when the longer we live, the more we sin?" If we truly love God we must have a desire to see Him face to face in Heaven and love Him with an endless, unchangeable love. But death must open the gates to eternal life, and therefore St. Augustine, aglow with love for his God, cried out: "O Lord, permit me to die that I may come to see Thee face to face and enjoy Thee forever 'where eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man what things God hath prepared for them that love him.'" (1 Cor. 2:9).

WE OUGHT TO CONFORM TO THE DESIGNS OF GOD

It is evident that our eternal salvation depends principally upon the choice of our state of life. Father Granada calls this choice the chief wheel of our whole life. Hence, as when in a clock the chief wheel is deranged the whole clock is also deranged, so, in the order of our salvation, if we make a mistake as to the state to which we are called, our whole life, as St. Gregory says, will be an error.

If, then, in the choice of a state of life we wish to secure our eternal salvation, we must embrace that to which God calls us, in which alone God prepares for us the efficacious means necessary to our salvation. For, as St. Cyprian says: "The grace of the Holy Ghost is according to the order of God, and not according to our own will"; and therefore St. Paul writes: "Every one hath his proper gift from God" (1 Corinthians 7:7). That is, as Cornelius à Lapide explains it, God gives to every one his vocation, and chooses the state in which He wishes him to be saved. This is the order of predestination described by the same apostle: "Whom he predestinated, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified, . . . and them he also glorified" (Romans 8:30).

We must remark that in the world this doctrine of vocation is not much studied by some persons. They think it to be all the same, whether they live in the state to which God calls them, or in that which they choose of their own inclination, and therefore so many live a bad life and damn themselves.

But it is certain that this is the principal point with regard to the acquisition of eternal life. He who disturbs this order and breaks this chain of salvation will not be saved. With all his labors and with all the good he may do, St. Augustine will tell him: "Thou runnest well, but out of the way;" that is, out of the way in which God has called you to walk for attaining to salvation. The Lord does not accept the sacrifices offered up to him from our own inclination: "But to Cain and his offerings he had no respect" (Genesis 4:5). He even threatens with great chastisements those who, when he calls them, turn their backs on him in order to follow the whims of their own caprice. "Woe to you, apostate children," he says through Isaias, "that you would take counsel and not of me, and would begin a web and not by my spirit" (Isaias 30:1).

THE VOCATION TO THE RELIGIOUS STATE

SECTION 1

MISERY BY NOT CORRESPONDING TO IT

The divine call to a more perfect life is undoubtedly a special grace and a very great one, which God does not give to all; hence He has much reason to be indignant against those who despise it. How greatly would not a prince think himself offended, if he should call one of his vassals to serve him near his person, and this vassal should refuse to obey the call! And should God not resent such conduct? Oh, He resents it but too much, and threatens such persons by saying, "Woe to him that gainsayeth his maker" (Isaias 45:9). The word woe in Scripture signifies eternal damnation. The chastisement of the disobedient will begin even in this life, in which he will always be unquiet; for says Job: "Who bath resisted him and hath had peace?" (Job 9:4.) He will, therefore, be deprived of those abundant and efficacious helps necessary to lead a good life. For which reason Habert, a divine, writes: "He will with great difficulty be able to work out his salvation." He will with great difficulty save himself, for, being like a member out of its proper place, he will with great difficulty be able to live well.

"He will be," adds the learned author, "in the body of the Church like a limb of the human body out of its place, which may be able to perform its functions, but only with difficulty and in an awkward manner." Whence he concludes: "And though, absolutely speaking, he may be saved, he will with difficulty enter upon and advance in the road, and use the means of salvation." The same thing is said by St. Bernard and St. Leo, St. Gregory, writing to the emperor Maurice, who by an edict had forbidden soldiers to become religious, says that this was an unjust law, which shut the gates of paradise to many, because many would save themselves in religion who would otherwise perish in the world.

Remarkable is the case related by Father Lancicius. There was in the Roman college a youth of great talents. Whilst he was making the spiritual exercises, he asked his confessor whether it was a sin not to correspond with the vocation to the religious life. The confessor answered that in itself it was no grievous sin, because this is a thing of counsel and not of precept, but that one would expose one's salvation to great danger, as it had happened to many who for this reason were finally damned. He did not obey the call. He went to study at Macerata, where he soon began to omit prayer and holy Communion, and finally gave himself up to a bad life. Soon after, coming one night from the house of a wicked woman, he was mortally wounded by a rival; certain priests ran to his assistance, but he expired before they arrived, and, moreover, in front of the college. By this circumstance God wished to show that this chastisement came upon him for having neglected his vocation.

Remarkable also is the vision had by a novice, who, as Father Pinamonti relates in his treatise of the victorious vocation, had resolved on leaving his Order. He saw Christ, on a throne, in wrath ordering his name to be blotted out of the book of life, by which vision he was so terrified that he persevered in his vocation.

How many other similar examples are there not to be found in books! And how many unhappy youths shall we not see damned on the day of judgment for not having followed their vocation! These are rebels to the divine light, as the Holy Ghost says: "They have been rebellious to the light, they have not known his ways" (Job 24:13); and they will be justly punished by losing the light; and because they would not walk in the way shown them by the Lord, they shall walk without light in that chosen by their own caprice, and perish. In Proverbs the Lord expresses himself with still greater force; each word should be well weighed: "Behold, I will utter my spirit to you" (Proverbs 1:23). Behold the vocation; but because they fail to follow it, God adds: "Because I called and you refused . . . you have despised all my counsel. . . . I also will laugh in your destruction, and will mock, when that shall come to you, which you feared." And this signifies that God will not hear the prayers of him who has neglected to obey his voice. St. Augustine says: "They who have despised the will of God which invited them, shall feel the will of God, when it becomes its own avenger."

WE MUST OBEY THE VOICE OF GOD WITHOUT DELAY

Whenever God calls any one to a more perfect state, he who does not wish to expose his eternal salvation to great danger must then obey, and obey promptly. Otherwise he will hear from Jesus Christ the reproach which he made to that young man who, when invited to follow him, said: "I will follow thee, Lord, but let me first take my leave of them that are at my house" (Luke 9:61). And Jesus replied to him that he was not fit for paradise: "No man putting his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God."

The lights that God gives are transient, not permanent gifts. Hence St. Thomas of Aquinas says that the vocation of God to a more perfect life ought to be followed as promptly as possible. The Angelic Doctor proposes in his Summa the question whether it be praiseworthy to enter religion without having asked the counsel of many and without long deliberation. He answers in the affirmative, saying that counsel and deliberation are necessary in doubtful things, but not in this matter, which is certainly good, because Jesus Christ has counseled it in the Gospel, since the religious state comprehends most of the counsels of Jesus Christ.

How singular a thing it is, when there is question of entering religion to lead a life more perfect and more free from the dangers of the world, for men of the world to say that it is necessary to deliberate a long time before putting such resolutions in execution, in order to ascertain whether the vocation comes from God or from the devil! But they do not talk thus when any one is to accept of a place in the magistracy, of a bishopric, etc., where there are so many dangers of losing the soul. Then they do not say that many proofs are required whether there be a true vocation from God.

The saints, however, do not talk thus, St. Thomas says that if the vocation to religion should even come from the devil, we should nevertheless follow it as a good counsel, though coming from an enemy. St. John Chrysostom, as quoted by the same the same St. Thomas, says, that God, when he gives such vocations, wills that we should not defer even a moment to follow them. Christ requires from us such an obedience that we should not delay an instant. And why this? Because as much as God is pleased to see in a soul promptitude in obeying him, so much he opens his hand and fills it with his blessings. On the contrary, tardiness in obeying him displeases him, and then he shuts his hand and withdraws his lights, so that in consequence a soul will follow its vocation with difficulty and abandon it again easily. Therefore St. John Chrysostom says that when the devil cannot bring any one to give up his resolution of consecrating himself to God, he at least seeks to make him defer the execution of it, and esteems it a great gain if he can obtain the delay of one day only, or even of an hour. Because after that day or that hour, other occasions presenting themselves, it will be less difficult for him to obtain greater delay, until the individual who has been thus called, finding himself more feeble and less assisted by grace, gives way altogether and loses his vocation. Therefore St. Jerome gives to those who are called to quit the world this advice: "Make haste, I beseech you, and rather cut than loosen the cable by which your bark is bound fast to the land." The saint wishes to say that as a man who should find himself in a boat on the point of sinking would seek to cut the rope, rather than to loosen it, so he who finds himself in the midst of the world ought to seek to get out of it as promptly as possible, in order to free himself from the danger which is so great, in the world, of losing his soul.

Let us also hear what St. Francis de Sales writes in his works on religious vocation, because the whole of it will go to confirm what has already been said and what will hereafter be said: "To have a sign of a true vocation, it is not necessary that our constancy be sensible, it suffices if it be in the superior part of our soul. And therefore we must not judge a vocation not to be a true one if the individual thus called, before putting it in execution, does not feel any longer those sensible movements that he felt in the beginning, even should he feel a repugnance and coldness which sometimes cause him to waver, and make it appear to him that all is lost. It is enough that the will remains constant in not abandoning the divine call, and also that there remains some affection for this call. To know whether God will have him become a religious, one ought not to expect that God himself should speak or send to him an angel from heaven to signify his will. And as little necessary is it that ten or twelve Doctors should examine whether the vocation is to he followed or not. But it is necessary to correspond to the first movement of the inspiration, to cultivate it, and then not to grow weary if disgust or coldness should come on; for if one act thus. God will not fail to make all succeed to His glory. Nor ought we to care much from what quarter the first movement comes. The Lord has many means to call his servants. Sometimes he makes use of a sermon, at other times of the reading of good books. Some, as St. Antony and St. Francis, have been called by hearing the words of the Gospel; others by means of afflictions and troubles that came upon them in the world, and that suggested to them the motive for leaving it. These persons, although they come to God only because they are disgusted with the world or are out of favor with it, nevertheless, failing not to give themselves to him with their whole will become sometimes greater saints than those who entered religion with a more apparent vocation. Father Platus relates that a nobleman, riding one day on a fine horse and striving to make a great display in order to please some ladies whom he saw, was thrown from the horse into the mire, from which he rose besmeared and covered with mud. He was so full of confusion at this accident that at the same moment he resolved to become a religious, saying: "Treacherous world, thou hast mocked me; but I will mock thee. Thou hast played me a game; I will play thee another, for I will have no more peace with thee, and from this hour I resolve to forsake thee and to become a friar." And in fact he became a religious and lived in religion a holy life.

PRESERVING A RELIGIOUS VOCATION

He, then, who wishes to be faithful to the divine call ought not only to resolve to follow it, but to follow it promptly, if he does not wish to expose himself to the evident danger of losing his vocation; and in case he should by necessity be forced to wait, he ought to use all diligence to preserve it, as the most precious jewel he could have. The means to preserve vocation are three in number: secrecy, prayer, and recollection.

SECRECY

First, generally speaking he must keep his vocation secret from everybody except his spiritual Father, because commonly the men of the world scruple not to say to young men who are called to the religious state that one may serve God everywhere, and therefore in the world also. And it is wonderful that such propositions come some times out of the mouth of priests, and even of religious; but of such religious only as have either become so without vocation, or to not know what vocation is. Yes, without doubt, he who is not called to the religious state may serve God in every place, but not he who is called to it and then from his own inclination wishes to remain in the world: such a one, as I have said above, can with difficulty serve God and lead a good life. It is especially necessary to keep the vocation secret from parents.

It was, indeed, the opinion of Luther, as Bellarmine relates, that children entering religion without the consent of their parents commit a sin. For, said he, children are bound to obey their parents in all things. But this opinion has generally been rejected by Councils and the holy Fathers. The tenth Council of Toledo expressly says: "It is lawful for children to become religious without the consent of their parents, provided they have attained the age of puberty." These are the words: "It shall not be lawful for parents to put their children in a religious Order after they shall have attained their fourteenth year. After this age, it shall be lawful for children to take upon themselves the yoke of religious observance, whether it be with the consent of their parents, or only the wish of their own hearts." The same is prescribed in the Council of Tribur, and is taught by St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Augustine. St. Bernard, St. Thomas, and others, with St. John Chrysostom, who writes in general: "When parents stand in the way in spiritual things, they ought not even to be recognized."

Some Doctors say that when a child called by God to the religious state could easily and securely obtain the consent of his parents, without any danger on their part of hindering him from following his vocation, it is becoming that he should seek to obtain their blessing. This doctrine could be held speculatively, but not so in practice, because in practice such a danger always exists. It will be well to discuss this point fully, in order to do away with certain pharisaical scruples which some entertain.

It is certain that in the choice of a state of life children are not bound to obey parents. Thus the Doctors with common accord teach with St. Thomas, who says: "Servants are not bound to obey their masters, nor children their parents, with regard to contracting matrimony, preserving virginity, and such like things."

Nevertheless, with regard to the state of marriage, Father Pinamonte, in his treatise on religious vocation, is justly of the opinion of Sanchez, Koning, and others, who hold that a child is bound to take counsel of his parents, because in such matters they may have more experience than the young. But speaking then of religious vocation, the above mentioned Pinamonte wisely adds that a child is not bound at all to take counsel of his parents, because in this matter they have no experience, and through interest are commonly changed into enemies, as St. Thomas also remarks, when speaking of religious vocation. "Frequently," he says, "our friends according to the flesh are opposed to our spiritual good." For fathers often prefer that their children should be damned with themselves rather than be saved away. Hence St. Bernard exclaims: "O hard father, O cruel mother, whose consolation is the death of their son, who wish rather that we perish with them than reign without them!" God, says a grave author quoted by St. Thomas, when he calls one to a perfect life, wishes him to forget his father, saying: "Hearken, O daughter, and see, and incline thy ear, and forget thy people and thy father's house." (Psalms 44:11). "By this, then," he adds. "the Lord certainly admonishes us that he who is called ought by no means to allow the counsel of parents to intervene." If God will have a soul who is called by Him forget its father and its father's house, without doubt he suggests by this that he who is called to the religious state ought not, before he follows the call, to interpose the counsel of the carnal friends of his household."

St. Cyril, explaining what Jesus Christ said to the youth mentioned above, "No man putting his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God" (Luke 9:62), comments on it, and says that he who asks for time to confer with his parents in reference to his vocation is exactly the one who is declared by Our Lord to be unfit for heaven. "In order to confer with his parents, he looks back who seeks for delay." Hence St. Thomas absolutely advises those who are called to religion to abstain from deliberating on their vocation with their relatives: "From this deliberation the relatives of the flesh are before all to be excluded; for it is said, Treat thy cause with thy friend (Proverbs 25:9) but the relatives of the flesh are in this affair not our friends, but our enemies, according to the saying of Our Lord: A man's enemies shall be they of his household" (Matthew 10:36).

If, then, for following one's vocation it would be a great error to ask the counsel of parents, it would be a greater one still to ask their permission, and to wait for it; for such a demand cannot be made without an evident danger of losing the vocation, as often as there is a probable fear that parents would exert themselves to prevent it. And, in fact, the saints, when they were called to leave the world, left their homes without giving their parents so much as an intimation of it. Thus acted a St. Thomas Aquinas, a St. Francis Xavier, a St. Philip Neri, a St. Louis Bertrand. And we know that the Lord has even by miracles approved of such glorious flights.

St. Peter of Alcantara, when he went to the monastery to become a religious, and was fleeing from the house of his mother under whose obedience he had lived since the death of his father, found himself prevented by a wide river from advancing any farther. He recommended himself to God, and at the same instant saw himself transported to the other side. Likewise, when St Stanislaus Kostka fled from home, without the permission of his father, his brother set out after him in great haste in a carriage, but having almost overtaken him, the horses, in spite of all the violence used against them, would not advance a step farther, till turning towards the city, they began to run at full speed.

In like manner, the Blessed Oringa of Waldrano, in Tuscany, being promised in marriage to a young man, fled from the house of her parents in order to consecrate herself to God, but the river Arno opposing itself to her course, after a short prayer she saw it divide and form as it were two walls of crystal, to let her pass through with dry feet.

Therefore, my very beloved brother, if you are called by God to leave the world, be very careful not to make your resolution known to your parents, and, content to be thus blessed by God, seek to execute it as promptly as you can, and without their knowledge, if you would not expose yourself to a great danger of losing your vocation. For, generally speaking, relatives, as was said above, especially fathers and mothers, oppose the execution of such resolutions; and although they may be endowed with piety, interest and passion, nevertheless, render them so blind, that under various pretexts they scruple not to thwart with all their might the vocation of their children.

We read in the life of Father Paul Segneri the younger that his mother, though a matron much given to prayer, left, nevertheless, no means untried to prevent her son from entering the religious state to which he was called. We also read in the life of Mgr. Cavalieri, Bishop of Troja, that his fathe r, although a man of great piety, used every means to prevent his son from entering the Congregation of Pious Workmen (which, notwithstanding, he afterwards did), and even went so far as to bring against him a lawsuit in the ecclesiastical court. And how many other fathers although they are men of piety and prayer, have not in such cases been seen to change, and to become possessed, as it were, of the devil! For hell, it seems, arms itself so much for no other thing than to prevent those who are called to the religious state from executing their resolution.

For this reason, be also very careful not to communicate your design to your friends, who will not scruple to dissuade you from it, or at least divulge the secret, so that the knowledge of it will easily come to the ears of your parents.

PRAYER

In the second place, it is necessary to know that these vocations are only preserved by prayer: he who gives up prayer will certainly give up his vocation. It is necessary to pray, and to pray much, and therefore let him who feels himself called not omit to make every morning after rising mental prayer of an hour, or at least of half an hour, in his own room, if he can do so there without molestation, and if not, in the church, and likewise of half an hour in the evening.

Let him not neglect also to make every day without fail a visit to the Most Holy Sacrament, as also to the Most Blessed Virgin Mary, in order to obtain the grace of perseverance in his vocation. Let him likewise not omit to receive holy Communion thrice, or at least twice, a week.

His meditations should almost always be on this point of the vocation, considering how great a favor from God he has received in being thus called by him; how much more easily he will secure his eternal salvation if he be faithful to God in following his vocation; and, on the contrary, to how great a danger of being damned he exposes himself if he be unfaithful. Let him then especially place before his eyes the hour of death, and consider the contentment he will then feel if he shall have obeyed God, and the pains and the remorse he would experience if he should die in the world. To this end, I shall add at the end of this little work some considerations on which he may make his mental prayer.

It is moreover necessary that all his prayers to Jesus and Mary, and especially those after Communion and in the visits, have for their object to obtain perseverance.

In all his prayers and Communions let him always renew the offering of himself to God, by saying: “Behold, O Lord, I am no more mine, I am Thine. Already have I given myself to Thee, and now I renew this my offering of my whole self. Accept of me and give me strength to be faithful to Thee, and to retire as quickly as possible into Thy holy house.”

RECOLLECTION

In the third place, it is necessary that he be recollected; this will not be possible for him unless he withdraws from worldly conversations and amusements. What, in short, as long as, we are in the world, is sufficient to cause the loss of vocation? A mere nothing. One day of amusement, a word from a friend, a passion that we do not mortify, a little attachment, a thought of fear, or a resentment we do not overcome, suffices to bring to naught all our resolutions of retiring from the world, or of giving ourselves entirely to God. Wherefore we ought to keep perfectly recollected, detaching ourselves from everything of this world. We should during this time think of nothing but prayer and frequenting the sacraments, and to be nowhere but at home, and in the church. Let him who will not do so, but distracts himself by pastimes, be persuaded that he will without doubt lose his vocation. He will remain with the remorse of not having followed it, but he certainly will not follow it. Oh, how many by neglecting these precautions have lost, first, their vocation, and afterwards their souls!

DISPOSITIONS REQUIRED FOR ENTERING RELIGION

He who feels himself to be called by God to an Order of exact observance (I say of exact observance, for it would be better for him to remain in the world than to enter an Order which is relaxed), should know that the end of every Order of exact observance is to follow as exactly as possible the footsteps and examples of the most holy life of Jesus Christ, who led a life entirely detached and mortified, full of suffering and contempt. He, then, who resolves to enter such an Order must at the same time resolve to enter it for the sake of suffering and denying himself in all things, as Jesus Christ himself has declared to those who wish perfectly to follow him: "If any man will come after me. Let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." (Matthew 16:24). He, then, who wishes to enter such an Order must firmly establish within himself this resolution to suffer, and to suffer much, so that afterwards he may not give way to temptations, when, having entered, he shall feel depressed under the hardships and privations of the poor and mortified life which is there led.

Many, on entering Communities of exact observance, take not the proper means of finding peace therein, and of becoming saints, because they place before their eyes only the advantages of the Community life, such as the solitude, the quiet, the freedom from the troubles caused by relatives, from strife and other disagreeable matters, and from the cares consequent on being obliged to think of one's lodgings, food, and clothing.

There is no doubt that every religious is only too much indebted to his Order, which delivers him from so many troubles, and thus procures for him so great a facility to serve God perfectly in peace, continually furnishing him with so many means for the welfare of his soul, so many good examples from his companions, so much good advice from his Superiors, who watch for his benefit, so many exercises conducive to eternal salvation. All this is true; but with all this he must also, in order not to be deprived of so blessed a lot, resolve to embrace all the sufferings that he may, on the other hand, meet with in the Order; for if he does not embrace them with love, he will never obtain that full peace which God gives to those who, overcome themselves: "To him that overcomes I will give the hidden manna" (Apocalypse 2:17). For the peace which God gives his faithful servants to taste is hidden, nor is it known by the men of the world, who, seeing their mortified life, know not how to envy them, but pity them and call them the unhappy ones of this earth. But "they see the cross, the unction they do not see," says St. Bernard. They see their mortification, but they do not see the contentment God gives them to enjoy.

It is true that in the spiritual life one has to suffer, but, says St. Teresa, when one resolves to suffer, the pain is gone. Nay, the pains themselves turn into joy. "My daughter," so the Lord said one day to St. Bridget, "the treasure of my graces seems to be surrounded with thorns, but for him who overcomes the first stings, all changes itself into sweetness." And then those delights which God gives to his beloved souls to enjoy in their prayers, in their Communions, in their solitude; those lights, those holy ardors and embraces, that quiet of conscience, that blessed hope of eternal life, who can ever understand them if he does not experience them? "One drop of the consolations of God," said St. Teresa, "is worth more than all the consolations and the pleasures of the world." Our most gracious God knows well how to give to him who suffers something for His sake, even in this valley of tears, the experience of the foretaste of the glory of the blessed; for in this is properly verified that which David says: "Thou who framest labor in commandment" (Psalm 63:20). In the spiritual life, God, announcing pains, tediousness, death, seems to frame labor, but, in fact, afterwards it is not so; for the spiritual life brings to them who entirely give themselves to God that peace which, as St. Paul says, "surpasseth all understanding" (Philippians 4:7). It surpasses all the pleasures of the world and of worldlings. Hence we see a religious more content in a poor cell than all the monarchs in their royal palaces. "Oh, taste and see that the Lord is sweet" (Psalms 33:9).

But, on the other hand, he must be persuaded that he who does not resolve to suffer and to overcome himself in the things contrary to his inclinations will never be able to enjoy this true peace, though he should have already entered religion. "To him that overcometh I will give the hidden manna" (Apocalypse 2:17). It is, then, necessary that he who wishes to be admitted into an Order of exact observance should enter with a mind determined to overcome himself in everything, by expelling from his heart all inclinations and desires that are not from God, nor for God, so that he must detach himself from all things, and especially from the four following: 1. From his comforts; 2. From his parents; 3. From his self esteem; 4. From his own will.

DETACHMENT FROM COMFORTS

In religion, after the year of novitiate, one makes, besides the vows of chastity and obedience, also the vow of poverty, in consequence of which one can never possess anything as one's individual property, not even a pin, no rents, no money, nor other things. The Order will provide him with all that he needs.

But the vow of poverty does not suffice to make one a true follower of Jesus Christ, if one does not afterwards embrace with joy of spirit all the inconveniences of poverty. "Not poverty, but the love of poverty is a virtue," says St. Bernard; and he means to say that for one to become a saint, it is not enough to be poor only, if one does not love also the inconveniences of poverty. "Oh, how many would wish to be poor and similar to Jesus Christ!" says Thomas a Kempis; "they wish to be poor, but without any want," but so that they be in want of nothing. In a word, they would wish the honor and the reward of poverty, but not the inconveniences of poverty. It is easy to understand that in religion no one will seek for things that are superfluous, clothes of silk, costly food, furniture of value, and the like; but he may desire to have all things that are necessary, and these he may be unable to procure. For then it is that he gives proof that he truly loves poverty, when things that are needful, such as his necessary clothing, bedcovering, or food, happen to be wanting and yet he remains content and is not troubled. And what kind of poverty would that be to suffer, if he were never in want of anything necessary? Father Balthasar Alvarez says that in order truly to love poverty, we must also love the effects of poverty; that is, as he enumerates them, cold, hunger, thirst, and contempt.

In religion, every one should not only be content with that which is given to him, without ever asking for anything of which, through the neglect of the officials, he should be in want, this would be a great defect. but he should also prepare himself sometimes to bear the want even of those simple things that the Rule allows. For it may happen that sometimes he is in want of clothes, coverings, linen, or such like things, and then he has to be satisfied with the little that has been given him, without complaining or being disquieted at seeing himself in want even of what is necessary. He who has not this spirit, let him not think of entering religion, because this is a sign that he is not called thereto, or that he has not the will to embrace the spirit of the Institute. He who goes to serve God in his house should consider that he is going not to be well treated for God, but to suffer for God.

DETACHMENT FROM PARENTS

He who wishes to enter religion must detach himself from his parents and forget them altogether. For, in religious houses of exact observance, detachment from parents is put in practice in the highest degree, in order perfectly to follow the doctrine of Jesus Christ, who said: "I came not to send peace, but the sword; I came to set a man at variance with his father. and the daughter against her mother" (Matthew 10:34), and then added the reason: "A man's enemies shall be they of his own household." This is especially the case, as has been remarked above, in this point of religious vocation: when there is question of any one leaving the world, there are no worse enemies than parents who, either through interest or passion, prefer to become enemies of God by turning their children away from their vocation rather than to give their consent to it. Oh, how many parents shall we see in the valley of Josaphat damned for having made their children or nephews lose their vocation: and how many youths shall we see damned who, in order to please their parents and by not detaching themselves from them, have lost their vocation and afterwards their souls! Hence Jesus declares to us: "If any man hate not his father, etc., he cannot be my disciple" (Luke 14:26). Let him, then, who wishes to enter a religious Order of perfect observance, and to become a true disciple of Jesus Christ, resolve to forget his parents altogether.

When any one has already entered religion, let him remember that he must practice then the same detachment from parents. Let him know that he cannot go to visit his parents in their own house, except in the case of some dangerous illness of his father or mother, or of some other urgent necessity, though always with the permission of the Superior. Otherwise, to go to the house of one's parents without the most express permission, would be considered in religion as a most notable and scandalous fault. In religion it is also considered as a great defect even to ask permission or to show a desire of seeing parents or of speaking with them.

St. Charles Borromeo said that when he visited the house of his parents he always, after his return, found himself less fervent in spirit. And thus let him who goes to the house of his parents by his own will and not through a positive obedience to his Superiors, be persuaded that he will leave it either under temptation or will be less fervent.

St. Vincent of Paul could only be induced once to visit his country and his parents, and this out of pure necessity; and he said that the love of home and country was a great impediment to his spiritual progress. He said also that many on account of having visited their country, had become so tender towards their relatives that they were like flies which, being once entangled in a cobweb, cannot extricate themselves from it. He added: "For that one time that I went, although it was for a short time only, and though I took care to prevent in my relatives every hope of help from me, yet I felt at leaving them such a pain that I ceased not to weep all along the road, and was for three months harassed by the thought of coming to their aid. At last, God in his mercy took that temptation from me."

Let him know, moreover, that no one may write to his parents without permission, and without showing the letter to the Superior. Otherwise, he would be guilty of a most grievous fault which is not to be tolerated in religion, and should be punished with severity; since from this might come a thousand disorders tending to destroy the religious spirit. Let especially the new comer know that during the novitiate this is observed with the greatest rigor; for novices during their year of novitiate do not easily obtain permission to talk to their parents, or to write to them.

Finally, let him know that, in case a subject should become sick, it would be a notable defect to ask or to show an inclination to go to his own house for his restoration to health, under the plea of being better taken care of, or of enjoying the benefit of his native air. The air of his own country becomes almost always, or even always, hurtful and pestilential to the spirit of the subject. And if he should ever say that he wishes to be cured at home in order not to subject the Order to expenses for remedies, let him know that the Order has charity enough to take sufficient care of the sick. As to the change of air, the Superiors will think of that; and if the air of one house is not beneficial to him, they will send him to another. And as for remedies, they will even sell the books, if need be, to provide for the sick. And so let him be sure that divine Providence will not fail him. And if the Lord should decree against his recovery, he should conform himself to the will of God, without even mentioning the word "home." The greatest grace that he who enters an Order can desire is to die, when God wills it, in the house of God, assisted by the brethren of his Order, and not in a secular house in the midst of his relatives.

DETACHMENT FROM SELF ESTEEM

He must also be altogether detached from all self esteem. Many leave their country, their comforts and parents, but carry with them a certain esteem for themselves; but this is the most hurtful attachment of all. The greatest sacrifice that we can make to God is to give to him not only goods, pleasures, and home, but ourselves also by leaving ourselves. This is that denying of self which Jesus Christ recommends above all to his followers. And for this self denial it is necessary that every one should first place under foot all self esteem, by desiring and embracing every imaginable contempt which he may meet with in religion, as, for instance, to see others whom perhaps he thinks less deserving preferred to himself, or to be considered unfit to be employed, or only employed in lower and more laborious occupations. He should know that in the house of God those charges are the highest and the most honorable which are imposed by obedience. God forbid that any one should seek for or aspire to any office or charge of preeminence! This would be a strange thing in religion, and he would be noted as proud and ambitious, and as such be put in penance, and especially mortified in this point. Better would it be, perhaps, that a religious Order should be destroyed than that there should enter into it that accursed pest of ambition which, when it enters, disfigures the most exemplary Communities and the most beautiful works of God.

But he should feel even consoled in spirit when he sees himself mocked and despised by his companions. I say consoled in spirit, for as to the flesh this will be impossible; nor need a subject be uneasy when he sees that he resents it: it is enough that the spirit embraces it, and that he rejoices at it in the superior part of the soul.

Thus also seeing himself continually reprimanded and mortified by all, not only by Superiors, but also by equals and inferiors, he should heartily and with a tranquil mind thank those who thus reprimand him and have the charity to admonish him, answering that he will be more attentive not to fall into that fault again. One of the greatest desires of the saints in this world was to be contemned for the love of Jesus Christ. This it is that St. John of the Cross asked for, when Jesus Christ appeared to him with a cross on his shoulder and said, "John, ask from me what thou wishest," and St. John answered, "O Lord, to suffer and to be despised for Thee." The Doctors teach, with St. Francis de Sales, that the highest degree of humility we can have is to be pleased with abjections and humiliations. And in this consists also one of the greatest merits that we can have with God. Some contempt or affront suffered in peace for the love of God is of greater value in his sight than a thousand disciplines and a thousand fasts.

It is necessary to know that to suffer contempt either from Superiors or from companions is a thing unavoidable even in the most holy Communities. Read the lives of the saints, and you will see how many mortifications were encountered by St. Francis Regis, St. Francis of Jerome, Father Torres, and others. The Lord sometimes permits that, even between saints there should exist, though without their fault, certain natural antipathies, or at least a certain diversity of character between subjects of the greatest piety, which will cause them to suffer many contradictions. At other times false reports will be spread and believed; God himself will permit this, in order that the subjects may have occasion to exercise themselves in patience and humility.

In a word, he will gain little in religion and lose much who cannot quietly put up with contempt and contradiction; and, therefore, he who enters religion to give himself entirely to God should be ashamed not to know how to bear contempt when he appears before Jesus Christ, who was "filled with opprobriums" for love of us. Let every one be attentive to this, and resolve to be pleased in religion with all abjections, and to prepare himself to suffer many of them, for without the least doubt he will have many to bear. Otherwise, the disquiet caused by contradictions and contempt badly endured might trouble him so much as to make him lose his vocation, and drive him out of religion. Oh, how many have lost their vocation on account of such impatience in humiliations! But of what service to the Order or to God can he be who does not know how to bear contempt for His sake! And how can any one ever be said to be dead according to that promise which he made to Jesus Christ, on entering religion, to die to himself, if he remain alive to resentment and disquiet when he sees himself humbled? Out of the Order with such subjects, so attached to their own esteem out with them! It is well for them to go as soon as possible, that they may not also infect the rest with their pride. In religion every one should be dead, and especially to his own self esteem; otherwise it is better for them not to enter, or to depart again if they have already entered.

DETACHMENT FROM ONE'S OWN WILL

He who enters into religion must altogether renounce his own will, consecrating it entirely to holy obedience. Of all things, this is the most necessary. What does it avail to leave comforts, parents, and honors, if still one carries into religion one's own will? In this principally consists the denial of ourselves, the spiritual death, and the entire surrender of ourselves to Jesus Christ. The gift of the heart, that is, of the will, is what pleases Him most, and what He wishes from the children of religion. Otherwise, if we do not entirely detach ourselves from our own will and renounce it in all, all mortifications, all meditations and prayers, and all other sacrifices will be of little avail.

It is, then, evident that this is the greatest merit that we can have before God, and this is the sure and only way of pleasing God in all things, so that then we can each one of us say what Jesus our Saviour said. "I do always the things that please him" (John 8:29). Certainly he who in religion lives without self will may say and hope that in all that he does he pleases God, whether he studies or prays or hears confession, whether he goes to the refectory or to recreation or to rest; for in religion not a step is made, not a breath drawn, but in obedience to the Rule, or to Superiors.

The world does not know, and even certain persons given to spirituality have little idea of, the great value of a Community life under obedience. It is true that outside of religious Communities there are to be found many persons who do much, and, may be, more than those that live under obedience; they preach, do penance, pray, and fast: but in all this they consult more or less their own will. God grant that at the day of judgment they may not have to lament as those mentioned in Scripture: "Why have we fasted, and Thou hast not regarded: why have we humbled our souls, and Thou hast not taken notice? Behold, in the day of your fast your own will is found!" (Isaias 58:3) On which passage St. Bernard remarks: "Self will is a great evil, for it is the cause that what is good in itself may be for you no good at all."

This is to be understood, when in all these exercises one seeks not God, but one's self. On the contrary, he who does all by obedience is sure that in all he pleases God. The Venerable Mother Mary of Jesus said that she prized so much her vocation to religion principally for two reasons: the first was that in the monastery she enjoyed always the presence and company of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament; and the other was that there by obedience she entirely belonged to God, sacrificing to Him her own will.

It is related by Father Rodriguez that after the death of Dositheus, the disciple of St. Dorotheus, the Lord revealed that in those five years he had lived under obedience, though by reason of his infirmities he could not practice the austerities of the other monks, yet by the virtue of obedience he had merited the reward of St. Paul the Hermit, and of St. Antony, Abbot.

He, then, who wishes to enter religion must resolve to renounce altogether his own will, and to will only what holy obedience wills. God preserve any religious from ever letting fall from his mouth the words I will or I will not! But in all things, even when asked by Superiors, what he desires, he should only answer, I wish that which holy obedience wills. And, provided there is no evident sin, he should in every command imposed on him obey blindly and without examination; because the duty of examining and deciding the doubts belongs not to him, but to his Superiors. Otherwise, if in obeying he does not submit his own judgment to that of the Superior, his obedience will be imperfect. St. Ignatius of Loyola said that prudence in things of obedience is not required in subjects, but in Superiors; and if there is prudence in obeying, it is to obey without prudence. St. Bernard says, "Perfect obedience is indiscreet"; and in another place he said, "For a prudent novice to remain in the congregation is an impossible thing;" and adding the reason for it, he said: "To judge belongs to the Superior, and to obey to the subject."

But to make progress in this virtue of obedience, on which all depends, he must always keep his mind ready to do all that to which he feels the greatest repugnance, and on the contrary he must be prepared to bear it quietly when he sees that all that he seeks or desires is refused to him. It will happen that when he wishes to be in solitude, to apply himself to prayer or study, he will be the most employed in exterior occupations. For, though it is true that in religion one leads as much as possible a solitary life when at home, and that for this end there are many hours of silence, the retreat each year of ten days in perfect silence, and of one day each month, besides the fifteen days before the receiving of the habit, and one of fifteen before the profession, when the vows are made, nevertheless, if it is an Order of priests called to work and to be employed for the salvation of souls, the subject, if he is continually employed in this by obedience, should be content with the prayers and exercises of the Community. He must be prepared sometimes to go even without these, when obedience will have him do so, without either excusing himself or being disquieted, being well persuaded of that of which St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi was so confident when she said that: "All the things which are done through obedience are but so many prayers."

TRIALS WHICH WE MUST EXPECT

When, then, any one has thus entered religion, however truly he may be called, and though he may have conquered all his passions and his earthly affections, let him not imagine that he will be exempt from other temptations and trials, which God himself will send him, such as tediousness, darkness, various fears, in order to establish him more firmly in his vocation. We must remember that even the saints, who have loved their vocation the most, have sometimes suffered great darkness with regard to it, and that it seemed to them as if they were deceived and would not be able to save themselves in that state. So it happened with St. Teresa. St. John of the Cross, St. Frances de Chantal. But by recommending themselves to God, that darkness was dissipated, and they recovered their peace of mind. Thus the Lord tries his most beloved children, as it was said to Tobias: "Because thou wast acceptable to God, it was necessary that temptations should prove thee" (Tobias 12:13). And in the book of Deuteronomy: "The Lord your God trieth you, that it may appear whether you love him or not" (Deuteronomy 13:3). Let each one therefore prepare himself to suffer in religion this obscurity. It will sometimes appear to him that he cannot bear the observances of the Order: that he will have no more peace of mind, or will not even be able to save himself. But most of all, every one must be on his guard when the temptation presents specious scruples or pretexts of greater spiritual good, in order to make him abandon his vocation. The principal remedies in such temptations are two in number.

FIRST REMEDY

TO HAVE RECOURSE TO GOD

The first is to have recourse to prayer: "Go ye to him and be enlightened" (Psalms 33:6). For as it will not be possible for temptation to overcome him who has recourse to prayer, so he who does not recommend himself to God will surely be overcome by it. And let it be remarked, that sometimes it will not suffice to have recourse to God once, or for a few days, to become victorious. Perhaps the Lord will permit the temptation to continue, even after we have prayed for several weeks, months, and even years; but let us be assured that he who ceases not to recommend himself to God will certainly be enlightened and victorious, and thereafter he will have more peace and be more firm in his vocation.

Until we have gone through that storm, which for the most part comes over all, let none of us think himself secure. Let it be remarked, however, that in this time of temptation we should not expect to have fervor, and a clearness of reason sufficient to tranquillize ourselves; for in the midst of this darkness we see nothing but confusion. We have nothing then to do but to say to the Lord: O Lord, help me! O Lord, help me! And also to have frequently recourse to the Blessed Virgin Mary, who is the Mother of perseverance, confiding in that divine promise: "Ask, and you shall receive" (John 16:24). And it is certain that he who with the help of divine grace is victorious in such a combat finds afterwards a double calm and peace in his vocation.

SECOND REMEDY

TO HAVE RECOURSE TO THE SUPERIORS

The second remedy, and a principal and necessary one in such temptations, is to communicate to the Superiors, or to the spiritual Father of the Community, the temptation that afflicts you, and this at once, before the temptation becomes strong. St. Philip Neri said that when a temptation is thus manifested it is half vanquished. On the contrary, there is in such a case no greater evil than to conceal the temptation from Superiors; for then, on the one hand, God withdraws his light because of the little fidelity shown by the subject in not disclosing it, and on the other, whilst the mine is not sprung, the temptation gains strength. Hence it may be held for certain, that he will surely lose his vocation who, when he is tempted against it, does not disclose his temptations.

Let it be understood that in religion the most dangerous temptations that hell can bring against a subject are those against vocation, in which, if it should succeed and conquer, by that one stroke it will have gained many victories; for when a subject has lost his vocation and left religion, what good will he further be able to do in the service of God? Though the enemy may make him believe that out of religion he will have more peace and be able to do more good, nevertheless let him hold for certain, that as soon as he is out of it he will feel such a remorse in his heart that he will never more have peace. And God grant that such a remorse may not torment him afterwards through all eternity in hell, in which, as has already been said, he who through his own fault loses his vocation falls so very easily. He will be so lukewarm and discouraged in doing good, that he will not even have the courage to raise his eyes to heaven. It will be an easy thing for him to give up prayer altogether, because as often as he begins it he will feel a hell of remorse, hearing his conscience reproach him, and saying: What hast thou don't thou hast abandoned God; thou hast lost thy vocation, and for what? To follow thine own caprice, to please thy parents. Let him be certain that he will have to hear this reproach through his whole life, and still more shall he hear it made to him in the hour of his death, when, in sight of eternity, instead of dying in the house of God and in the midst of good brethren in religion, he will have to die outside of the Community, perhaps in his own house, in the midst of his relatives, to please whom he has displeased God. Let religious always beseech God to let them die rather than to permit that greatest of disgraces, the greatness of which they will better understand at the hour of death and to their greater torment, because then there will be no more any remedy for their error. For him, then, who is tempted against his vocation this is the best meditation that he can make at the time of the temptation, that is, namely, to reflect what torment the remorse of having lost his vocation, and of having to die out of religion, through his own caprice, through his own fault, will cause him at the hour of death.

CONCLUSION

Finally, let him who wishes to enter religion not forget to resolve to become a saint, and to suffer every exterior and interior pain, in order to be faithful to God, and not to lose his vocation. And if he be not resolved to do this, I exhort him not to deceive the Superiors and himself, and not to enter at all, for this is a sign that he is not called, or, which is a still greater evil, that he wishes not to correspond, as he should, with the grace of his vocation. Hence, with so bad a disposition it is better to remain without, in order to acquire a better disposition, and to resolve to give himself entirely to God, and to suffer all for God. Otherwise he will do an injury both to himself and to the Order; for he will easily go back to the world, and then, being disgraced before the world, as well as before God, he will be guilty of a still further infidelity to his vocation, and will lose the confidence in the power of taking another step in the way of God. God only knows into what other misfortunes and sins he may afterwards fall.

On the other hand, a beautiful sight it is to see in religion souls wholly given to God, who live in the world as if out of the world, without any other thought than that of pleasing God. In religion each one has to live only for eternal life. What happiness for us, if we spend these few days of our life for God! And to this he is most especially obliged who has perhaps already spent much of his life in the service of the world. Let us set eternity before our eyes, and then we shall suffer all with peace and joyfulness.

Let us thank God, who gives us so much light and so many means to serve Him perfectly, since He has chosen us, from among so many, to serve Him in religion, having bestowed on us the gift of His holy love. Let us make haste to please Him in the practice of virtue, reflecting, as St. Teresa said to her daughters, that we have already by His grace done the principal thing necessary to become saints, by turning our backs on the world and all its goods; the least yet remains to be done, in order that we may be saints. I hold it for certain, that for those who die in religion, Jesus Christ has prepared a prominent place in paradise. On this earth we shall be poor, despised, and treated as fools, as imprudent men, but in the other life our lot will be changed.

Let us always recommend ourselves to our Redeemer hidden in the Sacrament, and to Most Holy Mary, because in religion all subjects must profess a most special love for Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament, and for the Immaculate Virgin Mary, and let us have great confidence. Jesus Christ has chosen us to be princes of his court, as we may confidently conclude from the protection that He extends to all religious Orders, and to each member of them. “The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear?” (Psalms 26:1) O Lord! Finish Thy work, and for Thy glory grant us to be all Thine, so that all the members of Thy Orders may until the day of judgment be pleasing to Thee, and gain over to Thee an immense number of souls. Amen. Amen.

THOSE CALLED TO THE RELIGIOUS STATE

CONSIDERATION 1

THE SOUL IS SECURED BY ENTERING THE RELIGIOUS STATE

To know how important is the eternal salvation of our soul, it suffices to have faith, and to consider that we have but one soul, and when that is lost, all is lost. "What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?" (Matthew 16:26) This great maxim of the Gospel has induced many youths either to shut themselves up in cloisters, or to live in deserts, or by martyrdom to give up their lives for Jesus Christ. For, said they, what does it profit us to possess the whole world, and all the goods of this world, in this present life, which must soon finish, and then be damned and be miserable in that life to come, which will never end? All those rich men, all those princes and emperors, who are now in hell, what have they now of all that they enjoyed in this life, but a greater torment and a greater despair? Miserable beings, they lament now and say: "All those things are passed away like a shadow" (Wisdom 5:9). For them all is passed like a shadow, like a dream, and that lamentation which is their lot has lasted already many years, and shall last throughout eternity. "The fashion of this world passeth away." (1 Corinthians 7:31). This world is a scene that lasts but a short time; happy he that plays on this scene the part that will afterwards make him happy in the life that shall never end! When he shall then be contented, honored, and a prince in paradise, so long as God shall be God, little will he care for having been in this world poor, despised, and in tribulation. For this end only has God placed us on this earth, and keeps us here in life, not to acquire transitory but eternal goods: "The end is life everlasting" (Romans 6:22).

This is the sole end which all men that live in the world should have in view. But the misfortune is, that in the world one thinks little or nothing of everlasting life. In the midst of the darkness of this Egypt the greatest number of men bestow all their care on acquiring honor and pleasures; and this is the reason why so many perish. "With desolation is all the land made desolate, because there is none that considereth in the heart" (Jeremias 12:11). How few are they who reflect on death, by which for us the scene is closed, on the eternity which awaits us, on what God has done for our sake! And thence it comes that these miserable beings live in blindness and at random, far from God, having their eyes, like the beasts, intent only on earthly things, without remembering God, without desiring His love, and without a thought of eternity. Therefore they die afterwards an unhappy death, which will be the beginning of an eternal death and an endless misery. Having at last arrived there, they will finally open their eyes, but it will be only to lament for their own foolishness.

This is the great means of salvation, which is found in religion, to wit, the continual meditation on the eternal truths. "Remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin" (Ecclesiasticus 7:40). In all well regulated religious houses this is done every day, and even several times a day. And therefore in this light of divine things, which there shines continually, it is morally impossible to live, at least for a long time, far from God, and without keeping one's account ready for eternity.

PRAYER

O my God! How have I ever deserved this great mercy, that, having left so many others to live in the midst of the world, Thou hast willed to call me, who have offended Thee more than others, and deserved, more than they, to be deprived of Thy divine light, to enjoy the honor of living as a friend in Thy own house! O Lord! Grant that I may understand this exceeding grace which Thou hast bestowed on me, that I may always thank Thee for it, as I purpose and hope to do always during my life and throughout eternity, and do not permit me to be ungrateful for it. Since Thou hast been so liberal towards me, and hast in Thy love preferred me to others, it is but just that more than others I should serve and love Thee. O my Jesus! Thou wouldst have me to be wholly Thine, and to Thee I give myself wholly. Accept me, and henceforward keep me as Thy own, since I am no more mine. Finish Thou the work which Thou hast begun. Thou hast called me to Thy house, because Thou wilt have me become a saint. Make me, then, what Thou wilt have me. Do this, O eternal Father! For the love of Jesus Christ, in whom is all my confidence. I love Thee, my sovereign good, I love Thee. O infinite goodness. I love Thee only, and will love Thee forever. O Mary. my hope, come to my assistance, and obtain for me to be always faithful and thankful to my Lord.

THE HAPPINESS OF THE RELIGIOUS AT DEATH

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord" (Apocalypse 14:13). And who are those blessed dead who die in the Lord, but the religious, who at the end of their lives are found already dead to the world, having already detached themselves by their holy vows from the world and all its goods?

Consider, my brother, how content you will feel if, following your vocation, it will be your good fortune to die in the house of God. The devil will certainly represent to you that if you retire into the house of God you may perhaps afterwards repent of having left your own house and your own country, and deprived your parents of the help that they might have expected from you. But say to yourself: Shall I at the point of death repent of having put my resolution into execution, or shall I be content? I beseech you therefore to imagine yourself now already at the point of death, about to appear before the tribunal of Jesus Christ. Reflect what then, reduced to that state, you would wish to have done. Perhaps to have contented your parents, to have worked for your own family and your country, and then to die surrounded by brothers and nephews and relatives, after having lived in your own house, with the title of a pastor, of a canon, of a bishop, of a member of the cabinet, and after having done your own will? Or rather, to die in the house of God, assisted by your good brethren in religion, who encourage you on the great passage to eternity, after having lived many years in religion, humbled, mortified, poor, far from parents, deprived of your own will, and under obedience, and detached from everything of the world, all these things render death sweet and agreeable? "He who has been accustomed to deprive himself of the delights of the world will not regret doing so when he has to leave it," says St. Bernard. Pope Honorius II, when dying, wished that he had remained in his monastery, occupied in washing the plates, and had not been Pope. Philip II wished at his death that he had been a lay brother in some religious Order, intent on serving God, and had he not been a king. Philip III, also king of Spain, said when he was dying: "Oh, that I had been in a desert, there to serve God, and that I had never been a monarch, for had such been the case, I should now appear with more confidence before the tribunal of Jesus Christ."

When, then, hell tempts you about your vocation, think of the hour of death, and set before your eyes that all important moment "upon which eternity depends." Thus you will overcome all temptations, you will be faithful to God, and certainly you will not repent of it at the point of death, but will give thanks to the Lord, and die contented. Gerard, brother of St. Bernard, died singing, at the very thought of dying in the house of God.

Father Suarez, of the Society of Jesus, felt at his death so great consolation and sweetness at dying in religion, that he said: "I never thought it was so sweet to die." Another good religious, of the same Society, when at the point of death, laughed; and being asked why he laughed, answered: "And why should I not laugh? Has not Jesus Christ himself promised paradise to him who leaves everything for His sake? Was it not He who said: "Every one that hath left house, or brethren, or father, etc. shall receive a hundredfold, and shall possess life everlasting"? (Matthew 19:29) I have left all for God; God is faithful; He cannot fail to fulfill His promises; and so he said: Why should I not rejoice and laugh, seeing myself assured of paradise?"

A certain lay brother who died some years ago was asked at his death in which house he would rather be. He answered: "I desire nothing but to die and to be united with God."

Father Januarius Sarnelli, a short time before his death, when conversing with God, uttered the following words: "O Lord, Thou knowest that all I have done, all I have thought, has been for Thy glory; now I wish to go to see Thee face to face, if it please Thee so;" then he said: "Come, I will begin a sweet agony," and began to converse affectionately with God; and shortly after placidly expired, preserving the smile on his lips, and the body began to give forth a sweet odor, which, as they attested, was perceived for several days in the room in which he had died.

St. Bernard, speaking of the happy state of religious, had then good reason to exclaim: "O secure life, in which death is expected without fear, aye, sweetly desired and devoutly accepted!"

PRAYER

O my Lord Jesus Christ, who, in order to obtain a happy death for me, hast chosen so bitter a death for Thyself; since Thou hast loved me to such an extent as to have chosen me to follow more closely Thy holy life, to have me thus more intimately united with Thy loving heart, bind me, I beseech Thee, wholly to Thee with the sweet cords of Thy love, that I may no more separate myself from Thee. O my beloved Redeemer, I wish to be grateful to Thee, and to correspond with Thy grace, but I fear my weakness may render me unfaithful; O my Jesus, do not permit this. Let me die rather than abandon Thee, or forget the peculiar affection that Thou hast shown me. I love Thee, O my dear Saviour Thou art and shalt always be the only Lord of my heart and of my soul. I leave all and choose Thee alone for my treasure, O most pure Lamb of God! O my most ardent lover. "My beloved is white and ruddy, chosen out of thousands" (Canticles 5:10). Begone, ye creatures! My only good is my God: He is my love, my all. I love Thee, O my Jesus, and in loving Thee I will spend the remainder of my life, be it short or be it long. I embrace Thee, I press Thee to my heart, and I wish to die united with Thee. I wish nothing else. Make me to live always burning with Thy love, and when I shall have arrived at the end of my life, make me to expire in an ardent act of love towards Thee. Immaculate Virgin Mary, obtain thou this grace for me; I hope it from thee.

THE ACCOUNT OF ONE WHO DOES NOT FOLLOW HIS VOCATION

The grace of vocation to the religious state is not an ordinary grace: it is a very rare one, which God grants only to a few. "He hath not done in like manner to every nation" (Psalms 147:20). Oh, how much greater is this grace of vocation to a perfect life and to become one of the household of God, than if one were called to be the king of any kingdom on this earth! For what comparison can there be between a temporal kingdom of this earth and the eternal kingdom of heaven?

But the greater the grace is, the greater will be the indignation of the Lord against him who has not corresponded with it, and the more rigorous will be his judgment at the day of account. If a king were to call a poor shepherd to his royal palace, to serve him among the noblemen of his court, what would not be the indignation of this king were he to refuse such a favor through unwillingness to leave his miserable stable and his little flock? God knows well the value of His graces, and therefore he chastises with severity those who despise them. He is the Lord; when He calls He wishes to be obeyed, and obeyed promptly. When, therefore, by his inspiration he calls a soul to a perfect life, if it does not correspond he deprives it of his light, and abandons it to its own darkness. Oh, how many poor souls shall we see among the reprobate on the day of judgment for this very reason, that they were called and would not correspond!

Give thanks, then, to the Lord, who has invited you to follow Him; but fear if you do not correspond. Since God calls you to serve him nearer to His person, it is a sign that He wishes to save you. But He will have you to be saved in that path only which He indicates to you and has chosen for you. If you wish to save yourself on a road of your own choosing, there is great danger that you will not be saved at all; for if you remain in the world, when God wishes you to be a religious, He will not give you those efficacious helps prepared for you had you lived in His house, and without these you will not save yourself. "My sheep hear my voice" (John 10:27). He who will not obey the voice of God shows that he is not and will not be one of His sheep, but in the valley of Josaphat will be condemned with the goats.

PRAYER

O Lord, Thou hast shown me such an excess of bounty as to choose me from among so many others, to serve Thee in Thy own house with Thy most beloved servants. I know how great is that grace and how unworthy of it I have been. Behold, I am willing to correspond to a love so great. I will obey Thee. Since Thou hast been towards me so liberal as to call me when I did not seek Thee, and when I was so ungrateful, permit not that I should offer to Thee that greater excess of ingratitude to embrace again my enemy, the world, in which heretofore I have often forfeited Thy grace and my eternal salvation, and thus to forsake Thee, who hast shed Thy blood and given Thy life for my sake. Since Thou hast called me, give me also the strength to correspond to the call. Already have I promised to obey Thee. I promise this again, but without the grace of perseverance I cannot be faithful to Thee. This perseverance I ask of Thee, and through Thy own merits it is that I wish it and hope to obtain it. Give me the courage to vanquish the passions of the flesh, through which the devil seeks to bring me to betray Thee. I love Thee, O my Jesus; to Thee I consecrate myself entirely. I am already Thine, I will be always Thine. O Mary, my mother and my hope, thou art the mother of perseverance: this grace is only dispensed through thy hands; do thou obtain it for me: in thee do I confide.

THE DAMNED FOR HAVING LOST HIS VOCATION

The pain of having through one's own fault lost some great good, or of having brought upon one's self voluntarily some great evil, is a pain so great that even in this life it causes an insupportable torment. But what torment will that youth, called by the singular favor of God to the religious state, feel in hell, when he then perceives that, if he had obeyed God, he would have attained a high place in paradise, and sees himself nevertheless confined in that prison of torments, without hope of remedy for this his eternal ruin? "Their worm dieth not" (Mark 9:43).

This will be that worm which, living always, shall always gnaw his heart by a continual remorse. He will say then: What a fool I was! I might have become a great saint. And if I had obeyed, I would certainly have become so; and now I am damned without remedy.

Miserable being! Then, for his greater torment, on the day of judgment he will see and recognize at the right hand, and crowned as saints, those who have followed their vocation, and, leaving the world, have retired to the house of God, to which he also had been once called. And then shall he see himself separated from the company of the blessed, and placed in the midst of that innumerable and miserable crew of the damned for his disobedience to the voice of God.

We know well, as we have considered above, that to this most unhappy lot he exposes himself who, in order to follow his own caprice, turns a deaf ear to the call of God. Therefore, my brother, you who have already been called to become a saint in the house of God, consider that you will expose yourself to a great danger should you lose your vocation through your own fault. And this very vocation which God in his sovereign bounty has given you, in order, as it were, to take you out from among the mass and place you among the chosen princes of His paradise, will, through your own fault, should you be unfaithful to it, become an especial hell for you. Make your choice, then; for God leaves it in your own hands either to be a great king in paradise or a reprobate in hell, more despairing than the rest.

PRAYER

No, my God, permit me not to disobey Thee and to be unfaithful. I see Thy goodness, and thank Thee because, instead of casting me away from Thy face and banishing me into hell, as I have so often deserved, Thou callest me to become a saint, and preparest for me a high place in paradise. I see that I should deserve a double torment should I not correspond with this grace which is not given to all. I will obey Thee. Behold, I am Thine, and always will be Thine. I embrace with joy all the pains and discomforts of the religious life to which Thou invitest me. And what are these pains in comparison with the eternal pains that I have deserved? I was entirely lost through my sins; now I give myself entirely to Thee. Dispose of me and my life as Thou pleasest. Accept, O Lord, of one already condemned to hell, as I have been, to serve Thee and love Thee in this life and in the next. I will love Thee as much as I have deserved to be doomed to hate Thee in hell, O God, worthy of an infinite love! O my Jesus. Thou hast broken those chains by which the world held me bound; Thou hast delivered me from the servitude of my enemies. I will love Thee much, then, O my Love; and for the love I bear Thee, I will always love Thee and obey Thee. Always will I thank thee, O Mary, my advocate, who hast obtained this mercy for me. Help me, and suffer me not to be ungrateful to that God who has loved me so much. Obtain for me that I may die rather than be unfaithful to so great a grace. Thus I hope.

CONSIDERATION 5

THE IMMENSE GLORY THAT RELIGIOUS ENJOY IN HEAVEN

Consider, in the first place, that which St. Bernard says that it is difficult for religious, who die in the religious state, to be damned. "From the cell to heaven the way is easy; one scarcely ever descends from his cell into hell." And the reason which the saint adduces is, "because one scarcely ever perseveres in it until death, unless he be predestinated." For a religious with difficulty perseveres until his death, if he is not of the number of the elect of paradise. Therefore, St. Laurence Justinian called the religious state the gate of paradise. "Of that heavenly city this is the gate" And he said that "therefore the religious have a great sign of their predestination."

Consider, moreover, that the reward of heaven, as the Apostle says, is "a crown of justice" (2 Timothy 4:8); wherefore God, though he rewards us for our works more abundantly than we deserve, rewards us, nevertheless, in proportion to the works we have done. "He will render to every man according to his works" (Matthew 16:27). From this consider how exceedingly great will be the reward which God will give in heaven to good religious, in consideration of the great merits which they daily acquire.

The religious gives to God all His goods of this earth, and is content to be entirely poor, without possessing anything. The religious renounces all attachment to his parents, friends, and country, in order to unite himself more closely with God. The religious continually mortifies himself in many things which he world enjoy in the world. The religious, finally, gives to God his whole self by giving Him his will through the vow of obedience.

But the dearest thing that we have is our own will; and what God, of all other things, requires of us most, is our heart, that is, our will. "My son, give me thy heart" (Proverbs 23:26). He who serves God in the world will give him his possessions, but not himself; he will give him a part, and not the whole; for he will give him indeed his goods by almsdeeds, his food by fasting, his blood by disciplines, etc: but he will always reserve for himself his own will, fasting when he pleases, praying when he likes. But the religious, giving him his own will, gives himself and gives all; gives not only the fruits of the tree, but the whole tree itself. Hence, he may then truly say to him: O Lord! Having given Thee my will, I have nothing more to give Thee.

Therefore, in all that he does through obedience he is sure to do the will of God perfectly, and merits in all things, not only when he prays, when he hears confessions, when he preaches, or fasts, or practices other mortifications, but also when he takes his food, when he sweeps his room, when he makes his bed, when he takes his rest, when he recreates himself; for doing all this through obedience, he does in all the will of God. St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi said that all that is done through obedience is a prayer. Hence St. Anselm, speaking of those who love obedience, asserted that all that religious do is meritorious for them. St. Aloysius Gonzaga said that in religion one sails as it were in a vessel, in which he even advances who does not row.

Oh, how much more will a religious gain in one month by observing his Rule, than a secular, with all his penance and prayers, in a year! Of that disciple of Dorotheus, called Dositheus, it was revealed that for the five years he had lived under obedience there was given to him in heaven the glory of St. Paul, Hermit, and of St. Antony, Abbot, both of whom had for so many years lived in the desert. Religious, it is true, have to suffer the inconveniences of regular observance: "Going, they went and wept." But when they shall be called to the other life, they will go to heaven, but "coming, they shall come with joyfulness, carrying their sheaves" (Psalms 125:7). Hence they shall then sing: "The lines are fallen unto me in goodly places, for my inheritance is goodly to me" (Psalms 15:6). These bonds which have bound me to the Lord have become for me exceedingly precious, and the glory they have acquired for me is exceedingly great.

PRAYER

Is it possible, O my God and my true lover, that Thou desirest so much my good, and to be loved by me, and that I, miserable that I am, desire so little to love and to please Thee? For what end hast Thou favored me with so many graces, and taken me out of the world? O my Jesus, I understand Thee: Thou lovest me much, Thou wilt have me love Thee much also, and be all Thine, in this life and in the next. Thou wishest that my love should not be divided with creatures, but wilt have it be wholly for Thyself, the only good, the only lovely one, and worthy of infinite love. Ah! My Lord, my treasure, my love, my all, yet I pant and truly desire to love Thee, and to love no other but Thee. I thank Thee for this desire which Thou hast given me; preserve it in me, always increase it in me, and grant that I may please Thee, and love Thee on this earth, as Thou desirest, so that I may come hereafter to love Thee face to face, with all my strength, in paradise. Behold, this is all I ask from Thee; Thee will I love, O my God! I will love Thee, and for Thy love I offer myself to suffer every pain. I will become a saint, not that I may enjoy great delight in heaven, but to please Thee much, O my beloved Lord, and to love Thee much forever. Graciously hear me, O eternal Father, for the love of Jesus Christ. My Mother Mary, for the love of this thy Son, help thou me. Thou art my hope; from thee I hope every good.

CONSIDERATION 6

THE PEACE GOD GIVES GOOD RELIGIOUS TO ENJOY

The promises of God cannot fail; God has said: "Every one that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall possess life everlasting" (Matthew 19:29). That is, the hundredfold on this earth, and life everlasting in heaven.

The peace of the soul is a good which is of greater value than all the kingdoms of the world. And what avails it to have the dominions of the whole world without interior peace? Better is it to be the poorest villager, and to be content, than to be the lord of the whole world, and to live a discontented life. But who can give this peace? The unquiet world? Oh, no; peace is a good that is obtained only from God. "O God!" prays the Church, "give to Thy servants that peace which the world cannot give." Therefore he is called the God of all consolation. But if God is the sole giver of peace, to whom shall we suppose will He give that peace but to those who leave all, and detach themselves from all creatures, in order to give themselves entirely to their Creator? And therefore is it seen, that good religious, shut up in their cells, though mortified, despised, and poor, live a more contented life than the great ones of the world, with all the riches, the pomps and diversions that they enjoy.

St. Scholastica said that if men knew the peace which good religious enjoy, the whole world would become a monastery; and St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi said, that all, if they knew it, would scale the walls of the monasteries in order to enter them. The human heart having been created for an infinite good, all creatures cannot content it, they being finite, imperfect, and few; only God, who is an infinite good, can render it content. "Delight in the Lord, and he will give thee the requests of thy heart" (Psalms 36:4). Oh, no; a good religious united with God envies none of the princes of the world who possess kingdoms, riches, and honors. "Let the rich," he will say with St. Paulinus, "have their riches, the kings have their kingdoms: to me, Christ is my kingdom and my glory." He will see those of the world foolishly glory in their displays and vanities; but he, seeking always to detach himself more from earthly things, always to unite himself more closely to his God, will live contented in this life, and will say: "Some trust in chariots, and some in horses, but we will call upon the name of the Lord, our God" (Psalms 19:8).

St. Teresa said that one drop of heavenly consolation is of greater value than all the pleasures of the world. Father Charles of Lorraine, having become a religious, said that God by one moment of the happiness which he gave him to feel in religion, superabundantly paid him for all he had left for God. Hence his joyfulness was sometimes so great that, when alone in his cell, he could not help beginning to leap. The Blessed Seraphino of Ascoli, a Capuchin lay brother, said that he would not exchange a foot length of his cord for all the kingdoms of the world.

Oh, what content does he find who, having left all for God, is able to say with St. Francis, "My God and my all!" and with that to see himself freed from the servitude of the world, from the thraldom of worldly fashion, and from all earthly affections. This is the liberty enjoyed by the children of God, which good religious are. It is true that in the beginning the deprivation of the conversations and pastimes of the world,. the observances of the Community, and the rules seem to be thorns; but these thorns, as our Lord said to St. Bridget, will all become flowers and delights to him who courageously bears their first stings, and he will taste on this earth that peace which, as St. Paul says, surpasses all the gratifications of the senses, and all the enjoyments of feasts, of banquets, and of the pleasures of the world: "The peace of God, which surpasseth all understanding" (Philippians 4:7). And what greater peace can there be, than to know, that one pleases God?

PRAYER

O my Lord and my God, my all, I know that Thou alone canst make me contented, in this life and in the next. But I will not love Thee for my own contentment; I will love Thee only to content Thy heart. I wish this to be my peace, my only satisfaction during my whole life, to unite my will to Thy holy will, even should I have to suffer every pain in order to do this. Thou art my God, I am Thy creature. And what can I hope for greater than to please Thee, my Lord, my God, who hast been so partial in Thy love towards me? Thou, my Jesus, hast left heaven to live for the love of me a poor and mortified life. I leave all to live only for the love of Thee, my most blessed Redeemer. I love Thee with my whole heart; if only Thou wilt give me the grace to love Thee, treat me as Thou pleasest. O Mary, Mother of my God, protect me and render me like to thee, not in thy glory, which I do not deserve, as thou dost, but in pleasing God, and obeying his holy will, as thou didst.

CONSIDERATION 7

THE DAMAGE DONE TO RELIGIOUS BY TEPIDITY

Consider the misery of that religious who, after having left his home, his parents, and the world with all its pleasures, and after having given himself to Jesus Christ consecrating to him his will and his liberty, exposes himself at last to the danger of being damned, by falling into a lukewarm and negligent life, and continuing therein. Oh, no, not far from perdition is a lukewarm religious who has been called into the house of God to become a saint. God threatens to reject such, and to abandon them, if they do not amend. "But because thou art lukewarm, I will begin to vomit thee out of my mouth" (Apocalypse 3:16).

St. Ignatius of Loyola, seeing a lay brother of his Order become lukewarm in the service of God, called him one day and said to him: Tell me, my brother, why did you come to religion? He answered: To serve God. O my brother! Replied the saint, what have you said? If you had answered that you came to serve a cardinal, or a prince of this earth, you would be more excusable; but you say that you came to serve God, and do you serve him thus?

Father Nieremberg says that some are called by God to be saved only as saints, so that, if they should not take care to live as saints, thinking to be saved as imperfect Christians, they will not be saved at all. And St. Augustine says that such are in most cases abandoned by God: "Negligent souls God is accustomed to abandon." And how does he abandon them? By permitting them from lighter faults, which they see, and do not mind, to fall into grievous ones, and lose divine grace and their vocation. St. Teresa of Jesus saw the place prepared for her in hell, had she not detached herself from an earthly, though not a grievously culpable affection. "He that contemneth small things, shall fall by little and little" (Ecclesiasticus 19:1).

Many wish to follow Jesus Christ, but from afar as St. Peter did, who, when his Master was arrested in the garden, says St. Matthew, "followed him afar off" (Matthew 26:58). But by doing so, that will easily happen to them which happened to St. Peter, namely, that when the occasion came he denied Jesus Christ. A lukewarm religious will be contented with what little he does for God; but God, who called him to a perfect life, will not be contented, and in punishment for his ingratitude will not only deprive him of his special favors, but will sometimes permit his fall. "When you said, It is enough, then you perished." The fig tree of the Gospel was cast into the fire, only because it brought forth no fruit.

Father Louis de Ponte said: "I have committed many faults, but I have never made peace with them." Miserable is that religious who, being called to perfection, makes peace with his defects. As long as we detest our imperfections, there is hope that we may still become saints; but when we commit faults and make little of them, then says St. Bernard, the hope of becoming saints is lost. "He who soweth sparingly, shall also reap sparingly" (2 Corinthians 9:6) Common graces do not suffice to make one a saint, extraordinary ones are necessary; but how will God be liberal with his favors towards the one that acts sparingly and with reserve in his love towards Him?

Moreover, to become a saint one must have courage and strength to overcome all repugnances; and let no one ever believe, says St. Bernard, that he will be able to attain to perfection if he does not render himself singular among others in the practice of virtue. "What is perfect cannot but be singular." Reflect, my brother, for what you left the world and all. To become a saint. But that lukewarm and imperfect life which you lead, is that the way of becoming a saint? St. Teresa animated her daughters by saying to them: My sisters, you have done the principal thing necessary to become saints; the least remains yet to be done. The same I say to you; you have, perhaps, done the chief part already; you have left your country, your home, your parents, your goods, and your amusements; the least remains yet to be done, to become a saint; do it.

PRAYER

O my God, reject me not, as I deserve, for I will amend. I know well that so negligent a life as mine cannot satisfy Thee. I know that I have myself, by my lukewarmness, shut the door against the graces which Thou dost desire to bestow upon me. O Lord! Do not yet abandon me; continue to be merciful towards me; I will rise from this miserable state. I will for the future be more careful to overcome my passions, to follow Thy inspirations, and never will I through slothfulness omit my duties, but I will fulfill them with greater diligence. In a word, I will from this time forward do all that I can to please Thee, and I will neglect nothing that I may know to he pleasing to Thee. Since Thou, O my Jesus! Hast been so liberal with Thy graces towards me, and hast deigned to give Thy blood and Thy life for me. there is no reason I should act with such reserve towards Thee. Thou art worthy of all honor, all love, and to please Thee one should gladly undergo every labor, every pain. But, O my Redeemer! Thou knowest my weakness; help me with Thy powerful grace; in Thee I confide. O Immaculate Virgin Mary! Thou who hast helped me to leave the world, help me to overcome myself and to become a saint.

CONSIDERATION 8

HOW DEAR TO GOD IS A SOUL THAT GIVES ITSELF ENTIRELY TO HIM

God loves all those who love Him: "I love them that love me." (Proverbs 8:17). Many, however, give themselves to God, but preserve still in their hearts some attachment to creatures, which prevents them from belonging entirely to God. How then shall God give Himself entirely to him who, besides his God, loves creatures still? It is just that He should act with reserve towards those who act with reserve towards him. On the contrary, He gives Himself entirely to those souls who, driving from their hearts every thing that is not, God, and does not lead them to His love, and giving themselves to Him without reserve, truly say to Him "My God and my all." St. Teresa, as long as she entertained an inordinate affection, though not an impure one, could not hear from Jesus Christ what afterwards she heard, when, freeing herself from every attachment, she gave herself entirely to the divine love, namely, the Lord saying to her: "Now, because thou art all mine, I am all thine."

Consider that the Son of God has already given Himself entirely to us: "A Child is born to us, and a Son is given to us" (Isaias 9:6). He has given Himself to us through the love He bears to us. "He hath loved us, and hath delivered himself for us" (Ephesians 5:2). It is then just, says St. John Chrysostom, that when a God has given Himself to you without reserve, "He has given thee all nothing has He left to Himself," you also should give yourself to God without reserve, and that always henceforth, burning with divine love, you should sing to Him:

Thine wholly always will I be:
Thou hast bestowed Thyself on me;
Wholly I give myself to Thee.

St. Teresa revealed to one of her nuns appearing to her after her death, that God loves one soul who, as a spouse, gives herself entirely to Him, more than a thousand tepid and imperfect ones. From these generous souls, given entirely to God, is the choir of Seraphim completed. The Lord himself says, that He loves a soul, who attends to her perfection, so much, that He seems not to love any other. "One is my dove; my perfect one is but one" (Canticles 6:8). Hence Blessed Giles exhorted us: "One for one;" by which he wished to say, that this one soul we have we should give wholly, not divided, to that one who alone deserves all love, on whom depends all our good, and who loves us more than all. "Leave all, and you shall find all," says Thomas a Kempis. Leave all for God, and in God you shall find all. "O soul," concludes St. Bernard, "be alone, that you may keep yourself for Him alone." Keep yourself alone, give no part of your affections to creatures, that you may belong only to Him who alone deserves an infinite love, and whom alone you should love.

PRAYER

"My Beloved to me, and I to him" (Canticles 2:16). As then, O my God! Thou hast given Thyself entirely to me, I should be too ungrateful if I should not give myself entirely to Thee; since Thou wouldst have me belong wholly to Thee, behold, O my Lord! I give myself entirely to Thee. Accept me through Thy mercy; disdain me not. Grant that this my heart, which once loved creatures, may turn now wholly to Thy infinite goodness. "Let me hence forth die," said St. Teresa; "let another than myself live in me. Let God live in me, and give me life. Let Him reign, and let me be His slave, for my soul wishes no other liberty." This my heart is too small, O God most worthy of love, and it is too little able to love Thee, who art deserving of an infinite love. I should then commit against Thee too great an injustice, should I still divide it by loving anything besides Thee. I love Thee, my God, above every thing. I love only Thee, I renounce all creatures, and give myself entirely to Thee, my Jesus, my Saviour, my love, my all. I say, and always will say: "What have I in heaven, and besides thee. what do I desire on earth?. . Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever" (Psalms 72:26). I desire nothing, either in this life or in the next, but to possess the treasure of Thy love. God of my heart, I am unwilling that creatures should have any more a place in my heart; Thou alone must be its master. To Thee alone shall it belong for the future. Thou alone shalt be my God, my repose, my desire, all my love. I say with St. Ignatius: "Give me only Thy love and Thy grace, and I am rich enough." O most holy Virgin Mary, obtain for me this, that I may be faithful to God, and never recall the donation that I have made of myself to him.

ONE MUST HAVE A GREAT DESIRE FOR BECOMING A SAINT

No saint has ever attained to sanctity without a great desire. As wings are necessary to birds in order to fly, so holy desires are necessary to the soul in order to advance in the road to perfection. To become saints, we must detach ourselves from creatures, conquer our passions, overcome ourselves, and love crosses. But to do all this, much strength is required, and we must suffer much. But what is the effect of holy desire? St. Laurence Justinian answers us: "It supplies strength, and makes the pain easier to be borne." Hence the same saint adds, that he has already vanquished who has a great desire of vanquishing: "A great part of the victory is the desire of vanquishing." He who wishes to reach the top of a high mountain will never reach it if he has not a great desire to do so. This will give him courage and strength to undergo the fatigue of ascending, otherwise he will stop at the foot wearied and discouraged.

St. Bernard asserts that we acquire perfection in proportion to the, desire for it which we preserve in our heart, and St. Teresa said that God loves, generous souls that have great desires, for which reason the saint exhorted all in this way: "Let our thoughts be high, . . . for thence will come our good. We must not have low and little desires, but have that confidence in God, that, if we make the proper efforts, we shall by little and little attain to that perfection which, with His grace, the saints have reached." In this way the saints attained, in a short time, to a great degree of perfection, and were able to do great things for God. "Being made perfect in a short time, he fulfilled a long time" (Wisdom. 4:13).

Thus St. Aloysius Gonzaga attained in a few years (he lived not over twenty three years) to such a degree of sanctity, that St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi, in an ecstasy, seeing him in heaven, said, it seemed to her in a certain way that there was no saint in heaven who enjoyed a greater glory than Aloysius; and she understood at the same time that he had arrived at so high a degree by the great desire he had cherished of being able to love God as much as He deserved, and that seeing this beyond his reach, the holy youth had suffered on earth a martyrdom of love.

St. Bernard, being in religion, in order to excite his fervor used to say to himself: "Bernard, for what did you come here?" I say the same to you: What have you come to do in the house of God? To become a saint? And what are you doing? Why do you lose the time? Tell me, do you desire to become a saint? If you do not, it is certain you will never become one. If, then, you have not this desire, ask Jesus Christ for it, ask Mary for it. And if you have it, take courage, says St. Bernard, for many do not become saints, because they do not take courage. And so I repeat it, let us take courage, and great courage.

What do we fear? What inspires this diffidence in us? That Lord who has given us strength to leave the world will give us also the grace to embrace the life of a saint. Everything comes to an end. Our life, be it a contented or a discontented one, will also come to an end, but eternity will never terminate. Only that little we have done for God will console us in death and throughout eternity. The fatigue will be short, eternal shall be the crown, which is already, so to speak, before our eyes. How satisfied are the saints now with all that they have suffered for God! If a sorrow could enter paradise, the blessed would be sorry for this alone, that they have neglected to do for God what they might have done more, but which now they are unable to do. Take courage then, and be prompt, for there is no time to lose; What can be done today, we may not be able to do tomorrow. St. Bernardine of Siena said that one moment of time is of as great a value as God himself, for at every moment we may gain God, his divine grace, and higher degrees of merits.

PRAYER

Behold, O my God, here I am. "My heart is ready, O God, my heart is ready" (Psalms 56:8). See, I am prepared to do all Thou shalt require of me. "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" (Acts Of Apostles 9:6) Tell me, O Lord, what Thou desirest of me. I will obey Thee in all. I am sorry for having lost so much time in which I might have pleased Thee, and yet have not done so. I thank Thee, that still Thou givest me time to do so. Oh, no, I will not lose any more time. I will and desire to become a saint, not to obtain from Thee a greater glory and more delights. I will become a saint, that I may love Thee more, and to please Thee in this life and in the next. Make me, O Lord! To love and please Thee as much as Thou desirest. Behold, this is all that I ask of Thee, O my God! I will love Thee, I will love Thee, and in order to love Thee I offer myself to undergo every fatigue and to suffer every pain. O my Lord! Increase in me always this desire, and give me the grace to execute it. Of myself I can do nothing, but assisted by Thee I can do all. Eternal Father, for the love of Jesus Christ, graciously hear Inc. My Jesus, through the merits of Thy Passion, come to my succor. O Mary, my hope, for the love of Jesus Christ, protect me.

CONSIDERATION 10

THE LOVE WE OWE TO JESUS CHRIST

In order to understand the love that the Son of God has borne to us, it is enough to consider what St. Paul says of Jesus Christ: "He emptied himself, taking the form of a servant. . . . He humbled himself, becoming obedient even to the death of the cross" (Philippians 2:7,8). "He emptied himself." O God, what admiration has it caused, and will it cause throughout eternity,. to the angels, to see a God who became man for the love of man, and submitted himself to all the weaknesses and sufferings of man! "And the Word was made flesh" (John 1:14). What a cause of astonishment would it not be to see a king become a worm for the sake of worms! But an infinitely greater wonder it is, to see a God made man, and after this to see him humbled unto the painful and infamous death of the cross on which he finished his most holy life. Moses and Elias, on Mount Thabor, speaking of his death, as it is related in the Gospel, called it an excess: "They spoke of his decease [the Latin word is excesses, which also means excess], that he should accomplish in Jerusalem" (Luke 9:31). Yea, says St. Bonaventure, it is with reason the death of Jesus Christ was called an excess, for it was an excess of suffering and of love, such that it would be impossible to believe it if it had not already happened. An excess of love, adds St. Augustine; for to this end the Son of God would come on earth, to live a life so laborious and to die a death so bitter, namely, that he might make known to man how much He loved him. "Therefore Christ came, that man should know how much God loved him."

The Lord revealed to his servant Armella Nicolas that the love that he bore to man was the cause of all His sufferings and His death. If Jesus Christ had not been God, but only a man, and our friend, what greater love could he have shown us, than to die for us? "Greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John 15:13). Ah, how at the thought of the love shown us by Jesus Christ the saints esteemed it little to give their life and their all for so loving a God! How many youths, how many noblemen, are there not, who have left their house, their country, their riches, their parents and all, to retire into cloisters, to live only for the love of Jesus Christ! How many young virgins, renouncing their nuptials with princes, and the great ones of the world, have gone with joyfulness to death, to render thus some compensation for the love of a God who had been executed on an infamous gibbet, and died for their sake!

This appeared to St. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi to be foolishness: hence she called her Jesus a fool of love. In exactly the same manner the Gentiles, as St. Paul attests, hearing the death of Jesus Christ preached to them, thought it foolishness not possible to be believed. "We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews indeed a stumbling block, and unto the Gentiles foolishness" (1 Corinthians 1:23). How is it possible, they said, that a God most happy in Himself, who is in want of nothing, should die for the sake of man, His servant? This would be as much as to believe that God became a fool for the love of men. Nevertheless it is of faith, that Jesus Christ, the true Son of God, did, for love of us, deliver Himself up to death. "He hath loved us, and hath delivered himself for us" (Ephesians 5:2). The same Mary Magdalene had reason then to exclaim, lamenting the ingratitude of men towards so loving a God: "O love not known! O love not loved!" Indeed, Jesus Christ is not loved by men, because they live in forgetfulness of His love.

And, in fact, a soul that considers a God. who died for its sake, cannot live without loving him. "The charity of Christ presseth us" (2 Corinthians 5:14). The soul will feel itself inflamed, and as if constrained to love a God who has loved it so much. Jesus Christ could have saved us, says Father Nieremberg, with only one drop of His blood; but it was His will to shed all His blood, and to give His divine life, that at the sight of so many sufferings and of His death we might not content ourselves with an ordinary love, but be sweetly constrained to love with all our strength a God so full of love towards us. "That they also who live may not now live to themselves, but unto Him who died for them"

PRAYER

Indeed, O my Jesus, my Lord, and my Redeemer! Only too much hast Thou obliged me to love Thee, too much my love has cost Thee. I should be too ungrateful if I should content myself to love with reserve a God who has given me His blood, His life, and His entire self. Oh, Thou hast died for me, Thy poor servant: it is but just that I should die for Thee, my God and my all. Yes, O my Jesus! I detach myself from all, to give myself to Thee. I put away from me the love of all creatures, in order to consecrate myself entirely to Thy love. "My beloved is chosen from among thousands" (Canticles 5:10). I choose Thee alone out of all things for my good, my treasure, and my only love. I love Thee O my love! I love Thee. Thou art not satisfied that I should love Thee a little only. Thou art not willing to have me love anything besides Thee. Thee I will please in all things, Thee will I love much, and Thou shalt be my only love. My God, my God, help me, that I may fully please Thee. Mary, my queen, do thou also help me to love my God much. Amen. So I hope so may it be.

CONSIDERATION 11

THE GREAT HAPPINESS WHICH RELIGIOUS ENJOY

The Venerable Mother Mary of Jesus, foundress of a convent in Toulouse, said that she esteemed very much her lot as a religious, for two principal reasons. The first was, that religious, through the vow of obedience, belong entirely to God; and the second, that they have the privilege of dwelling always with Jesus Christ in the Blessed Sacrament. And in truth, if people of the world deem it so great a favor to he invited by kings to dwell in their palaces, how much more favored should we esteem ourselves, who are admitted to dwell continually with the King of heaven in His own house?

In houses of religious Jesus Christ dwells for their sake in the church, so that they can find Him at all hours. Persons of the world can scarcely go to visit Him during the day, and in many places only in the morning. But the religious find Him in the tabernacle as often as they wish in the morning, in the afternoon, and during the night. There they may continually converse with their Lord, and there Jesus Christ rejoices to converse familiarly with His beloved servants, whom, for this end, He has called out of Egypt, that He may be their companion during this life, hidden under the veil of the Most Holy Sacrament, and in the next unveiled in paradise. "O solitude!" It may be said of every religious house, "in which God familiarly speaks and converses with his friends." The souls that love Jesus Christ much, do not know how to wish for any other paradise on this earth than to be in the presence of their Lord, who dwells in this sacrament for the love of those that seek and visit Him.

"His conversation hath no bitterness, nor his company any tediousness" (Wisdom 8:16). He finds tediousness in the company of Jesus Christ, who does not love Him. But those who on this earth have given all their love to Jesus Christ, find in the sacrament all their pleasure, their rest, their paradise; and therefore they keep their hearts always mindful to visit, as often as they can, their God in the sacrament, to pay their court to him, giving vent to their affections at the foot of the altar, offering Him their afflictions, their desires of loving Him, of seeing Him face to face, and in the mean time of pleasing Him in all things.

PRAYER

Behold me in Thy presence, O my Jesus, hidden in the sacrament! Thou art the self same Jesus who for me didst sacrifice Thyself on the cross. Thou art He who lovest me so much, and who hast therefore confined Thyself in this prison of love. Amongst so many, who have offended Thee less than I, and who have loved Thee better than I, Thou hast chosen me in Thy goodness to keep Thee company in this house, where, having drawn me from the midst of the world, Thou hast destined me always to live united with Thee, and afterwards to have me nigh Thee to praise and to love Thee in Thy eternal kingdom. O Lord! I thank Thee. How have I deserved this happy lot? "I have chosen to be an abject in the house of my God, rather than to dwell in the tabernacles of sinners" (Psalms 83:11). Happy indeed am I, O my Jesus! To have left the world; and it is my great desire to perform the vilest office in Thy house, rather than dwell in the proudest royal palaces of men. Receive me then, O Lord, to stay with Thee all my life long; do not chase me away, as I deserve. Be pleased to allow, that among the many good brothers who serve Thee in this house, I, though I am a miserable sinner, may serve Thee also. Many years already have I lived far from Thee. But now that Thou hast enlightened me to know the vanity of the world, and my own foolishness, I will not depart any more from Thy feet, O my Jesus! Thy presence shall animate me to fight when I am tempted. The nearness of Thy abode shall remind me of the obligation I am under to love Thee, and always to have recourse to Thee in my combats against hell. I will always keep near to Thee, that I may unite myself to Thee, and attach myself closer to Thee. I love Thee, O my God! Hidden in this sacrament. Thou for the love of me remainest always on this altar. I, for the love of Thee, will always remain in Thy presence as much as I shall be able. There enclosed Thou always lovest me and here enclosed I will always love Thee. Always then, O my Jesus, my love, my all! Shall we remain together, in time in this house and during eternity in paradise. This is my hope; so may it be. Most holy Mary, obtain for me a greater love for the Most Holy Sacrament.

THE LIFE OF RELIGIOUS RESEMBLES THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST

The Apostle says that the eternal Father predestinates to the kingdom of heaven those only who live conformably to the life of the incarnate Word: "Whom he foreknew, he also predestinated to be made conformable to the image of his Son" (Romans 8:29). How happy, then, and secure of paradise should not religious be, seeing that God has called them to a state of life which of all states is the most conformed to the life of Jesus Christ. Jesus on this earth wished to live poor as the son and helpmate of a mechanic, in a poor dwelling, with poor clothing and poor food: "Being rich, he became poor for your sake, that through his poverty you might be rich" (2 Corinthians 8:9). Moreover, He chose a life the most entirely mortified, far from the delights of the world, and always full of pain and sorrow, from His birth to His death: hence by the prophet he was called "The Man of sorrows" (Isaias 53:3). By this he wished to give his servants to understand what should be the life of those who wished to follow him: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me" (Matthew 16:24). According to this example, and to this invitation of Jesus Christ, the saints have endeavored to dispossess themselves of all earthly goods, and to load themselves with pains and crosses, in order thus to follow Christ, their beloved Lord. Thus acted St. Benedict, who, being the son of the lord of Noricia, and a relative of the Emperor Justinian, and born amidst the riches and the pleasures of the world, while yet a youth of only fourteen years went to live in a cavern on Mount Subiaco, where he received no other sustenance but a piece of bread brought him every day as an alms by the hermit Romanus.

So acted St. Francis of Assisi, who renounced in favor of his father the whole lawful portion of his inheritance, even to the shirt he had on his back, and thus, poor and mortified, consecrated himself to Jesus Christ. Thus St. Francis Borgia, St. Aloysius Gonzaga, the one being duke of Candia, the other of Castiglione, left all their riches, their estates, their vassals, their country, their house, their parents, and went to live a poor life in religion.

So have acted many other noblemen and princes, even of royal blood. Blessed Zedmerra, daughter of the king of Ethiopia, renounced the kingdom to become a Dominican nun. Blessed Johanna of Portugal renounced the kingdom of France and England to become a nun. In the Benedictine Order alone there are found twenty five emperors, and seventy five kings and queens, who left the world to live poor, mortified, and forgotten by the world in a poor cloister. Ah! Indeed, these and not the grandees of the world are the truly fortunate ones.

At present, worldlings think these to be fools, but in the valley of Josaphat they shall know that they themselves have been the fools; and when they see the saints on their thrones crowned by God, they shall say, lamenting and in despair: "These are they whom we had sometime in derision. . . . We fools esteemed their life madness. . . . Behold how they are numbered among the children of God, and their lot is among the saints" (Wisdom 5:3, and seq.).

PRAYER

Ah! My Master and my Redeemer, Jesus, I am then of the number of those fortunate ones whom Thou hast called to follow Thee. O my Lord! I thank Thee for this. I leave all; I would I had more to leave, that I might draw near to Thee, my King and my God, who for the love of me, and to give me courage by Thy example, hast chosen for Thyself a life so poor and so painful. Walk on, O Lord! I will follow Thee. Choose Thou for me what cross Thou wilt, and help me. I will always carry it with constancy and love. I regret that for the past I have abandoned Thee, to follow my lusts and the vanities of the world, but now I will leave Thee no more. Bind me to Thy cross, and if through weakness I sometimes resist, draw me by the sweet bonds of Thy love. Suffer it not that I should ever leave Thee again. Yes, my Jesus, I renounce all the satisfactions of the world: my only satisfaction shall be to continue to love Thee, and to suffer all that pleases Thee. I hope thus to come myself one day in Thy kingdom, to be united to Thee by that bond of eternal love, where, loving Thee in Thy revealed glory, I need no more fear to be loosed and separated from Thee. I love Thee, O my God, my all! And will always love Thee. Behold my hope, O most holy Mary, thou who, because the most conformed to Jesus, art now the most powerful to obtain this grace. Be thou my protectress!

CONSIDERATION 13

THE ZEAL WHICH RELIGIOUS SHOULD HAVE FOR SOULS

He who is called to the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer will never be a true follower of Jesus Christ, and will never become a saint, if he fulfills not the end of his vocation, and has not the spirit of the Institute, which is the salvation of souls, and of those souls who are the most destitute of spiritual succor, such as the poor people in the country.

This was truly the end for which our Redeemer came down from heaven, who protests "The Spirit of the Lord . . . hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor" (Luke 4:18). He sought no other proof of Peter's love for him but this, that he should procure the salvation of souls: "Simon, son of John, lovest thou me? . . . feed my lambs" (John 21:17). He did not impose upon him, says St. John Chrysostom, penance, prayers, or other things, but only that he should endeavor to save his lambs: "Christ said not to him, Throw your money away, practice fasting, fatigue your body with hard work; but he said: Feed my lambs." And he declares that he would look upon every benefit conferred on the least of our neighbors as conferred on himself: "Amen, I say to you, as long as you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it to me" (Matthew 25:40).

Every religious should, therefore, with the utmost care entertain within himself this zeal, and this spirit of helping souls. To this end every one should direct his studies, and when he shall afterwards have been assigned to his work by his Superiors, he should give to it all his thoughts, and his whole attention. He could not call himself a true member of this Congregation who, through the desire of attending only to himself and of leading a retired and solitary life, would not accept with all affection such an employment when imposed on him by obedience.

What greater glory can a man have, than to be, as St. Paul says, a cooperator with God in this great work of the salvation of souls? He who loves the Lord ardently, is not content to be alone in loving him: he would draw all to his love, saying with David: "O magnify the Lord with me, and let us extol his name together" (Psalms 33:4). Hence St. Augustine exhorts all those who love God, "If you love God, draw all men to His love."

A good ground to hope for his own salvation has he who with true zeal labors for the salvation of souls. "Have you saved a soul," says St. Augustine:

"then you have predestinated your own."

The Holy Ghost promises us: "When thou shalt pour out thy soul to the hungry: "When thou shalt have labored for the welfare of a poor man; "and shalt satisfy the afflicted soul: "And by thy labor shalt have filled him (with divine grace); "the Lord will give thee rest continually, and will fill thy soul with brightness:" The Lord will fill thee with light and peace (Isaias 58:10,11). In this, namely, in procuring the salvation of others, St. Paul placed his hope of eternal salvation, when he said to his disciples of Thessalonica: "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of glory? Are not you, in the presence of Our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?" (1 Thessalonians 2:19)

PRAYER

O my Lord Jesus Christ! How can I thank Thee enough, since Thou hast called me to the same work that Thou didst Thyself on earth, namely, to go with my poor exertions and help souls to their salvation. How have I deserved this honor and this reward, after having offended Thee so grievously, and been the cause to others also of offending Thee? Yes, O my Lord! Thou callest me to help Thee in this great undertaking. I will serve Thee with all my strength. Behold, I offer Thee all my labor, and even my blood, in order to obey Thee. Nor do I by this aspire to satisfy my own inclination, or to gain applause and esteem from men: I desire nothing but to see Thee loved by all, as Thou deservest. I prize my happy lot, and call myself fortunate, that Thou hast chosen me for this great work, in,which I protest that I will renounce all praises of men, and all self satisfaction, and will only seek Thy glory. To Thee be all the honor and satisfaction, and to me only the discomforts, the blame, and the reproaches. Accept, O Lord! This offering, which I, a miserable sinner, who wishes to love "Thee and to see Thee loved by others, make of myself to Thee, and give me strength to execute it. Most holy Mary, my advocate, who lovest souls so much, help me.

CONSIDERATION 14

THE NECESSITY OF HAVING MEEKNESS AND HUMILITY

Our most lovely Redeemer Jesus willed to be called a lamb for this very reason that He might show us how meek and humble He was Himself. These were the virtues which He principally wished His followers should learn from Him: "Learn from me, because I am meek and humble of heart" (Matthew 11:29).

And these virtues He principally requires from religious, who profess to imitate His most holy life. He who lives as a solitary in a desert has not so much need of these virtues; but for him who lives in a Community, it is impossible not to meet now and then with a reprimand from his Superiors, or something disagreeable from his companions. In such cases a religious who loves not meekness will commit a thousand faults every day, and live an unquiet life. He must be all sweetness with everybody, with strangers, with companions, and also with inferiors, if he should ever become Superior; and if he is an inferior, he must consider that one act of meekness in bearing contempt and reproach is of greater value to him than a thousand fasts and a thousand disciplines.

St. Francis said that many make their perfection consist in exterior mortifications, and after all are not able to bear one injurious word. "Not understanding," he added, "how much greater gain is made by patiently bearing injuries." How many persons, as St. Bernard remarks, are all sweetness when nothing is said or done contrary to their inclination, but show their want of meekness, when anything crosses them! And if one should ever be Superior, let him, believe that one reprimand made with meekness will profit his subjects more than a thousand made with severity. "The meek are useful to themselves and to others," as St. John Chrysostom teaches. In a word, as the same saint said, the greatest sign of a virtuous soul is, to see it meek on occasions of contradiction. A meek heart is the pleasure of the heart of God. "That which is agreeable to him is faith and meekness" (Ecclesiasticus 1:34). It would be well for a religious to represent to himself in his meditations all the contrarieties that may happen to him, and thus arm himself against them; and then when the occasion happens, he should do violence to himself, that he may not be excited, and break out in impatience. Therefore he should refrain from speaking, when his mind is disturbed, till he is certain that he has become calm again. But to bear injuries quietly, it is above all necessary to have a great fund of humility. He who is truly humble is not only unmoved when he sees himself despised, but is even pleased and rejoices at it in spirit, however the flesh may resent it; for he sees himself treated as he deserves, and made conformable to Jesus Christ, who, worthy as He was of every honor, chose for the love of us to He satiated with contempt and injuries. Brother Juniper, a disciple of St. Francis, when an injury was done to him, held up his cowl, as if he expected to receive pearls falling from heaven. The saints have been more desirous of injuries than worldlings are covetous of applause and honor. And of what use is a religious who does not know how to bear contempt for God's sake? He is always proud, and only humble in name and a hypocrite, whom divine grace will repulse, as the Holy Ghost says: "God resisteth the proud, but to the humble he giveth grace" (1 Peter 5:5).

PRAYER

O my most humble Jesus, who for the love of me, didst humble Thyself, and become obedient unto the death of the cross: how have I the courage to appear before Thee, and call myself Thy follower? For I see myself to be such a sinner and so proud, that I cannot bear a single injury without resenting it. Whence can come such pride in me, who for my sins have so many times deserved to be cast forever into hell with the devils? Ah, my despised Jesus, help me and make me conformable to Thee. I will change my life. Thou for love of me hast borne so much contempt; I for love of Thee will hear every injury. Thou, O my Redeemer! Hast rendered contempt too honorable and desirable. Since Thou hast embraced it with so much love during Thy own life. "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Galatians 6:14). O my most humble mistress Mary, mother of God! Thou who wast in all, and especially in suffering, the most conformed to thy Son, obtain for me the grace to hear in peace all injuries which henceforward shall be offered to me. Amen.

CONSIDERATION 15

HOW MUCH RELIGIOUS SHOULD CONFIDE IN THE PATRONAGE OF MARY

If it is true and most true it is that, according to the saying of St. Peter Damian, the divine mother, the most holy Mary, loves all men with such an affection, that after God there is not, nor can there be, any one who surpasses or equals her in her love: "She loves us with an invincible love," how much must we think this great queen loves religious who have consecrated their liberty, their life, and their all to the love of Jesus Christ. She sees well enough that the life of such as these is more conformable to her own life, and to that of her divine Son; she sees them often occupied in praising her, and continually attentive to honor her by their novenas, visits, rosaries, fasts, etc. She beholds them often at her feet, intent on invoking her aid, asking graces of her, and graces all conformed to her holy desires, i.e., the grace of perseverance in the divine service, of strength in their temptations, of detachment from this world, and of love towards God. Ah, how can we doubt that she employs all her power and her mercy for the benefit of religious, and especially of those who belong to this holy Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, in which, as it is well known, we make special profession of honoring the Virgin Mother by visits, by fasting on Saturdays, by special mortifications during her novenas, etc., and by everywhere promoting devotion to her by sermons and novenas in her honor.

She, the great mistress, is grateful. "I love those who love me" (Proverbs 8:17). Yes, she is so grateful, that, as St. Andrew of Crete says: "To him who does her the least service she is accustomed to return great favors." She promises liberally those who love her and who promote her honor among others, to deliver them from sin. "Those that work by me shall not sin." She also promises to them paradise. "Those that explain me, shall have life everlasting." For which reason we especially should thank God for having called us to this Congregation, in which by the usages of the Community and the example of our companions we are often reminded, and in some way constrained, to have recourse to Mary, and continually to honor this our most loving mother, who is called, and is, the joy, the hope, the life, and the salvation of those who invoke and honor her.

PRAYER

My most beloved, most lovely, and most loving Queen, I always thank my Lord and thee, who hast not only drawn me out of the world, but also called me to live in this Congregation, where a special devotion to thee is practiced. Accept of me, then, my mother, to serve thee. A mong so many of thy beloved sons do not scorn to let me serve thee also, miserable though I am. Thou after God shalt be always my hope and my love. In all my wants, in all my tribulations and temptations, I will always have recourse to thee; thou shalt be my refuge, my consolation. I am unwilling that any but God and thou shouldst comfort me in my combats, in the sadness and the tediousness of this life. For thy service I renounce all the kingdoms of the whole world. My kingdom on this earth shall be to serve, bless, and love thee, O my most lovely mistress, "whom to serve is to reign." Thou art the mother of perseverance; obtain for me to be faithful to thee until death. By so doing I hope, and firmly hope, one day to come where thou reignest, to praise and bless thee forever, to depart no more from thy holy feet. Jesus and Mary I protest with your loving servant Alphonsus Rodriguez, "my most sweet loves, let me suffer for you, let me die for you, let me be all yours, and not all my own."

EXHORTATION TO RELIGIOUS

God has especially chosen religious from among the men of the world, that they may spread His glory and love Him with a love more particular and pure than that which they bear to Him, who live in the world, occupied in its affairs. To this end has the Lord, by a special vocation, drawn them out of the darkness of Egypt, and freed them from the love of the world; and so moved by divine grace, they have consecrated themselves to God by their holy vows, renouncing all the goods that this world promises and gives to its followers. And therefore it is, that each monastery of religious, which is found on earth, should be considered as a company of men, who, detached from every earthly thought, are mindful of nothing but to live only for God, so that God may glory in them and say: These are all mine, they are my delight.

But, I ask, can the Lord nowadays say of all the religious now living, they are my delight? Alas! The Church laments, because she sees in her religious a general relaxation of spirit, united with a great coldness in the service of God. It cannot be denied, that, amongst so many, there are some who live as good religious, free from worldly attachments, intent on becoming saints and bringing souls to God. There are such, whom I call judges, who shall, one day, in the Valley of Josaphat, judge their brethren; but these good religious, these judges, how many are they? O God! They are too few, it is evident enough, and therefore the Church laments with all those that love the glory of God.

It is not becoming to my littleness to talk here as a censor, and to note down the defects into which nowadays religious commonly fall, whereby, instead of giving edification by their example, they are the objects of talk, and give scandal to others. But some one will say: You, who set up for a reformer, tell us what those common defects are. Tell us what we have to do to be good religious. I answer, I pretend not to reform the world, and therefore will not undertake to declare in particular the faults that have nowadays become common. To you who ask me thus, I say only that you know full well what you have to do in order to be a good religious; in your novitiate you were fully instructed by good masters in the practice of the virtues which you had afterwards to practice in religion, that is, obedience, detachment from earthly affections, the love of poverty the abnegation of yourself, the desire of being humbled, and those other virtues that are necessary to live as a good religious. But since in these times lukewarmness and relaxation have become general, and since religious pay little attention to the obligations of their state, as a consequence they care little about mending these defects. Oh, would to God that all religious might preserve at least the half of that good life they began to lead in their novitiate! For the most part, the novices who persevere to make their profession, live in fervor of spirit and give edification; but the evil is, that, after having made the vows, and applied themselves to their studies, they at once begin to grow lukewarm, and neglect to preserve the spirit they acquired and to put in execution the good resolutions which they made in the novitiate, so that, as time goes on, they fall more and more from it every day, and multiply their faults.

When afterwards they are appointed to teach others, this relaxation increases; thenceforward they are little solicitous to do anything for the glory of God, but think only of advancing their own interest by pressing on to higher stations, so as then to be able to live a life of less subjection, and greater comfort.

It was with the best intention that religious Orders have established these degrees, through which the religious must advance, in order by instructing the ignorant and arousing the lukewarm to fervor, to promote the good of souls. But the misfortune is, that with many religious the means have become the end, for by the lapse of time they think less of the good of religion and of souls than of their own temporal advantage. I protest again that I do not pretend to play the reformer, but I see that from this spring up in the religious Orders all kinds of ambition, and in consequence every species of spiritual decay. Hence I conclude, that it would be much better were the masters, after having finished their course, to remain in the same humble degree in which they were when they came out of the novitiate. For then each one would think of fulfilling the duties of his office, not for private ends, but only to accomplish the will of God, and to obey his Superiors. But on becoming teachers they get a better room, other comforts and preeminences, and this is the reason why so few religious make progress in spirit, and give to others the edification that they should; and thence it comes that all good persons lament, when they see that general relaxation in the Orders, which is now but too evident to all. Where shall we, generally speaking, nowadays find in religious the spirit of obedience, of poverty, of mortification, of interior abnegation? Where the love for solitude, for a hidden life, the desire of being despised, which we find in the saints? These kinds of virtue have become strange things, and even the name of them seems to be lost!

But what would be the remedy for so great and universal an evil? What shall I say? The remedy has to come from heaven, and therefore we should pray to the Lord that He may in His mercy remedy it by His own power; because, as the good spirit of religious communicates itself to seculars, so do they also participate in their relaxation. I, for my part, believe that this decay in the religious Orders comes for the most part from the want and neglect of mental prayer, and this comes from the want of retirement and recollection. Experience shows too well that the more certain persons treat with men, the less they desire to treat with God; and the more they become familiar with the world, the more God retires from them. "Willingly would I," said our Lord one day to St. Teresa, "speak to many souls, but the world makes so much noise in their hearts, that my voice cannot he heard." Immersed. as many religious are, in the affairs of the world, they think little of uniting themselves more closely to God. They would like to get out of the mire of their tepidity, and free themselves from the earthly attachments in which they find themselves entangled; but their passions, which they make no effort to overcome, always draw them downwards, and thus they lose the love of mental prayer.

The old monks gave much time to mental prayer, and in this way they became saints; and, by the edification that they gave, they also sanctified others. But nowadays all fails, because the spirit of prayer is wanting, and therefore religious are without humility, without detachment from the world, and without love of God; and the love of God being wanting, as a consequence other virtues are wanting too. Let us, then, beseech Jesus Christ, who alone, is able to remedy so great an evil; let us beseech him to infuse into religious his holy love, and the desire of becoming saints. For it seems that religious at present have even lost the desire of becoming saints. Every one sees the need there is of a general reform in the religious Orders, in the priests, and in the seculars. As the corruption of manners has everywhere become so general, we should repeat every day the prayer of David, which in these times is much to the purpose: "O Lord, the vineyard, Thy Church, planted by Thy Son, at the cost of his Blood, is in ruin on all sides: visit and restore it; Thou, who alone canst restore it" (Psalms 79:15).

ANSWER TO A YOUNG MAN

I read in your letter that some time ago you felt inspired by God to become a religious, and that afterwards many doubts arose in your mind, and especially this one, that, without becoming a religious, you might sanctify yourself also in the world.

I will answer your letter briefly, for, should you wish to read something more complete, you can read a little work of mine, which has already been printed, under the title "Counsels concerning Religious Vocation," in which I have treated this matter more fully. Here I will only say, briefly, that this point of the choice of a state of life is of the greatest importance, as upon it depends our eternal salvation. He who chooses the state to which God calls him will save himself with facility: and for him who does not obey the divine call it will be difficult yes, morally impossible to save himself. The greatest number of those who are damned, are damned for not having corresponded to the call of God.

In order, therefore, that you may be able to choose that state which will be the surest for attaining eternal salvation, consider that your soul is immortal, and that the only end for which God has placed you in this world was, not certainly that you may acquire money and honors on this earth, and thus live a comfortable and delightful life, but that by holy virtues you may merit eternal life. "and the end life everlasting" (Romans 5:22). In the day of judgment it will avail you nothing to have advanced your family, and to have made a figure in the world; it will only avail you to have served and loved Jesus Christ, who is to be your judge.

You have a thought which tells you that you will also be able to sanctify yourself by remaining in the world. Yes, my dear sir, you will be able; but it is difficult, and if you are truly called by God to the religious state, and yet remain in the world, it is, as I have said above, morally impossible, because those helps will be denied you which God has prepared for you in religion, and without them you will not save yourself. To sanctify yourself it is necessary for you to employ the means, such as, to avoid evil occasions, to remain detached from earthly goods, to live a life recollected in God; and to maintain this, it is necessary to receive the sacraments frequently, to make your meditation, your spiritual reading, and to perform other devout exercises every day, otherwise it is impossible to preserve the spirit of fervor. Now, it is difficult, not to say impossible, to practice all this in the midst of the noise and the disturbances of the world; for family affairs, the necessities of the house, the complaints of parents, the quarrels and persecutions with which the world is so full, will keep your mind so occupied by cares and fears that you will barely be able in the evening to recommend yourself to God, and even this will be done with many distractions. You would wish to make your meditation, to read spiritual books, to receive Holy Communion often, to visit every day the Sacrament of the altar; but from all this you will be prevented by the affairs of the world, and the little you do will be imperfect, because it is done in the midst of a thousand distractions, and with coldness of heart. Your life will then be always unquiet, and your death more unquiet still. On one side, worldly friends will not fail to inspire you with a fear of embracing the religious life, as being a hard life and full of troubles. On the other, the world offers you amusements, money, and a contented life. Reflect well, and do not allow yourself to be led into error. Be persuaded that the world is a traitor that makes promises and does not care about the fulfillment of them. It offers you indeed all these earthly things, but suppose it should give them to you, could it also give you peace of soul? No, God only can give true peace. The soul is created only for God, to love Him in this life and to enjoy Him in the next, and therefore God only can content it. All the pleasures and riches of the earth cannot give true peace; nay, those who in this life abound the most with such goods are the most troubled and afflicted, as Solomon confesses, who had them in abundance. "All," says he, "is vanity, and affliction of spirit" (Ecclesiastes 1:14). If the world, with its goods, could make us happy, the rich, the great, the monarchs, who are in no want of wealth, honors, and amusements, would be fully contented. But experience shows how it is with these mighty ones of the earth: the greater they are, the greater are the vexations, fears, and afflictions they have to suffer. A poor Capuchin lay brother, who goes about girded with a cord over a sackcloth, who lives on beans, and sleeps in a small cell on a little straw, is more contented than a prince with all his gilded trappings and riches, who has every day a sumptuous table, and who goes half sick to bed under a rich canopy, unable to sleep on account of the anguish which drives sleep away. He is a fool who loves the world and not God, said St. Philip Neri; and if these worldlings live such an unquiet life, much more unquiet still will be their death, when the priest, at their side, will intimate to them that they are about to be chased away from this world, saying: "Depart hence, Christian soul, from this world. Embrace the crucifix, for this world is at an end for you." The misery is, that in the world they think little of God, and just as little of the next life, where they must remain forever. All, or almost all, their thoughts are given to the things of this earth, and this is the cause that their life is so unhappy, and their death still more.

Nevertheless, that you may ascertain what state you ought to embrace, imagine yourself at the point of death, and choose that one which you would then wish to have chosen. Should you have erred, by neglecting the divine call, in order to follow your own inclinations, and to live with more liberty, there will then he no longer time to remedy the error. Consider that everything here below will come to an end. "The fashion of this world passeth away" (1 Corinthians 7:31). The scenes of this world must finish for each one of us. Everything passes, and death draws near; and at every step we take, we approach nearer to it, and, through death, nearer to eternity. For this we are born. "Man shall go into the house of his eternity" (Ecclesiastes 12:5). Death will be upon us when we least think of it. Alas! When death draws near, what will then appear all the goods of this world, but the unreal pageantry of a theater, vanities, lies, and foolishness? And what profit will it then be, as Jesus Christ warns us, "if we should have gained the whole world and lost our souls"? (Matthew 16:26) It will help us only to die an unhappy death.

On the contrary, a young man who has left the world to give himself entirely to Jesus Christ, how contented will he feel, as he passes his days in the solitude of his cell far from the tumult of the world and the dangers of losing God, which are in the world! In the monastery he will not have the entertainments of music, theaters, and balls, but he will have God to console him and to make him enjoy peace. I mean all that peace, which is possible in this valley of tears, into which every one is sent to suffer, and to merit by his patience that full peace which is prepared for him in heaven. But in this life even, far from the pastimes of the world, one loving look cast from time to time on the crucifix, one "Deus meus, et omnia," pronounced with affection, one "my God" said with a sigh of love, will console him more than all the pastimes and feasts of the world, which leave only bitterness behind them.

And if he lives content in such a life, more content will he be still at his death at having chosen the religious state. How much will it then console him to have spent his life in prayer, in spiritual reading, in mortification, and in other exercises of devotion, especially if he has been in an Order employed in saving souls by preaching and hearing confessions, things which at his death will all increase his confidence in Jesus Christ, who is truly grateful and liberal in rewarding those who have labored for His glory!

But let us come to a conclusion with regard to your vocation. Since the Lord has called you to leave the world, and to be entirely His in religion, I tell you: Rejoice and tremble at the same time. Rejoice, on the one hand, and always thank the Lord, because to be called by God to a perfect life is a grace which he does not give to all: "He hath not done in like manner to every nation" (Psalms 147:20). On the other hand, tremble, because if you do not follow the divine call, you will put your eternal salvation in great danger. It is not my intention here to relate to you the many examples of young men who, because they made no account of their vocation, have lived a miserable life and died a horrible death. Hold for certain that, as God has called you, you will never have peace, if you remain in the world, and at your death you will be very unquiet, on account of the remorse that then will torment you, for having neglected to obey God, who had called you to the religious state.

At the end of your letter you express a wish to learn from me whether, in case you should not have the courage to enter religion, it would be better to marry, as your parents wish, or to become a secular priest.

I answer: The married state I cannot recommend to you, because St. Paul does not counsel it to any one, except there be a necessity for it, arising out of habitual incontinence, which necessity, I hold for certain, does not exist in your case.

With regard, then, to the state of a secular priest, take notice that a secular priest has on him all the obligations of a priest, and all the distractions and dangers of a layman; for, living in the midst of the world, he cannot avoid the troubles which arise from his own household and from his parents, and cannot he free from the dangers to which his soul is exposed. He will have temptations in his own house, being unable to exclude women from it, whether relatives or servants, nor prevent other strangers from coming to see them. You should then stay there altogether retired in a separate room, and attend only to divine things. Now, this it is very difficult to practice; and therefore small, and very small, is the number of those priests who attend to their perfection in their own houses.

On the contrary, entering a monastery of strict observance, you will be freed from the disagreeable duty of thinking about your food and clothing, because there the Order provides you with all, there you will not have your parents to come and continually trouble you with all the disturbances that happen in their house; there no women enter to disturb your mind; and thus, far from the tumult of the world, you will have no one to hinder you in your prayers and your recollection.

I have said a monastery of strict observance; because if you want to enter another, where they live more freely, it is better for you to stay at home and attend there to the salvation of your soul as well as you can; for entering an Order where the spirit is relaxed, you expose yourself to the danger of being lost. Though you should enter with the resolution to attend to prayer and to the things of God only, yet, carried along by the bad example of your companions, and seeing yourself derided and even persecuted, if you do not live as they do, you will leave off all your devotions, and do as the others do, as experience shows it to be commonly the case. But should God give you the grace of vocation, be careful to preserve it, by recommending yourself often to Jesus and Mary in holy prayer. I know that if you resolve to give yourself entirely to God, the devil from that moment will increase his efforts to tempt you to fall into sin, and especially to make you entirely His, and to remain His.

I conclude by offering you the assurance of my respectful consideration; I pray the Lord to make you belong entirely to Himself, and remain, etc.

Chapter 9

ADVICE TO A YOUNG PERSON IN DOUBT

My Dear Sister In Jesus Christ: You are deliberating about the choice of a state of life. I see that you are agitated because the world wishes you to belong to itself, and to enter the married state; and, on the other hand, Jesus Christ wishes you to give yourself to Him by becoming a nun in some convent of exact observance.

Remember that on the choice which you make your eternal salvation will depend. Hence I recommend you, as soon as you read this advice, to implore the Lord, every day, to give you light and strength to embrace that state which will be most conducive to your salvation; that thus you may not afterwards, when your error is irreparable, have to repent of the choice you have made for your whole life, and for all eternity.

Examine whether you will be more happy in having for your spouse a man of the world, or Jesus Christ, the Son of God and the King of heaven; see which of them appears to you the better spouse, and then make your choice. At the age of thirteen, the holy virgin St. Agnes was, on account of her extraordinary beauty, sought after by many. Among the rest, the son of the Roman Prefect asked her for his spouse; but looking at Jesus Christ, who wished her to belong to Him, she said. I have found a spouse better than you and all the monarchs of this world; therefore I cannot exchange Him for any other. And rather than exchange him she was content to lose her life, and cheerfully suffered martyrdom for Jesus Christ. The holy virgin Domitilla gave a similar answer to the Count Aurelian; she, too, died a martyr, and was burned alive, because she would not forsake Jesus Christ. Oh, how happy do these holy virgins now feel in heaven, how happy will they feel for all eternity, at having made so good a choice! The same happy lot awaits you, and wilt await all young persons who renounce the world in order to give themselves to Jesus Christ.

In the next place, examine the consequences of the state of the person who chooses the world, and of the person who makes choice of Jesus Christ. The world offers earthly goods, riches, honors, amusements, and pleasures. On the other hand, Jesus Christ presents to you scourges, thorns, opprobrium, and crosses; for these were the goods, which He chose for Himself all the days of His mortal life. But then He offers you two immense advantages, which the world cannot give peace of soul in this life, and paradise in the next.

Moreover, before you decide on embracing any state, you must reflect that your soul is immortal; that is, that after the present life, which will soon end, you must pass into eternity, in which you will receive that place of punishment or of reward which you will have merited by your works during life. Thus you must remain for all eternity in the house either of eternal life or of eternal death, in which, after your departure from this world, it will be your lot first to dwell: you will be either forever saved and happy amid the joys of paradise, or forever lost and in despair in the torments of hell. In the mean time, consider that everything in this world must soon end. Happy all that are saved; miserable the soul that is damned. Keep always in mind that great maxim of Jesus Christ: "What doth it profit a man if lie gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his own soul?" This maxim has sent so many from the world to shut themselves up in the cloister, or to live in the deserts; it has inspired so many young persons with courage to forsake the world in order to give themselves to God and to die a holy death.

On the other hand, consider the unhappy lot of so many ladies of fortune, so many princesses and queens, who in the world have been attended, praised, honored, and almost adored; but if they are damned, what do they now find in hell of so much riches, of so many pleasures, of so many honors enjoyed in this life, but pains and remorse of conscience, which will torment them forever, as long as God shall be God, without any hope of remedy for their eternal ruin.

But let us now cast a glance at the goods which the world gives in this life to its followers, and to the goods which God gives to her who loves Him and forsakes the world for His sake. The world makes great promises; but do we not all see that the world is a traitor that promises what it never performs? But though it should fulfill all its promises what does it give? It gives earthly goods, but does it give the peace and the life of happiness which it promises? All its goods delight the senses and the flesh, but do not content the heart and the soul. Our souls have been created by God for the sole purpose of loving Him in this life, and of enjoying him in the next. Hence all the goods of the earth, all its delights, and all its grandeurs are outside the heart; they enter not into the soul, which God only can content. Solomon has even called all worldly goods vanities and lies, which do not content but rather afflict the soul. "Vanity of vanities and affliction of spirit" (Ecclesiastes 1:14). This we know also from experience, for we see that the more a person abounds in these goods, the greater her anguish and misery of mind. If by its goods the world gave content to the soul, great indeed should be the happiness of princesses and queens, who want neither amusements, nor comedies, nor festivities, nor banquets, nor splendid palaces, nor beautiful carriages, nor costly dresses, nor precious jewels, nor servants, nor ladies of honor to attend and pay homage to them. But no; they who imagine them to be happy are deceived. Ask them whether they enjoy perfect peace, if they are perfectly content, and they will answer: What peace? What content? They will tell you that they lead a life of misery, and that they know not what peace is. The maltreatment which they receive from their husbands, the displeasure caused by their children, the wants of the house, the jealousies and fears to which they are subject. make them live in the midst of continual anguish and bitterness. Married women may be called martyrs of patience if they bear all with resignation; but unless they are patient and resigned, they will suffer a martyrdom in this world, and a more painful martyrdom in the next.

The remorse of conscience, though they had nothing else to suffer, keeps married persons in continual torment. Being attached to earthly goods, they reflect but little on spiritual things; they seldom approach the sacraments, and seldom recommend themselves to God; and, being deprived of these helps to a good life, they will scarcely be able to live without sin, and without continual remorse of conscience. Behold, then, how all the joys promised by the world become to married persons sources of bitterness, of fears, and of damnation. How many of them will say, unhappy me, what will become of me after so many sins, after the life which I led, at a distance from God, always going from bad to worse? I would wish for retirement in order to spend a little time in mental prayer, but the affairs of the family and of the house, which is always in confusion, do not permit this. I would wish to hear sermons, to go to confession, to communicate often; I would wish to go often to the church, but my husband does not wish it. My unceasing occupations, the care of children, the frequent visits of friends, keep me confined to the house; and thus it is not without some difficulty that I can hear Mass at a late hour on festivals. How great was my folly in entering the married state, when I could become a saint in a convent! But all these lamentations only serve to increase their pain; because they see that it is no longer in their power to change the unhappy choice they have made of living in the world. And if their life is unhappy, their death will be much more miserable. At that awful hour they will be surrounded by servants, by their husbands, and children, bathed in tears; but instead of giving them relief, all these will be to them an occasion of greater affliction. And thus afflicted, poor in merits, and full of fears for their eternal salvation, they must go to present themselves to Jesus Christ to be judged by Him. But, on the other hand, how great will be the happiness which a nun who has left the world for Jesus Christ will enjoy, living among so many spouses of God, and in a solitary cell, at a distance from the turmoils of the world, and from the continual and proximate danger of losing God, to which seculars are exposed. How much greater will be her consolation at death, after having spent her years in meditations, mortification. and in so many spiritual exercises; in visits to the Holy Sacrament, in confessions, Communions, acts of humility, of hope, and love of Jesus Christ! And though the devil should endeavor to terrify her by the faults committed in her younger days, her Spouse, for whom she has left the world, will console her; and thus, full of confidence, she will die in the embraces of her crucified Redeemer, who will conduct her to heaven, that there she may enjoy eternal happiness.

Thus, my dear sister, since you must make choice of a state of life, make the choice now which you shall wish at death to have made. At death, every one who sees that for her the world is about to end says, Oh that I had led the life of a saint! Oh that I had left the world and given myself to God! But what is then done, is done, and nothing remains for her but to breathe forth her soul, and to go to hear from Jesus Christ the words, Come, blessed soul, and rejoice with me for eternity; or, Begone forever to hell, at a distance from me. You, then, must choose the world or Jesus Christ. If you choose the world, you will probably sooner or later repent of the choice; hence you ought to reflect well upon it. In the world the number of persons who are lost is very great; in religion, the number of those who are damned is very small. Recommend yourself to Jesus crucified, and to most holy Mary, that they may make you choose the state which is most conducive to your eternal salvation. If you wish to become a nun, resolve to become a saint; if you intend to lead a loose and imperfect life, like some religious, it is useless for you to enter a convent; you should then only lead an unhappy life and die an unhappy death. But if you resolve not to become a religious. I cannot advise you to enter the married state, for St. Paul does not counsel that state to any one, except in case of necessity, which I hope does not exist for you. At least remain in your own house and endeavor to become a saint. I entreat you to say the following prayer for nine days: My Lord Jesus Christ, who hast died for my salvation, I implore Thee, through the merits of Thy Passion, to give me light and strength to choose that state which is best for my salvation. And do thou. O my Mother Mary! Obtain this grace for me by thy powerful intercession.

Chapter 10

Discourse TO PIOUS MAIDENS

My Dear Sisters In Jesus Christ: I do not intend to explain the privileges and blessings acquired by those maidens who consecrate their virginity to Jesus Christ; I shall only glance at them.

SECTION 1

EXCELLENCE OF VIRGINITY

First, they become in the eyes of God as beautiful as the angels of heaven: "They shall he as the angels of God in heaven" (Matthew 22:30). Baronius relates that upon the death of a holy virgin named Georgia an immense multitude of doves was seen flying around her; and when the body was carried to the church, they ranged themselves along that part of the roof which corresponded to the situation of the corpse, and did not leave until she was buried. Those doves were thought to be angels who accompanied that virginal body.

Moreover, a maiden who leaves the world, and dedicates herself to Jesus Christ, becomes His spouse. In the Gospel our Redeemer is called Father, or Master, or Shepherd of our souls; but with regard to those virgins He calls Himself their Spouse: they "went out to meet the Bridegroom" (Matthew 25:1).

When a young woman wishes to establish herself in the world, she will examine, if she be prudent, which of all her suitors is the most noble and the richest. Let us then learn from the Spouse in the sacred Canticles, who well knows let us learn from her what manner of spouse is He whom consecrated virgins aspire to. Tell me, O sacred Spouse, what manner of spouse is He who makes you the most fortunate of women? "My Beloved is white, she says, and ruddy, chosen among thousands" (Canticles 5:10). He is all white by reason of His purity; and ruddy, by reason of the love with which He burns. He is, in fine, so noble and so kind as to be the most amiable of spouses.

With reason, then, did the glorious virgin St. Agnes, as we learn from St. Ambrose, when it was proposed to her to marry the son of the Prefect of Rome, reply that she had a much more advantageous match in view. When some ladies were endeavoring to persuade St. Domitilla to marry Count Aurelian, nephew of the Emperor Domitian, saying there was no obstacle, as he was willing that she should remain a Christian, the saint replied, Tell me, if a monarch and a clown both pretended to a maiden, which would she choose? Now, should I marry Aurelian, I would have to leave the King of heaven; it would be folly I will not do so. And thus, in order to remain faithful to Jesus Christ, to whom she had already consecrated her virginity, she was willing to be burned alive a death which her barbarous suitor caused her to suffer.

Those spouses of Jesus Christ who leave the world for His sake become His beloved; they are called the first fruits of the Lamb: "The first fruits to God and to the Lamb" (Apocalypse 14:4). Why the first fruits? Because, says Cardinal Hugo, as the first fruits are more grateful than any other to man, so virgins are dearer to God than any others. The divine Spouse feeds amongst the lilies: "Who feeds amongst the lilies" (Canticles 2:16). And what is meant by lilies, if not those devout maidens who consecrate their virginity to Jesus Christ? The venerable Bede writes that the song of the virgins that is, the glory which they give to God by preserving untouched the lily of their purity is far more pleasing to Him than the song of all the other saints.

Wherefore the Holy Ghost says that there is nothing comparable to virginity (Ecclesiasticus 26:20). And hence Cardinal Hugo remarks that dispensations are often granted from other vows, but never from the vow of chastity; and the reason is, because no other treasure can compensate for the loss of that. And it is for the same reason that theologians say the Blessed Mother would have consented to forego the dignity of Mother of God could it have been had only at the expense of her virginity.

Who on this earth can conceive the glory which God has prepared for His virgin spouses in paradise? Theologians say that virgins have in heaven their own "aureola," or special crown of glory, which is refused to the other saints who are not virgins. But let us come at once to the most important point in our discourse.

This young woman will say, Cannot I become holy in the married state? I do not wish to give you the reply in my own words; hear those of St. Paul, and you will. see the difference between the married woman and the virgin: "And the unmarried woman and the virgin thinketh on the things of the Lord, that she may be holy, both in body and in spirit; but she that is married, thinketh on the things of the world, how she may please her husband" (1 Corinthians 7:34). And the Apostle adds: "And this I speak for your profit, not to cast a snare upon you, but for that which is decent, and which may give you power to attend upon the Lord without impediment."

In the first place. I say that married persons can be holy in the spirit, but not in the flesh; on the contrary, virgins who have consecrated their virginity to Jesus Christ are holy both in soul and body. Holy both in body and in spirit; and mark those other words, to attend upon the Lord without impediment. Oh. how many obstacles have not married women to encounter in serving the Lord! And the more noble they are the greater the obstacles. A woman to become holy must adopt the necessary means, which are, much mental prayer, constant use of the sacraments, and continual thought of God. But what time has a married woman for thinking upon God? "She that is married thinketh on the things of the world," says St. Paul. The married woman has to think of providing her family with food and raiment. She has to think of rearing her children, of pleasing her husband and her husband's relatives; whence, as the Apostle says, her heart is divided between God, her husband, and her children. Her husband must be attended to; the children cry and scream, and are continually asking for a thousand things. What time can she have to attend to mental prayer, who can scarce attend to all the business of the house? How can she pray amid so many distracting thoughts and disturbances? Scarcely can she go to church, to recollect herself, and communicate upon the Sunday. She may have the good desire, but it will be difficult for her to attend to the things of God as she ought. It is true that in this want of opportunities she may gain merit, by resignation to the will of God. who requires of her, in that state, chiefly patience and resignation; but in the midst of so many distractions and annoyances, without prayer, without meditation, without frequenting the sacraments, it will be morally impossible for her to have that holy patience and resignation.

But would to God that married women had no other evil to contend with besides that of not always being able to attend to their sanctification as much as they should! The greater evil is the danger to which they are continually exposed of losing the grace of God, by reason of the intercourse which they must continually have with the relatives and friends of their husband, as well in their own houses as in the houses of others. Unmarried women do not understand this, but married women and those who have to hear their confessions know it well. Let us, however, now have done with the unhappy life which is led by married women, the ill treatment that they receive from their husbands, the disobedience of children, the wants of a family, the annoyance of mothers in law and relatives, the throes of childbirth, always accompanied by danger of death, not to mention the afflictions of jealousy, and scruples of conscience with regard to the rearing up of their children, all of this breeds a tempest under which poor married women have continually to groan; and God grant that in this tempest they may not lose themselves, so as to meet with hell in the other world, after having suffered a hell in this!

Such is the unenviable lot of those maidens who choose the world!

But what! Such a maiden replies, are there no married women holy? Yes, I answer, there are; but who are they? Such only as become holy through their sufferings, by suffering all for God without finding fault, and with continual patience. And how many married women are to he found in such a state of perfection? They are very rare; and if you find any, they are always in sorrow that when they could have done so they did not consecrate themselves to Jesus Christ. Amongst all the devout married women I have known, I never knew one to be satisfied with her condition.

The greatest happiness, then, falls to the lot of those maidens who consecrate themselves to Jesus Christ. Those have to encounter none of the dangers which married women must necessarily be placed in. They are not bound to earth by love of children, or men, or dress, or gallantry, whilst married women are obliged to dress with pomp and ornaments, in order to appear with their equals and please their husbands. A maiden who has given herself to Jesus Christ requires only what dress will cover her; nay, she should give scandal if she were to wear any other, or make use of any ornaments. Moreover, virgins have no anxiety about house or children or relatives; their whole care is centered in pleasing Jesus Christ, to whom they have consecrated their soul, their body, and all their love; whence it is that they have more time, and a mind more disengaged, for frequent prayer and Communion.

But let us now come to the excuses sometimes brought forward by those who are cold in the love of Jesus Christ.

Such a one will say: I should leave the world if I had some convent to go to, or, at least, if I could always spend my time in devotion at the church when I should please; but I could not remain at home, where I have bad brothers who ill treat me; and, on the other hand, my parents are unwilling to have me frequent the church. But, I ask you, is it in order to save yourself, or lead an easy life, you leave the world? Is it to do your own will or the will of Jesus Christ? If you wish to become holy and serve Jesus Christ, I ask you another question: In what does holiness consist? Holiness does not consist in living in a convent, or spending the entire day in a church, but in being at confession and Communion as often as you can, in obedience, in doing everything assigned you at home, in being retired, in bearing labor and contempt. And if you were to be in a convent, how should you be employed? Do you imagine you should always be either in church or in your cell, or in the refectory, or at recreation? In the convent, although the Sisters have a time marked out for prayer, for Mass, and for Communion, they have also their hours appointed for the business of the house, and more especially the lay sisters, who, as they do not attend in the choir, have nearly all the labor of the house, and consequently least time for prayer. All exclaim, Let us be in a convent, let us have a convent! How much more easy is it for devout girls to become holy in their own houses than in a convent! How many such have I known to regret having entered a convent, especially when the Community was large, the poor lay sister in certain offices having scarcely time to say the rosary!

But, Father, such a girl will answer, I have at home a peevish father and mother; I have bad brothers: all of them use me ill; I cannot stand this. Well, I say, and if you marry, will you not have to deal with mothers and sisters in law, and perhaps unduti ful children, and perhaps a harsh husband? Oh, how many cruel husbands are there not, who when first married promised great things, but shortly afterward: ceased to be husbands, and became the tyrants of their wives, treating them not as companions, but as slaves? Inquire of many married women whether this be not the fact. But, without going beyond your own home, you all know how your mothers fared. One thing, at least, is certain, that all you should have to suffer at home, after having given yourself to God, you should suffer for the love of Jesus Christ, and He knows how to make your cross sweet and light to you. But how dreadful is it not to suffer for the world's sake! To suffer without merit! Courage, then! If Jesus Christ has called you to His love, and wishes to have you for His spouse, go on joyfully; it will be His care to afford you consolation even in the midst of sufferings. This, of course, will he only in case you truly love Him, and live as his spouse.

MEANS TO PRESERVE VIRGINAL PURITY

Hear, then, for the last time, the means that you are to adopt in order to become holy, and live a true spouse of Jesus Christ; and these are, to practice the virtues becoming His spouse. We read in the Gospel that the kingdom of heaven is likened unto virgins. But to what virgins? Not to the foolish, but to the wise. The wise were admitted to the nuptials, but the door was shut in the face of the foolish; to whom the Spouse said, I know you not (Matthew 25:1) you are indeed virgins, but I do not acknowledge you for my spouses. The true spouses of Jesus Christ follow the Spouse whithersoever he goeth. "These follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth" (Apocalypse 24:4). What is the meaning of following the Lamb? St. Augustine says that it means the imitation of the Lamb both in body and mind. After you have consecrated your body to Him, you must consecrate to Him your whole heart, so that your heart may be entirely devoted to his love; and, therefore, you must adopt all the means that are necessary for making you belong entirely to Jesus Christ.

1. The first of those means is mental prayer, to which you must be most attentive. But do not imagine that, in order to pray thus, it is necessary for you to be in a convent, or remain all day in the church. It is true that at home there is much disturbance created by the persons there; nevertheless, those who wish can find time and place for prayer: this is in the morning before the others rise, and at night after the others have gone to bed. In order to pray, it is not necessary to be always on bended knees; you can pray whilst laboring, and even when walking out on business (should you have no other opportunity), by raising your soul to God, and thinking on the Passion of Jesus Christ, or any other pious subject.

2. The second means is, the frequentation of the sacraments of confession and Communion. With regard to confession, each one has to make choice of a confessor, whom she is to obey in everything, otherwise she will never walk steadily in the way of perfection. As to Communion, she must not depend solely upon obedience; she must desire it, and ask for it. This divine food must be hungered after; Jesus Christ must be desired. It is frequent Communion that renders His spouses faithful to Jesus Christ, especially in the preservation of holy purity. The Most Holy Sacrament preserves the soul in every virtue; and it appears that its most special effect is to preserve untouched the chastity of virgins, according to the saying of the prophet, who calls this sacrament the corn of the elect, and wine springing forth virgins (Zacharias 9:17).

3. The third means is, retirement and caution: "As the lily amongst the thorns so is my beloved amongst the daughters" (Canticles 2:2). For a virgin to think of remaining faithful to Jesus Christ amid the conversations, the jests, and other amusements of the world, is useless; it is necessary that she preserve herself amid the thorns of abstinence and mortification, by using not only the greatest modesty and reserve in speaking with men, but even all austerity and penitential exercises when necessary. Such are the thorns which preserve the lilies; I mean young maidens, who otherwise should soon be lost. The Lord calls the cheeks of his spouse as beautiful; as those of the turtle: "Thy cheeks are beautiful as the turtle dove's" (Canticles 1:9). And why so? Because the turtle, by instinct, avoids the company of other birds, and always remains alone. That virgin, then, appears beautiful in the eyes of Jesus Christ who does all that she can to hide herself from the eyes of others. St. Jerome says that Jesus is a jealous spouse. Hence He is much displeased when He sees a virgin dedicated to Him endeavoring to appear before men to please them. Pious maidens endeavor to appear repulsive, that they may not attract men. The venerable Sister Catharine of Jesus, afterwards a Teresian nun, washed her face with the filthy water of tar, and then designedly exposed her face to the sun, that she might lose her complexion. St. Andregesina having, as we are told by Bollandus, been promised in marriage, prayed the Lord to deform her, and was heard, for she was immediately covered with a leprosy which caused every one to avoid her; and as soon as her suitor had ceased his offers, her former beauty was restored. It is related by James di Viatrico that there was a certain virgin in a convent whose eyes had inflamed a prince. The latter threatened to set fire to the monastery if she would not yield to him; but she plucked out her eyes and sent them to him in a basin, the bearer of which was instructed to say. "Here are the darts which have wounded your heart take them, and leave me my soul untouched." The same author tells of St. Euphemia, that, having been promised by her father to a certain count, who left no means untried to obtain her, she, in order to free herself from his addresses, cut off her nose and lips saying to herself, "Vain beauty, you shall never be to me an occasion of sin!" St. Antoninus tells something similar (and his account is confirmed by Baronius) of the Abbess Ebbs, who, fearing an invasion of the barbarians, cut off her nose and upper lip to the teeth; and that all the other nuns, to the number of thirty, following her example, did the same. The barbarians came, and seeing them so deformed, set fire to the monastery through rage and burned them alive; and hence the Church, as Baronius tells us, has enrolled them among her martyrs. This is not allowable for others to do; those saints did so by the especial impulse of the Holy Ghost. But it sufficiently well answers the purpose of showing you what virgins who loved Jesus Christ have done to prevent men from seeking them. Devout virgins at present should at least move as modestly, and be seen as little as possible, by men. Should it happen that a virgin should, by chance, and without any fault of hers, receive by violence any insult from men, be it known to you that after it she will remain as pure as before. St. Lucia made an answer of this kind to the tyrant who threatened to dishonor her. "If you do," she said, "and I be so treated against my will, my crown shall be double." It is the consent only that is hurtful; and know, moreover, that if a virgin be modest and reserved, men will have no inclination to interfere with her.

4. The fourth means of preserving purity is the mortification of the senses. St. Basil says, "A virgin should not be immodest in any respect, in tongue, ears, eyes, touch, and still less in mind." A virgin, in order to keep herself pure, must be modest in her speech, conversing seldom with men, and that only through necessity, and in few words. Her ears must be pure, by not listening to worldly conversations. Her eyes must be pure, by being either closed, or fixed upon the earth in the presence of men. She must be pure in touch, using therein all possible caution, both as regards herself and others. She must be pure in spirit, by resisting all immodest thoughts, through the help of Jesus and Mary. And to this end she must mortify herself with fasting, abstinence, and other penitential exercises; which things she must not practice without the consent of the confessor, otherwise they should injure her soul by making her proud. Those acts of penance must not be made without the confessor's permission, but they must be desired and sought for; for the confessor, it he does not see the penitent wishing for them, will not give them. Jesus is a spouse of blood, who espoused our souls upon the cross, whereon he shed all his blood for us, "A bloody spouse art thou to me" (Exodus 4:25). Therefore those spouses who love Him, love tribulation, infirmity, sorrows, ill treatment, and injuries; and receive them not only with patience, but with joy. Thus may we understand that passage which says that "virgins follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth" (Apocalypse 14:2). They follow their spouse Jesus with joy and gladness whithersoever he goeth, even through sorrow and disgrace, as has been done by so many holy virgins, who have followed Him to torments and to death, smiling and rejoicing.

5. Finally, Sisters, in order that you may obtain perseverance in this holy life, you must recommend yourselves often and much to Most Holy Mary, the Queen of Virgins. She is the mediatrix who negotiates those espousals, and brings virgins to espouse her Son. "After her shall virgins be brought to the King" (Psalms 44:15). It is she, in fine, who obtains fidelity for those chosen spouses; for, without her assistance, they should be all unfaithful.

CONCLUSION

Come on, then, you who intend to live no longer for the world, but for Jesus Christ alone. (I address myself to those who feel themselves called by that divine Spouse to consecrate themselves to His love.) I do not wish that you should make any vow this morning, or oblige yourselves at once to perpetual chastity. You should do that when God inspires you, and your confessor is willing. I only desire you by a simple act, and without any obligation, to thank Jesus Christ for having called you to His love; and to offer yourselves to Him henceforward for your entire lives. Say then to Him: O my Jesus, my God, and my Redeemer! Who Hast died for me, compassionate me who burn to call myself Thy spouse. I burn, because I see that Thou hast called me to that honor; nor do I know how to thank Thee for that grace. I should now have been in hell; and Thou instead of chastising me, hast called me to be Thy spouse. Yes, my Spouse, I leave the world, I leave all through love of Thee, and give myself entirely to Thee. What world? What world do I speak of? My Jesus, henceforward Thou art to be my only good my only love. I see that Thou wishest to have my entire heart, and I wish to resign it entirely to Thee. Receive me in Thy mercy, and do not reject me as I have deserved that Thou shouldst. Forget all the offenses that I have given Thee, of which I repent with my whole soul; would that I had died before offending Thee! Pardon me: inflame me with Thy holy love, and give me Thy aid, in order that I may be faithful to Thee, and never leave Thee more. Thou, my Spouse, hast given Thyself all to me. Behold! I give myself entirely to Thee. Mary, my Queen and my Mother, chain my heart to that of Jesus Christ; and fasten both hearts so that they be never sundered more.

I leave you now my blessing, in order that you may be so bound to Jesus Christ as never again to depart from Him. Give your hearts now to Jesus Christ: Say, Jesus my Spouse, henceforward I wish to love only Thee, and nothing else.

A Letter TO A YOUNG STUDENT

I have received your last favor, in which you tell me that you are still undecided as to the state of life you should choose, and that having communicated to your pastor the counsel I gave you, namely, to go for that purpose to perform the spiritual exercises in that house which your father has in the country, the said pastor answered you, that it was not necessary for you to go to that house to torture your brains during eight days in solitude, but that it was enough for you to attend the exercises he would soon give to the people in his own church. Since, then, on this last point of the exercises, you again ask my advice, it is necessary that I should answer you more at length, and show you, first, how much greater the fruit of the spiritual exercises is when they are performed in silence, in some retired place, than when performed whilst they are given in public, when one is obliged during them to go to one's own house, and continues to converse with one's parents and friends; and the more so in your case, as you write to me you have in your house no room to which you may retire. On the other hand, I am very much in favor of those exercises performed in solitude, as I know it is to such I owe my own conversion and my resolution to leave the world. I will then secondly suggest to you the means and precautions to be taken during the exercises, in order to obtain from them the fruit you desire. I beg you, when you have read this letter yourself, to give it to your Reverend pastor to read it also.

Let us, then, speak first of the great benefit of the exercises, when they are performed in solitude, where one treats with no person but God; and first of all let us see the reason for it. The truths of eternal life, such as the great affair of our salvation, the value of the time God gives us that we may amass merits for a happy eternity, the obligations we are under to love God for his infinite goodness and the immense love that he bears towards us these and similar things are not seen with the eyes of the flesh, but with those of the mind. It is, on the contrary, certain that, unless our intellect represents the value of a good or the greatness of an evil to the will, we shall never embrace that good nor reject that evil. And this is the ruin of those who are attached to the world; they live in darkness: whence it happens that, not knowing the greatness of eternal good and evil, and allured by the senses, they give themselves up to forbidden pleasure, and miserably perish.

Therefore the Holy Ghost admonishes us that in order to avoid sin we must keep before our eyes the last things that are to come upon us, that is, death, with which all the goods of this earth will come to an, end for us, and the divine judgment, in which we shall have to give an account, of our whole life. "Remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin" (Ecclesiasticus 7:40). And in another place he says "O that they would be wise and would understand, and would provide for their last end" (Deuteronomy 32:29). By which words He wishes to give us to understand that, if men would consider the things of the other life, they would all certainly take care to sanctify themselves, and would not expose themselves to the danger of an unhappy life through all eternity. They shut their eyes to the light, and thus remaining blind, precipitate themselves into so great evils. For this reason the saints always prayed the Lord to give them light. "Enlighten my eyes, that I never sleep in death" (Psalms 12:4). "May God cause the light of his countenance to shine upon us" (Psalms 66:2). "Make the way known to me wherein I should walk" (Psalms 142:8). "Give me understanding, and I will learn thy commandments" (Psalms 118:73).

But to obtain this divine light we must go near to God. "Come ye to him and be enlightened" (Psalms 33:6). "For," says St. Augustine, "as we cannot see the sun without the light of the sun itself, so we cannot see the light of God but by the light of God Himself." This light is obtained in the spiritual exercises: by them we approach to God, and God enlightens us with His light. The spiritual exercises mean nothing else than that we retire for that time from intercourse with the world, and go to converse with God alone, where God speaks to us by His inspirations, and we speak to God in our meditations, by acts of love, by repenting of our sins by which we have displeased Him, by offering ourselves to serve Him for the future with all our heart, and by beseeching Him to make known to us His will, and to give us strength to accomplish it.

Holy Job said, "Now I should have rest in my sleep with kings and consuls of the earth, who build themselves solitudes" (Job 3:13). Who are those kings that build themselves solitudes? They are, as St. Gregory says, those despisers of the world, who go from its tumults to render themselves fit to talk alone with God: "They build solitudes. that is, they separate themselves as far as possible from the tumult of the world, in order to be alone and to become fit to speak with God."

When Arsenius was reflecting on the means he should take to become a saint, God caused him to hear these words: "Fly, be silent, and rest." Fly from the world, be silent, cease to talk with men, and talk only with me, and thus rest in peace and solitude. In conformity with this, St. Anselm wrote to one worried by many worldly occupations, who complained that he had no moment of peace, the following advice: "Leave a little your occupations, hide yourself for a while from your tumultuous thoughts, apply yourself a little to contemplate God and rest in Him; say to God: Now teach my heart where and how I shall seek Thee, where and how I shall find Thee." Words that are applicable each and all to yourself. Fly, says he, for a short time from those earthly occupations, which render you so unquiet, and rest in retirement with God; say to him: O Lord, show me where and how I may find Thee, that I may speak alone to Thee, and at the same time hear Thy words.

God speaks indeed to those who seek Him, but He does not speak in the midst of the tumult of the world. "The Lord is not in the earthquake" (3 Kings 19:11), as it was said to Elias, when God called him to solitude. The voice of God, as it is said in the same place, is as "the whistling of a gentle air," which is scarcely heard, not however by the ear of the body, but by that of the heart without noise and in a sweet rest. This is exactly what the Lord says through Osee: "I will lead her into the wilderness, and I will speak to her heart" (Osee 2:14). When the Lord wishes to draw a soul to himself, he leads it into solitude, far from the embarrassment of the world and intercourse with men, and there speaks to it with words of fire (Psalms 118:140). The words of God are said to be of fire, because they melt a soul, as the sacred spouse said: "My soul melted, when he [my beloved] spoke" (Canticles 5:6). In fact, they prepare the soul to submit readily to the direction of God, and to take that form of life which God wishes it to take; they are words exceedingly efficacious, and so efficient, that at the very time they are heard they operate in the soul that which God requires of it.

One day the Lord said to St. Teresa, "Oh! How willingly would I speak to many souls, but the world makes so great a noise in their hearts that my voice cannot be heard. Oh! If they would but separate themselves a little from the world." Thus, then, my very dear friend, the Lord wishes to speak to you, but alone and in solitude; since if he should speak to you in your own house, your parents, your friends, and your domestic occupations would continue to make a noise in your heart, and you would be unable to hear his voice. The saints have for this reason left their homes and their country, and gone to hide themselves in caverns or deserts, or at least in a cell of a religious house, there to find God and hear his words. St. Eucherius relates that a certain person, seeking a place in which she could find God, went for this purpose to ask counsel from a master of the spiritual life. The man of God led her to a solitary place, and then said: "Behold, here God may be found," without saying anything more. By this he wished to give her to understand that God is not to be found in the midst of the noise of the world, but in solitude. St. Bernard says that he learned to know God among the beech trees and oaks better than in all the learned books he had read.

The inclination of worldlings is to be in company with friends, to talk and divert themselves; but the desire of the saints is to be in solitary places, in the midst of forests, or in caverns, there to converse alone with God, who in solitude familiarly converses with souls, as a friend with his friend. "O solitude," exclaims St. Jerome, "in which God familiarly converses with His servants!" The Venerable Vincent Caraffa said that if it had been free to him to wish for anything in this world, he would have asked for nothing but a little grotto with a piece of bread and a spiritual book, there always to live far from men and conversing alone with God. The Spouse of the Canticles praising the beauty of a soul living in solitude, compares it to the beauty of the turtle dove: "Thy cheeks are beautiful as the turtledove's" (Canticles 1:9). Precisely because the turtledove avoids the company of other birds, and always lives in the most solitary places. Thence it is that the holy angels admire with joy the beauty and splendor which embellish on its flight to heaven a soul that in this life has lived hidden and solitary as in a desert. "Who is this that cometh up from the desert flowing with delights?" (Canticles 8:5)

I have wished to write all these things to you in order to inspire you with a love for holy solitude, for I hope that in the exercises that you will perform you will not have to torture your brains, as your pastor said, but that the Lord will make you taste so great a spiritual delight, that you will come out of your retreat with such an affection for them, that you will not fail hereafter to go through them every year a thing which will be of immense advantage to your soul, whatever state of life you may choose, because in the midst of the world the various occupations, disturbances, and distractions always produce dryness of spirit, so that it is necessary from time to time to irrigate, as it were, and renew it, as St. Paul exhorts, "Be renewed in the spirit of your mind" (Ephesians 4:23).

King David, troubled by earthly cares, wished to have wings and fly away from the bustle of the world in order to find rest: "Who will give me wings, and I will fly, and be at rest" (Psalm 54:7). But being unable to leave the world with his body, he at least sought from time to time to disengage himself from the affairs of the realm he governed, and dwell in solitude conversing with God, and thus his spirit found peace. "I have gone far off flying away, and I abode in the wilderness."

Jesus Christ also, who had no need of solitude to be recollected and united with God, but wished to set us an example, often retired from intercourse with man and went away to mountains or into deserts to pray: "Having dismissed the multitude, he went up into a mountain alone to pray" (Matthew 14:23): and "He retired into a desert and prayed" (Luke 5:16). And He desired that his disciples, after the fatigue of their missions, should retire to some solitary place to rest in spirit: "Come apart into a desert place, and rest a little" (Mark 6:30): desisting by this that the spirit, even amidst spiritual occupations, being obliged to treat with men, becomes somewhat relaxed, whence it becomes necessary to renew it in solitude.

Worldlings, who are accustomed to divert themselves in conversations, at banquets and plays, believe that in solitude; where no such things are found, one must suffer an insupportable tediousness; and this is really the case with those who have a conscience defiled by sin; for when they are occupied in the affairs of this world, they do not think of the things of the soul, but when they are disengaged and in solitude, as they do not seek God, they feel at once the remorse of their conscience, and thus find not peace, but tediousness and pain. But give me one who seeks God: and he shall find in solitude not tediousness, but contentment and joy. This the wise man assures us of: "For her [wisdom's] conversation hath no bitterness, nor her company any tediousness, but joy and gladness" (Wisdom 8:16). Oh, no; to converse with God causes no bitterness, nor tediousness but joy and peace.

Cardinal Bellarmine used during the season, when other cardinals went to divert themselves in country seats and villas, to go to some solitary house to make the exercises during a month, and these he called his country diversions; and certainly his heart found more delight in them than all the others did in their amusements.

St. Charles Borromeo made the exercises every year, and found in them his paradise on earth, and it was whilst he was one year engaged in these exercises on Mount Varalla, that his last illness came upon him and brought him to his blessed end. For this reason St. Jerome said, that solitude was a paradise which he had discovered on earth: "Solitude is a paradise to me."

But perhaps some one will say, what contentment can a person find being alone and having no one to converse with? St. Bernard answers, "He who seeks God is by no means alone in solitude, for God Himself is there with him, and renders him more content than if he had the company of the first princes of the world." "I was never less alone," writes the holy abbot, "than when I was alone." The prophet Isaias describing the sweetness which God gives those to taste who go to seek Him in solitude, says: "The Lord therefore will comfort Sion, and will comfort all the ruins thereof; and he will make her desert as a place of pleasure, and her wilderness as the garden of the Lord. Joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving and the voice of praise" (Isaias 51:3). The Lord well knows how to comfort a soul that retires from the world; he recompenses a thousand fold all the pleasures of the world it foregoes, and makes solitude become for it a garden of delight, where, all the tumult of the world being excluded and there being only thanksgiving and praise to that God who treats it so lovingly, it finds a peace that satiates it. If there were no other contentment in solitude than that of knowing the eternal truths, this alone should he sufficient to induce us to desire it. Divine truth, when known, truly satiates the soul, and not the vanities of the world, which are but lying and deceitful things, and this is precisely that great delight which is found in the exercises made in solitude and silence. In them we see in their purest light the Christian maxims, the importance of eternal salvation, the ugliness of sin, the value of grace the love of God towards us, the vanity of the goods of this world, and the foolishness of those who, in order to acquire them, lose eternal goods and prepare for themselves an eternity of pains.

Whence it happens that the soul at the sight of these truths takes the most efficacious means to secure its eternal salvation, and rises above itself, as Jeremias says: "He shall sit solitary and hold his peace because he hath taken it up upon himself" (Lamentations 3:28). There man disengages himself from earthly affections, and unites himself to God in prayer, by the desire of belonging to Him altogether, by offering himself to Him, and by other repeated acts of sorrow, love, and resignation, and thus finds himself raised so high above all created things, that he laughs at those who so much prize the goods of this world which he despises, knowing them to be too little and too unworthy of the love of a heart created to love the infinite good, which is God.

It is certain that he who comes out of the exercises comes out of them much changed and better than he was when he began them. It was the opinion of St. John Chrysostom that retirement is a great help towards the acquisition of perfection. Therefore a world in consequence of the impression made on him by that sentence of the Gospel: "What doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his own soul?" (Matthew 16:26) A certain student, in consequence of one single sentiment on death, suggested to him by a good religious, changed his bad life and became virtuous. St. Clement of Ancyra was encouraged by another consideration on eternity suggested to him by his mother, namely, "The thing that we contend for is life eternal," and joyously suffered for Jesus Christ many torments inflicted on him by the tyrant.

To conceive, then, a just idea of the fruit which the exercises produce when performed in solitude, read a book on this subject, if you have one, and see there the stupendous conversions occasioned by them. I will here mention a few.

Father Maffei relates that there was in Siena a priest who gave public scandal. This priest having made the exercises with a missionary who passed by accident through Siena, was not only converted and made a good confession, but on a certain day, whilst a great number of people were present in the church, he went into the pulpit weeping, and having a cord round his neck, and asked pardon for all the scandals that he had given; and after this he went away to become a Capuchin and died as a saint. On his deathbed he confessed that for all the graces he had received he was indebted to those spiritual exercises.

Moreover, Father Bartoli relates of a certain German knight, who had given himself up to all kinds of vice, so far as to give his soul to the devil by a written contract signed with his own blood, that having afterwards performed the exercises, he conceived so great a sorrow for his sins that he fainted several times, and thenceforth he continued to lead a penitential life as long as he lived.

Father Rossignoli relates that in Sicily a son of a certain baron became so debauched, that his father, after having tried without effect many means to correct him, was obliged to put him in chains in a galley with the slaves. But a certain good religious, moved by compassion, went to see him, and by his winning manners and good advice induced him to meditate on certain eternal truths in the galley where he was confined. The young man having done so, wished to make a general confession, and the showed such a change in his conduct, that his father with much joy received him again into his house, and never afterwards had any reason to be displeased with him.

Another youth of Flanders, having made the exercises and being converted by them from a most wicked life he had been leading, said afterwards to his companions, who were wondering at this: "You wonder at me; but I tell you that the devil himself, if he could make the exercises, would be brought to penance."

Another, a religious, but of such bad conduct that he had rendered himself insupportable to all, was by his superiors sent to make the exercises. Being about to leave, he jestingly said to his friends: "Keep your beds ready to touch my body when I come back." But after the exercises he was so much changed that he became an example to all the other religious, who seeing this change, wished to make them also.

Certain young men seeing other young men, their friends, going to make the exercises, wished to accompany them, not to profit, but to jest afterwards in their conversations about their devotions. But exactly the contrary happened. for during the exercises they were filled with such compunction that they all began to sigh and weep, confessed their sins, and changed their lives.

I could adduce such facts by thousands, but I shall relate only one more that of a nun in the monastery of Torre di Specchi in Rome, who pretended to learning, but led a very imperfect life. This nun began, though with a bad will, to assist at the exercises that were given in the monastery; but the first meditation she made on the end of man made such an impression on her, that she began to weep, went to her spiritual Father, and said to him: "Father, I wish to become a saint, and this promptly." She wanted to say more, but the tears prevented her from speaking. Having then retired to her cell, she made a writing by which she gave herself entirely to Jesus Christ, and began to lead a penitent and retired life, in which she persevered until death.

But when we see the esteem in which the exercises have been held by so many holy men, this, if we had no other reason, should be enough to make us prize them highly. St. Charles Borromeo, from the first time that he made the spiritual exercises in Rome, began to lead a perfect life. St. Francis de Sales confessed that it was to the exercises he owed the beginning of his holy life. Father Louis of Granada, a holy man, said that his whole life would not suffice to explain the knowledge of heavenly things he had received in making the spiritual exercises. Father Avila called the exercises a school of heavenly wisdom, and wished that all his spiritual children should go to make them. Father Louis Blosius, a Benedictine, said that we should give to God special thanks for having in these latter times made known to his Church this treasure of the exercises.

But if the exercises are of a great help to persons in every state or condition, they are of an especial help to him who wishes to make the choice of the state of life he should embrace. For I find it stated that the first end for which the exercises were instituted was that of making the choice of a state of life, because upon this choice depends the eternal salvation of each one. We cannot expect that an angel from heaven should come to assure us of the state which according to the will of God we should choose. It is sufficient to place before our eyes the state we think of choosing, and then we should consider the end we have in view in that choice, and weigh all the circumstances of the case.

This is the principal reason for which I wish you to make the exercises in silence, namely, for making the choice of the state of life. When, then, you have entered upon the exercises, as I hope you will, I beg of you to follow the advice I am going to subjoin.

1. The only intention that you should have in making these exercises is that you may know what God will have you to do: and therefore in going to that solitary house, say within yourself: "I will hear what the Lord God will speak in me" (Psalms 84:9). I go to know what the Lord shall tell me and what he wishes from me.

2. Besides, it is necessary that you have a determined will to obey God, and to follow without reserve the vocation he shall make known to you.

3. It is moreover necessary that you pray earnestly to the Lord, that he may make known to you his will, namely, in what state of life He wishes you to live. But remember that in order to obtain this light you should pray with indifference of mind. He who prays to God to enlighten him on his state of life, but does so without this indifference, and, instead of wishing to conform to the will of God, wishes rather that God should conform to his own will, is like a pilot who feigns to will but indeed wills not that his vessel advance, since he casts the anchor and then hoists the sail. God does net enlighten or speak to such a person. But if you will supplicate him with this indifference and the resolution to accomplish his will, he will make you see clearly the state that is best for you. And if you should then feel any repugnance to it, you should place before your eyes the hour of your death, and reflect which state you would in that hour wish to have embraced, and then embrace that.

4. Take with you to your house of retreat a book containing the meditations which are commonly made during the exercises; read these meditations, and let them be instead of sermons, reflecting on them for half an hour as well in the morning as in the evening, Take also with you the lives of some of the saints or some other spiritual book out of which to make your reading; and these should be your only companions in solitude during the eight days.

5. It is also necessary, in order to obtain that light and to hear what the Lord will speak to you, to avoid every distraction. "Be still, and see that I am God" (Psalms 45:11). To hear the divine voice we must cease all intercourse with the world. To a sick man no remedies will be of any use if he does not take them with the proper precaution, as avoiding exposure to the cold air, unwholesome food, or too much application of mind. In the same manner, in order that the exercises may be useful for the health of your soul, you must remove hurtful distractions, such as receiving visits from friends, messages from without, or letters which are sent to you. St. Francis de Sales, when he was engaged in the exercises, laid aside all the letters he received, and did not read them until after the exercises. It is also necessary to read no books of amusement and not even of study; for then we ought to study only the crucifix. Therefore have in your room none but spiritual books, and, reading in them, read not for curiosity's sake, but only for this one end, namely. to decide on the state of life which God will make known to you as the one He wishes you to embrace.

6. Moreover, it is not enough to avoid distractions from without; you must also avoid those from within: for if you should there deliberately allow your mind to think on the things of the world, or of study, or the like, the exercises and the solitude will be of little use to you. St. Gregory says, "What avails the solitude of the body if the solitude of the heart is wanting?" Peter Ortiz, an envoy of Charles V, wished to go to the monastery of Monte Casino to make the exercises. Having arrived at the door of the monastery he said to his thoughts what our Lord said to his disciples, "Sit ye here till I go yonder and pray" (Matthew 26:36). Thoughts of the world, wait here outside. Having finished the exercises, I shall again see you and we will again talk together. Whilst one is engaged in the exercises he ought to make use of the time only for the good of his soul, without losing any moment of it. Finally, I beg of you to recite during the exercises the following short prayer:

My God, I am that miserable one, who in the past have despised Thee, but now I esteem and love Thee above everything, nor will I love any other but Thee. Thou wouldst have me belong entirely to Thee; to Thee I will belong entirely. "Speak, O Lord, for Thy servant heareth" (1 Kings 3:10). Let me know what Thou wishest from me, and I will do all; and let me especially know in what state Thou wishest me to serve Thee. "Make the way known to me wherein I should walk" (Psalms 142:8). During the exercises recommend yourself also in an especial manner to the divine mother Mary, praying her to obtain for you the grace perfectly to accomplish the will of her Son.

And do not forget, when you make the exercises, to recommend me to Jesus Christ, as I will not omit to do in a particular manner for you, that He may make you a saint, as I heartily wish. In which sentiment I protest myself to be your most devoted and obliged servant, etc.

Chapter 12

THE VOCATION TO THE PRIESTHOOD

SECTION 1

NECESSITY OF A DIVINE VOCATION TO TAKE HOLY ORDERS

To enter any state of life a divine vocation is necessary; for without such a vocation it is, if not impossible, at least most difficult, to fulfill the obligations of our state, and obtain salvation. But if for all states a vocation is necessary, it is necessary in a particular manner for the ecclesiastical state. "He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up another way, the same is a thief and a robber" (John 10:1). Hence he who takes holy Orders without a call from God is convicted of theft, in taking by force a dignity which God does not wish to bestow upon him. "Robbers and thieves," says St. Cyril of Alexandria, "such are the names of those that dare to adjudge to themselves a grace that heaven does not offer them." And before him St. Paul said the same thing: "Neither doth any man take the honor to himself, but he that is called by God, as Aaron was. So Christ also did not glorify Himself that He might be made a high priest; but He that said unto Him: Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee" (Hebrews 5:4–5)

No one, then, however learned, prudent, and holy he may be, can thrust himself into the sanctuary unless he is first called and introduced by God. Jesus Christ himself, who among all men was certainly the most learned and the most holy, "full of grace and truth" (John 1:14), "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Colossians 2:3), Jesus Christ, I say, required a divine call in order to assume the dignity of the priesthood.

In entering the sanctuary, even after God Himself had called them to it, the saints trembled. When his bishop ordered St. Augustine to receive ordination, the saint through humility regarded the command as a chastisement of his sins. "They have forced me, in punishment of my sins." To escape the priesthood St. Ephrem of Syria feigned madness; and St. Ambrose pretended to be a man of a cruel disposition.

To avoid the priesthood, St. Ammonius the Monk cut off his ears and threatened to pluck out his tongue if the persons who pressed him to take holy Orders should continue to molest him. In a word, St. Cyril of Alexandria says, "The saints have dreaded the dignity of the priesthood, as a burden of enormous weight." Can any one, then, says St. Cyprian, be so daring as to attempt of himself, and without a divine call, to assume the priesthood?

As a vassal who would of himself take the office of minister should violate the authority of his sovereign, so he who intrudes himself into the sanctuary without a vocation violates the authority of God. How great should be the temerity of the subject who, without the appointment, and even in opposition to the will of the monarch, should attempt to administer the royal patrimony, to decide lawsuits, to command the army, and to assume the viceregal authority! "Among you," asks St. Bernard in speaking to clerics, "is there any one so insolent as, without orders and contrary to the will of the pettiest monarch, to assume the direction of his affairs?" And are not priests, as St. Prosper says, the administrators of the royal house? Are they not, according to St. Ambrose, the "leaders and rectors of the flock of Christ," according to St. John Chrysostom, the "interpreters of the divine judgments," and according to St. Denis, the "vicars of Christ"? Will any one who knows all this dare to become the minister of God without a divine call?

To think of exercising royal authority is, according to St. Peter Chrysologus, criminal in a subject. To intrude into the house of a private individual, in order to dispose of his goods and to manage his business, would be considered temerity; for even a private individual has the right of appointing the administrators of his affairs. And will you, says St. Bernard, without being called or introduced by God, intrude into his house to take charge of His interests and to dispose of His goods?

The Council of Trent has declared that the Church regards not as her minister, but as a robber, the man who audaciously assumes the priesthood without a vocation. Such priests may labor and toil, but their labors shall profit them little before God. On the contrary, the works that are meritorious in others shall deserve chastisement for them. Should a servant who is commanded by his master to take care of the house, through his own caprice labor in cultivating the vineyard, he may toil and sweat, but instead of being rewarded he shall be chastised by his master. Thus, in the first place, because they are not conformable to the divine will, the Lord shall not accept the toils of the man who, without a vocation, intrudes himself into the priesthood. "I have no pleasure in you, saith the Lord of Hosts, and I will not receive a gift of your hand" (Malachias 1:10). In the end God will not reward, but will punish, the works of the priest who has entered the sanctuary without a vocation. "What stranger soever cometh to it [the tabernacle] shall he slain." (Numbers 1:51).

Whosoever, then, aspires to holy Orders must, in the first place, carefully examine whether his vocation is from God. "For," says St. John Chrysostom, "since this dignity is great, it must be approved by a divine sentence, so that only the one that is worthy may he admitted thereto." Now, to know whether his call is from God, he should examine the marks of a divine vocation. He, says St. Luke, who wishes to build a tower first computes the necessary expenses, in order to know if he has the means of completing the edifice (Luke 14:28).

MARKS OF A DIVINE VOCATION TO THE SACERDOTAL STATE

Let us now see what are the marks of a divine vocation to the sacerdotal state. Nobility is not a mark of a divine vocation. To know, says St. Jerome, whether a person should become the guide of the people in what regards their eternal salvation. we must consider not nobility of blood, but sanctity of life. St. Gregory says the same: "By one's conduct, not by one's high birth, is one's vocation to be proved."

Nor is the will of parents a mark of a divine vocation. In inducing a child to take priesthood they seek not his spiritual welfare, but their own interest, and the advancement of the family, "How many mothers," says St. John Chrysostom, or the author of the Imperfect Work, "have eyes only for the bodies of their children and disdain their souls! To see them happy here below is all that they desire; as for the punishments that perhaps their children are to endure in the next life, they do not even think of them." We must be persuaded, as Jesus Christ has said, that with regard to the choice of a state of life we have no enemies more dangerous than our own relatives. "And a man's enemies shalt be they of his own household" (Matthew 10:36). Hence the Redeemer adds: "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me" (Matthew 10:37). Oh! How many priests shall we see condemned on the day of judgment for having taken holy Orders to please their relatives.

When a young man, in obedience to the call of God, wishes to become a religious, what efforts do not his parents make, either through passion or for the interest of the family, to dissuade him from following his vocation! It is necessary to know that, according to the common opinion of theologians, this cannot be excused from mortal sin. See what I have written on this subject in my Moral Theology. Parents who act in this manner are guilty of a double sin. They sin first against charity, because they are the cause of a grievous evil to the child whom God has called to religion. A person who dissuades even a stranger from following a religious vocation is guilty of a grievous sin. They sin, secondly, against piety; for by their obligation to educate a child they are bound to promote his greatest spiritual welfare. Some ignorant confessors tell their penitents who wish to become religious, that in this they should obey their parents, and abandon their vocation if their parents object to their entering religion. These confessors adopt the opinion of Luther, who taught that a person sins by entering religion without the consent of his parents. But the doctrine of Luther was rejected by the holy Fathers, and by the Tenth Council of Toledo, in which it was decreed that children who had attained their fourteenth year may lawfully enter religion even against the will of their parents. A child is bound to obey his parents in what regards his education and the government of the house; but with regard to the choice of a state of life, he should obey God by embracing the state to which God calls him. When parents seek to be obeyed in this matter we must answer them in the words of the apostles to the princes of the Jews: "If it be just in the sight of God to hear you rather than judge ye" (Acts Of The Apostles 4:19).

St. Thomas expressly teaches that in the choice of a state of life children are not obliged to obey their parents. And the saint says that when there is question of a vocation to religion, a person is not bound even to consult his relatives; for on such occasions self interest changes relatives into enemies. Parents are, as St. Bernard says, content to see their children damned with them, rather than see them saved by entering religion and separating from the family. But when a person wishes to enter the sacerdotal state, in which he may be able to serve the family, what efforts do not his parents make to procure his ordination, either by lawful or unlawful means, whether he is called or not called to the priesthood! And with what severity do they not treat him if, through remorse of conscience, he refuse to take holy Orders! Barbarous fathers! Let us, with St. Bernard, call them not parents, but murderers! Unhappy fathers! Miserable children! I say again. How many shall we see condemned in the valley of Josaphat for having interfered with the vocation of others, or for not having attended to their own! For, as we shall hereafter demonstrate, the salvation of each individual depends on following the divine call.

But let us return to our subject. Neither nobility of birth nor the will of parents is a mark of a vocation to the priesthood; nor is talent or fitness for the offices of a priest a sign of vocation, for along with talent a holy life and a divine call are necessary. What, then, are the marks of a divine vocation to the ecclesiastical state? There are three principal marks:

PURITY OF INTENTION

The first is a good intention. It is necessary to enter the sanctuary by the door, but there is no other door than Jesus Christ: "I am the door of the sheep. . . . If any man enter in, he shall be saved" (John 10:7,9). To enter, then, by the door is to become a priest not to please relatives, nor to advance the family, nor for the sake of self interest or self esteem, but to serve God, to propagate His glory, and to save souls. "If any one," says a wise theologian, the learned continuator of Tournely, presents himself for holy Orders without any vicious affection, and with the sole desire to be employed in the service of God and in the salvation of his neighbor, he, we may believe, is called by God." Another author asserts that he who is impelled by ambition, interest, or a motive of his own glory, is called not by God, but by the devil. "But," adds St. Anselm, "he who enters the priesthood through so unworthy motives shall receive not a blessing, but a malediction from God."

SCIENCE AND TALENTS

The second mark is the talent and learning necessary for the fulfillment of the duties of a priest. Priests must be masters to teach the people the law of God. "For the lips of the priest shall keep knowledge, and they shall seek the law at his mouth" (Malachias 2:7). Sidonius Apollinarius used to say: "Ignorant physicians are the cause of many deaths." And ignorant priests, particularly a confessor who teaches false doctrines and gives bad counsels, will be the ruin of many souls; because, in consequence of being a priest, his errors are easily believed. Hence Ivone Carnotensis has written: "No one should be admitted to holy Orders unless he has given sufficient proofs of good conduct and learning."

A priest must not only have a competent knowledge of all the rubrics necessary for the celebration of Mass, but must be also acquainted with the principal things that regard the sacrament of penance. It is true, that every priest is not obliged to hear confessions, unless there is great necessity for his assistance in the district in which he lives; however, every priest is bound to be acquainted with what a priest must ordinarily know in order to be able to hear the confessions of dying persons; that is, he is bound to know when he has faculties to absolve, when and how he ought to give absolution to the sick, whether conditionally or absolutely; what obligation he ought to impose on them, if they are under any censure. He should also know at least the general principles of Moral Theology.

POSITIVE GOODNESS OF CHARACTER

The third mark of an ecclesiastical vocation is positive virtue. Hence, in the first place, the person who is to be ordained should be a man of innocent life, and should not be contaminated by sins. The apostle requires that they who are to be ordained priests should be free from every crime. In ancient times a person who had committed a single mortal sin could never be ordained, as we learn from the First Council of Nice. And St. Jerome says that it was not enough for a person to be free from sin, at the time of his ordination, but that it was, moreover, necessary that he should not have fallen into mortal sin since the time of his baptism. It is true that this rigorous discipline has ceased in the Church, but it has been always at least required that he who had fallen into grievous sins should purify his conscience for a considerable time before his ordination. This we may infer from a letter to the Archbishop of Rheims, in which Alexander III commanded that a deacon who had wounded another deacon, if he sincerely repented of his sin, might, after being absolved, and after performing the penance enjoined, be permitted again to exercise his Order; and that if he afterwards led a perfect life, he might be promoted to priesthood. He, then, who finds himself bound by a habit of any vice cannot take any holy Order without incurring the guilt of mortal sin. "I am horrified," says St. Bernard, "when I think whence thou comest, whither thou goest, and what a short penance thou hast put between thy sins and thy ordination. However, it is indispensable that thou do not undertake to purify the conscience of others before thou purifiest thy own." Of those daring sinners who, though full of bad habits, take priesthood, an ancient author, Gildas, says, "It is not to the priesthood that they should be admitted, but they should be dragged to the pillory." They, then, says St. Isidore, who are still subject to the habit of any sin should not be promoted to holy Orders.

But he who intends to ascend the altar must not only be free from sin, but must have also begun to walk in the path of perfection, and have acquired a habit of virtue. In our Moral Theology we have shown in a distinct dissertation (and this is the common opinion) that if a person in the habit of any vice wish to be ordained it is not enough for him to have the dispositions necessary for the sacrament of penance, but that he must also have the dispositions required for receiving the sacrament of order; otherwise he is unfit for both: and should he receive absolution with the intention of taking Orders without the necessary dispositions, he and the confessor who absolves him shall be guilty of a grievous sin. For it is not enough for those who wish to take holy Orders to have left the state of sin: they must also, according to the words of Alexander III, cited in the preceding paragraph, have the positive virtue necessary for the ecclesiastical state. From the words of the Pontiff we learn that a person who has done penance may exercise an order already received, but he who has only done penance cannot take a higher order. The angelic Doctor teaches the same doctrine: "Sanctity is required for the reception of holy Orders, and we must place the sublime burden of the priesthood only upon walls already dried by sanctity; that is, freed from the malignant humor of sin." This is conformable to what St. Denis wrote long before: "Let no one be so bold as to propose himself to others as their guide in the things of God, if he has not first, with all his power, transformed himself into God to the point of perfect resemblance to Him." For this St. Thomas adduces two reasons: the first is, that as he who takes Orders is raised above seculars in dignity, so he should be superior to them in sanctity. The second reason is, that by his ordination a priest is appointed to exercise the most sublime ministry on the altar, for which greater sanctity is required than for the religious state.

Hence the Apostle forbade Timothy to ordain neophytes; that is, according to St. Thomas, neophytes in perfection as well as neophytes in age. Hence the Council of Trent, in reference to the words of Scripture, "And a spotless life in old age" (Wisdom 4:9), prescribes to the bishops to admit to ordination only those who show themselves worthy by a conduct full of wise maturity. And of this positive virtue it is necessary, according to St. Thomas, to have not a doubtful but a certain knowledge. This, according to St. Gregory, is particularly necessary with regard to the virtue of chastity: "No one should be admitted to the ministry of the altar unless an assurance has been given of his perfect chastity." With regard to chastity, the holy Pontiff required a proof of many years.

From this we may infer that God will demand a terrible account of the parish priest who gives to persons aspiring to the priesthood a testimony of their having frequented the sacraments and led exemplary lives, though they had neglected the frequentation of the sacraments, and had given scandal rather than good example. Such parish priests by these false attestations, given not through charity, as they pretend, but against the charity due to God and the Church, render themselves guilty of all the sins that shall be afterwards committed by the bad priests who were ordained in consequence of these testimonials. For in this matter bishops trust to the testimony of parish priests, and are deceived. Nor should a parish priest in giving such attestations trust the testimony of others: he cannot give them unless he is certain that what he attests is true, namely, that the ecclesiastic has really led an exemplary life, and has frequented the sacraments. And as a bishop cannot ordain any person unless he be a man of approved chastity, so a confessor cannot permit an incontinent penitent to receive ordination without having a moral certainty that he is free from the bad habit which he had contracted, and that he had acquired a habit of the virtue of chastity.

DANGERS BY TAKING HOLY ORDERS WITHOUT A VOCATION

From what has been said, it follows that he who takes holy Orders without the marks of a vocation cannot be excused from the guilt of grievous sin. This is the doctrine of many theologians, of Habert, of Natalis Alexander, of Juenin, and of the continuator of Tournely. And before them St. Augustine taught the same. Speaking of the chastisement inflicted on Core, Dathan, and Abiron, who, without being called, attempted to exercise the sacerdotal functions, the holy Doctor said: "God struck them that they might serve as an example, and thus to warn off him who would dare to assume a sacred charge. Indeed, this is the chastisement reserved for those who would thrust themselves into the office of bishop, priest, or deacon." And the reason is, first, because he who thrusts himself into the sanctuary without a divine call cannot be excused from grievous presumption; secondly, because he shall be deprived of the congruous and abundant helps, without which, as Habert writes, he shall be absolutely unable to comply with the obligations of his state, but shall fulfill them only with great difficulty. He will be like a dislocated member, which can be used only with difficulty, and which causes deformity.

Hence Bishop Ahelly writes: "He who of himself, without inquiring whether he has a vocation or not, thrusts himself into the priesthood will no doubt expose himself to the great danger of losing his soul; for he commits against the Holy Ghost that sin for which, as the Gospel says, there is hardly or very rarely any pardon."

The Lord has declared that His wrath is provoked against those who wish to rule in his Church without being called by Him. On this passage St. Gregory says, "It is by themselves and not by the will of the Supreme Head that they reign" (Osee 8:4).

Divine vocation is entirely wanting to them, and they have followed only the ardor of vile cupidity, not certainly to accept, but to usurp this sublime dignity. How many intrigues, adulations, entreaties, and other means do certain persons employ in order to procure ordination, not in obedience to the call of God, but through earthly motives! But, woe to such men, says the Lord by the prophet Isaias: "Woe to you, apostate children, . . . that you would take counsel, and not of me" (Isaias 30:1). On the day of judgment they shall claim a reward, but Jesus Christ shall cast them off. "Many will say to me in that day, Have we not prophesied in thy name [by preaching and teaching], and cast out devils in thy name [by absolving penitent sinners], and done many miracles in thy name [by correcting the wicked, by settling disputes, by converting sinners]? And then will I profess unto them: I never knew you; depart from me, you that work iniquity" (Matthew 7:22–23). Priests who have not been called are indeed workmen and ministers of God, because they have received the sacerdotal character; but they are ministers of iniquity and rapine, because they have of their own will, and without vocation, intruded themselves into the sheepfold. They have not, as St. Bernard says, received the keys, but have taken them by force. They toil, but God will not accept; He will, on the contrary punish their works and labors because they have not entered the sanctuary, by the straight path. "The labor of fools shall afflict them that know not how to go to the city" (Ecclesiastes 10:15). The Church, says St. Leo, receives only those whom the Lord chooses, and by his election makes fit to be His ministers. But, on the other hand, the Church rejects those whom, as St. Peter Damian has written, God has not called; for instead of promoting her welfare, they commit havoc among her members; and instead of edifying, they contaminate and destroy her children.

"Whom he [the Lord] shall choose, they shall approach to him" (Numbers 16:5). God will gladly admit into His presence all whom He has called to the priesthood, and will cast off the priest whom He has not chosen. St. Ephrem regards as lost the man who is so daring as to take the order of priesthood without a vocation. "I am astonished," he says, "at that which those fools dare to do, who, without the grace of vocation through Christ, full of boldness, seek to insinuate themselves into the office of the priesthood. Miserable beings, that know not that they are preparing for themselves an eternal fire." And Peter de Blois has written: "What ruin does not the bold man prepare for himself who of the sacrifice makes a sacrilege, and of life an instrument of death!" He who errs in his vocation exposes himself to greater danger than if he transgressed particular precepts; for if he violates a particular command, he may rise from his fall, and begin again to walk in the right path, but he who errs in his vocation mistakes the way itself. Hence the longer he travels in it, the more distant he is from his home. To him we may justly apply the words of St. Augustine: "You run well, but on the wrong road."

It is necessary to be persuaded of the truth of what St. Gregory says, that our eternal salvation depends principally on embracing the state to which God has called us. The reason is evident: for it is God that destines, according to the order of His Providence, his state of life for each individual, and according to the state to which He calls him, prepares for Him abundant graces and suitable helps. "In the distribution of graces," says St. Cyprian, "the Holy Ghost takes into consideration His own plan, and not our caprices." And according to the Apostle: "And whom he predestinated, them he also called. And whom he called, them he also justified" (Romans 8:30). Thus to vocation succeeds justification, and to justification glory; that is, the attainment of eternal life. He then, who does not obey the call of God shall neither he justified nor glorified. Father Granada justly said that vocation is the main wheel of our entire life. As in a clock, if the main wheel be spoiled, the entire clock is injured, so, says St. Gregory Nazianzen, if a person err in his vocation his whole life will be full of errors; for in the state to which God has not called him he will be deprived of the helps by which he can with facility lead a good life.

"Every one," says St. Paul, "has his proper gift from God; one after this manner, and another after that" (1 Corinthians 7:7). The meaning of this passage, according to St. Thomas and other commentators, is, that the Lord gives to each one graces to fulfill with ease the obligations of the state to which He calls him. "God," says the angelic Doctor, "gives to every man not only certain aptitudes, but also all that is necessary to exercise them." And in another place he writes: "God does not destine men to such or such a vocation without favoring them with gifts at the same time, and preparing them in such a way as to render them capable of fulfilling the duties of their vocation; for, says St. Paul: "Our sufficiency is from God, who also hath made us fit ministers of the New Testament." As each person, then, will be able to discharge with facility the office to which God elects him, so he will be unfit for the fulfillment of the office to which God does not call him. The foot, which is given to enable us to walk, cannot see; the eye, which is given to see, is incapable of hearing; and how shall he who is not chosen by God to the priesthood be able to discharge its obligations?

It belongs to the Lord to choose the workmen who are to cultivate his vineyard: "I have chosen you . . . and have appointed you that you should go, and should bring forth fruit" (John 15:16). Hence the Redeemer did not say, Beg of men to go and gather the harvest; but He tells us to ask the master of the crop to send workmen to collect it (Luke 10:2). Hence he also said: "As the Father hath sent me, I also send you" (John 20:21). When God calls, He Himself, says St. Leo, gives the necessary helps. This is what Jesus Christ has said: "I am the door. By me if any man enter in he shall be saved, and he shall go in, and go out, and shall find pastures" (John 10:9). "He shall go in:" what the priest called by God undertakes, he shall easily accomplish without sin, and with merit. "And shall go out:" he shall be in the midst of perils and occasions of sin, but with the divine aid he shall readily escape injury. "And shall find pastures:" finally, in consequence of being in the state in, which God has placed him, he will be assisted in all the duties of his ministry by special graces, which will make him advance in perfection. Hence he will be able to say with confidence "The Lord ruleth me and I shall want nothing. He hath set me in a place of pasture" (Psalms 22:2).

But priests whom God has not sent to work in his Church he shall abandon to eternal ignominy and destruction. "I have not sent these prophets." says the Lord by the prophet Jeremias, "yet they ran." He afterwards adds: "Therefore I will take you and carry you away, and will forsake you . . . and I will bring an everlasting reproach upon you, and a perpetual shame which shall never be forgotten" (Jeremias. 23:21, 39–40).

In order to be raised to the sublimity of the priesthood it is necessary, as St. Thomas says, for a man "to be exalted and elevated by divine power above the natural order of things," because he is appointed the sanctifier of the people, and the vicar of Jesus Christ. But in him who raises himself to so great a dignity shall be verified the words of the Wise Man: "There is that hath appeared a fool after he was lifted up on high" (Proverbs 30:32). Had he remained in the world, he should perhaps have been a virtuous layman; but having become a priest without a vocation, he will be a bad priest, and instead of promoting the interest of religion, he will do great injury to the Church. Of such priests the Roman Catechism says: "Such ministers are for the Church of God the gravest embarrassment and the most terrible scourge." And what good can be expected from the priest who has entered the sanctuary without a vocation? "It is impossible," says St. Leo, "that a work so badly begun should finish well." St. Laurence Justinian has written: "What fruit, I ask, can come from a corrupted root?" Our Saviour has said, "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up" (Matthew 15:13). Hence Peter de Blois writes that when God permits a person to be ordained without a vocation, the permission is not a grace, but a chastisement. For a tree which has not taken deep root, when exposed to the tempest shall soon fall and be cast into the fire. And St. Bernard says that he who has not lawfully entered the sanctuary shall continue to be unfaithful; and instead of procuring the salvation of souls, he shall be the cause of their death and perdition. This is conformable to the doctrine of Jesus Christ: "He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold. . . . the same is a thief and a robber" (John 10:1).

Some may say, if they only were admitted to orders who have the marks of vocation which have been laid down as indispensable, there should be but few priests in the Church, and the people should be left without the necessary helps. But to this the Fourth Council of Lateran has answered: "It is much better to confer the priesthood on a small number of virtuous clerics than to have a large number of bad priests." And St. Thomas says that God never abandons his Church so as to leave her in want of fit ministers to provide for the necessity of the people. St. Leo justly says that to provide for the wants of the people by bad priests would be not to save but to destroy them.

If, then, a priest has been ordained without a vocation, what must he do? Must he look on himself as lost? Must he abandon himself to despair? No. St. Gregory has asked the same question. He answers: "He must lament." Behold what such a priest must do if he wish to save his soul: "He must lament;" he must weep, and seek to appease the anger of God by tears and by repentance, and to move Him to pardon the great sin that he committed in thrusting himself into the sanctuary without a divine call. He must, as St. Bernard exhorts, endeavor to attain after his ordination the sanctity of life which ought to precede it. He must change his conduct, his conversation and pursuits. "Let all be holy your life and your works," continues the saint. If he is ignorant, he must study; if he has spent his time in worldly conversations and amusements, he must change them into meditations, spiritual reading, and visits to the churches. But to do this he must use violence to himself; for, as has been already said, since he has entered the sanctuary without a vocation, he is but a dislocated member, and therefore he must work out his salvation with great difficulty and great labor. But if in consequence of having become a priest without a divine call, he is, as has been shown, bereft of the helps necessary to enable him to discharge with facility the obligations of the priesthood, how shall he without these helps fulfill the sacerdotal duties? Habert and the continuator of Tournely say, let him pray, and by his prayers he shall obtain that assistance which he does not deserve. This is conformable to the doctrine of the Council of Trent: "God commands not impossibilities, but, by commanding, both admonishes thee to do what thou art able, and to pray for what thou art not able [to do], and aids thee that thou mayest be able."

THE volume which is now presented to the devout public, although destined by St. Liguori for the especial use of those engaged in the ministry of the Divine Word, possesses this advantage, in common with many works of a similar description by the same blessed Author, that it may be read with great spiritual advantage by Christian people indiscriminately. The pastor of souls it furnishes (to use a somewhat homely illustration) with a frame whereon to weave his sermons—a frame constructed with consummate skill out of materials supplied by Holy Writ and the Fathers of the Church. The simple faithful it supplies with the greatest possible amount of instruction, in the smallest compass—possessing them of every truth connected with the subject and every proof of each; yet so as to leave room for their expansion under the action of the reader's understanding—a plan recommended by the high sanction of St. Ignatius. "It is sufficient," says St. Ignatius, "briefly to trace the points of meditation, accompanying them with some few explanatory words, so as to leave room for the exercitant to reason after his own fashion upon the truths subjected to his consideration. Should he thus be led to anything enlightening him upon the subject, whether guided by reason or inspiration, he will feel more relish for it and turn it to better account than if the subject had been explained to him in all its details." Now, although St. Ignatius in this passage speaks solely with reference to meditation, his remarks, I think, may apply to sermons in the hands of the laity; for, after all, religious reading is a kind of meditation—imperceptible, perhaps—but still meditation.

There are many things in the Sermons of St. Liguori to distinguish them from the French Sermons, which occupy a place so deservedly high in the libraries of pastors. Unlike the Sermons of Massillon, Bourdaloue, Bossuet, Fenelon and M'Carthy, they are wholly destitute of that human and courtly eloquence, which I am far from insinuating that those great men did not wield with the utmost advantage to souls, and honour to the Almighty, but which, on the whole, appears to me a less fitting model for the eloquence of the Irish Clergy, taken as a body, than the simple and apostolic phrase of Liguori. Although with those great and holy preachers, (confessedly the greatest whom any church can boast) St. Liguori never—endingly draws upon that exhaustless treasury of Divine Wisdom, the sacred Scriptures; yet we fail to discover in the use he makes of the inspired writers, that ingenuity which amongst the French preachers often appears to run down the text and force upon it constructions better calculated to amuse the fancy than to convince the reason. This use of the sacred text, although I am glad it has not the sanction of our Saint and although Dr. Blair expressly disapproves of it and although I cannot say that in this particular my taste is at variance with his, this use of the sacred text, I am far from condemning; as it is a portion of that grand system of condescension by which the Church makes herself " all to all, that she may gain all to Christ," her spouse. Verily this Bread of Life which she breaks to the people may be said, like the manna in the wilderness, to possess the " sweetness of all tastes so that whoso eats thereof will find in it the flavour that he loves. Christian eloquence may indeed be said to have a garb for every eye and modulate her tones for every ear. During the first centuries of the Church, she arrays herself in the majestic and unadorned simplicity of the gospel; during the decline of taste, she assumes the tinsel of Rome, the stole of the Athenian rhetorician, the soft and gaudy chaplet of Asiatic Greece, and the Barbaric splendour of Asia itself, according as she must yield to the requirements of souls; in the middle ages she does not disdain to play upon words, to balance an antithesis or point an epigram; upon the revival of literature, she again conforms to the reigning taste and makes the ancient classics tributary to the gospel; and now in France she combats with its own weapons, the false philosophy of the age; in England she adopts that quaintness and those old forms which the literature of the present day affects; in Ireland she is impassioned, popular and presses straightway to the heart; and in the regions of the Far West, beyond the encroachments of civilization, the Jesuit, to whom the chaste and beautiful productions of Greece and Rome are familiar as household words, preaches the gospel in the exuberant, and to us, laughable metaphor of the savage tribes. In sooth, the gift of tongues has not departed from the Church, and announcing the same great truths to every generation and every people, she is understood by each in its own tongue, and the strain to which itself inclines.

There is another feature in the Sermons of our Saint, to which I would direct the attention of the pious reader. I allude to the simple, yet striking, illustrations in which St. Liguori deals so largely; and as a specimen of which, I may be permitted to instance a sermon in which our blessed Author for the more forcible illustration of the value of redemption, supposes the case of a monarch who should suffer himself to be slain, that by immersion in a bath of his blood a worm (which could not otherwise be restored to life,) might be revived. Perhaps there is not an engine of sacred oratory which can be used with more powerful effect than this. The blessed Alphonsus Rodriguez, of the Society of Jesus, in his book on Christian Perfection, makes frequent use of it; and Father Segneri, of the same society, in his admirable sermons employs it still more frequently than St. Liguori, simply because his sermons are longer and more numerous than those of the Saint. Who is there, unless he be devoid of faith, who can read without being startled the comparison used by Father Segneri to illustrate the relative severity of Purgatory pains and earthly fire? "A soul," he says, "transferred from the fire of Purgatory to an earthly furnace, should feel as much relief as a man removed from such a furnace to a bath of gentle warmth." In another place, "the fire of Purgatory," he says," acts not upon matter, but on spirit; and we must bear in mind, that amongst beings capable of suffering, the most perfect suffer most acutely. A sturdy clown ill clad, ill fed, ill housed, is proof against all the extremities of heat and cold; whereas a delicate lady in her luxurious apartment is painfully alive to all the changes of the weather." There is no one to whom the beauty and the appropriateness of these illustrations will not be apparent, or who can fail to remark the new and somewhat startling light in which they place the subject. And now that the book of nature is so closely conned—now that the veil of mystery which for ages hung upon her secrets is fast falling off, that the obscurity in which she so long reposed, is every day invaded by some new light of science and wonders are achieved, at the possibility of which our fathers should have smiled—now, in fine, that the conversation even of after—dinner parties turns upon those subjects, of what a magazine of beautiful and forceful illustrations may not the preacher possess himself if he will?—illustrations telling far more powerfully than any other species of argument upon those who understand them, a class which, although it is at present composed of persons chiefly from the higher walks, is being every day recruited from the National Schools and far more useful as well as far more National Establishments of the Christian Brothers. I could multiply examples of these latter illustrations, but besides that it might savour of pedantry, I must make amends to the reader for having omitted to solicit his indulgence for the two or three illustrations of another description which I have cited. Perhaps I view the scientific illustrations with an undue and distempered affection—perhaps they deserve less indulgence than I might feel disposed to challenge for them—perhaps they have all that they deserve in having mine; the reader may take them at what they are worth,—I think them valuable.

The next and last feature of the work to which I pray the attention of the reader, is the scriptural character of St. Liguori's sermons. There is not a single page in which you will not meet with several appeals to Holy Writ, not only falsifying the imputations of scriptural ignorance so unsparingly cast upon our clergy, but making it difficult, if not impossible, to find in any other author or preacher so much scriptural learning. Indeed, others have not been wanting practically to disprove this oft—repeated slander. The continual recurrence to the authority of Scripture to be met with in French sermons, from the courtly, but not on that account less apostolic eloquence of the Petit Careme to the simple, and on that account, almost more apostolic eloquence of the unpretending prone—the beautiful paraphrase of psalm, canticle, epistle, sermon on the Mount, or other words of our Lord, with which Massillon and Mac Carthy beyond the others, so frequently conclude their sermons—the scriptural train of thought in fine and turn of expression, which prevail throughout, proudly avouch that the ancient dispensatrix of the treasures of Scripture, still scatters them with undiminished liberality. And here we may observe in passing, that these scriptural allusions to be relished must be understood and that they were understood we may fearlessly assume, from the bare circumstance of their having been used by the great men of whom we have been speaking. Hence, the mighty virtue of the word of Massillon, when in his sermon upon the last day, he summoned the "remnant of Israel" to" pass to the right," and the multitude in its terror was fain to flee out of the Church.

The homily which is little else than a running commentary upon the text, is doubtless the most apostolic, if not at all times the most convenient form of sermon, so much so, that in point of fact, none other was made use of during the first ages of the Church and St. Liguori's sermons, though not of this description, are certainly as perfect a substitute as may be.

The sublime morality of the gospel announced by one who speaks as "having authority," will ever find favour with the faithful people of Ireland; but it is not possible that it should be as efficacious, enforced by human eloquence, as by the words of inspiration. It irks me I confess, to hear a sermon of other than a scriptural character, for assuredly no beauty of language can compensate for the absence of that divine beauty which even a mere critic can discover in the Holy Scriptures. Profane writers esteem themselves fortunate to discover in some poet or other author, a suitable sentiment to back their own opinions. Is it not then a strange omission in a sacred orator, if he suffer any principle of morality to go unrecommended to his hearers by something from the Holy Ghost, who is ever ready to supply him with stronger and more eloquent arguments than his own sterile intellect can produce. So thought the amiable and great Archbishop Fenelon; so thought St. Liguori.

I shall not pause to notice the frequent use made by St. Liguori of the holy Fathers and pious anecdotes, for which latter authority however he challenges no more belief than the faithful can afford to give. For my own part, I shall resign all faith in history before I can be induced to disbelieve, such miracles as have been juridically proved in the process of a Saints' canonization. But I fear I have been betrayed into an essay and have wandered from the descriptive which I set out with, into the didactic, which was not my province. It is too late for me now to ask the reader in the words of the apostle to bear with me a little. He who shall have gone thus far must needs have borne with me,—I thank him for it—should any remark of mine meet his views, or contribute to his improvement he may consider me rewarded.

LIFE OF SAINTALPHONSUS LIGUORI

AYOUTH of noble lineage who courageously bows him to the yoke of the Lord; a lawyer whose rare talents and vast acquirements as well as his extreme virtue, command the admiration of the entire bar of his country; a minister of the sanctuary, who renouncing the vain pomp of the world and all the honourable posts to which he is entitled to aspire, takes the Lord for the portion of his inheritance; an indefatigable gospel labourer, who, burning with the love of God and his neighbour, spares no pains to promote the glory of the one and the salvation of the other; the founder of a new congregation of missionary priests, who governs his order with unexampled wisdom; a zealous bishop who entirely forgetful of himself, thinks only of the flock committed to his care; finally, a venerable old man, who, laying down the burthen of the episcopacy, retires amongst his brethren, leads amid the sharp and protracted sufferings of disease, as well as the infirmities of old age, a hidden life, in Jesus Christ and closes blessedly in the same his mortal career; all this we see in St. Alphonsus Liguori.

He was born in Marinella, in the suburbs of Naples, on the 27th of September, 1696, the feast of Saints Cosmas and Damian and baptised two days after, on the feast of St. Michael the Archangel. Amongst the names given him, Alphonsus, Maria, were the leading ones and by these to the exclusion of the others, he is usually known. His father Joseph, of the noble house of Liguori, was alike distinguished for talent, (especially military,) and for virtue: and his mother Catherine, (also of a noble house,) was sister to the celebrated servant of God, Emilio Jacomo Cavalieri, Bishop of Troy in partibus, who died in the odour of sanctity. Indeed she was worthy such a brother, being scarcely, if at all, inferior to him in sanctity of life; whilst her virtues, more especially those which she exercised in the education of her children, were so numerous and striking, that they might well be chronicled distinctly from those of her blessed son.

Alphonsus, in early youth, nay, we might almost say, in infancy, had arrived at a degree of perfection which those might consider themselves happy, the labours of whose entire lives had been crowned by the attainment of. The odour of his sanctity, even then, edified all with whom he conversed; and those who have written his life in detail, mention numerous instances of virtue, more than one or two of which we cannot afford to specify and these we must be content with barely naming. He had a remarkable disinclination for the amusements of children and never took part in them, unless when charity, or the fear of singularity, ruled it otherwise. His perfect recollection and tender devotion to mysteries, which most children of his age can scarce be brought to understand, were perfectly heroic and even amongst the youths with whom he obliged to associate in the college of nobles, under the conduct of the priests of the oratory, his conduct never varied; his devotion to the sacrament of the altar and the Mother of God, continually gaining strength. His progress in human learning, kept pace so well with his progress in the science of the saints, that when he had completed his legal studies, he required a dispensation of three years for admission to the degree of doctor in canon and civil law.

He practiced for some time at the bar and was fast growing into repute, when an incident occurred, to which, in the dispensations of Providence, we are indebted for the apostolic labours and inspired writings of our Saint. My meaning will not be mistaken when I say, that the writings of Liguori are inspired,—for, although we have no canonical assurance of the fact, yet surely we may believe that his writings, if not actually the dictation, were at least composed under the direction of the Holy Spirit. Alphonsus having been retained as counsel for the defence, in a case of great interest and importance, his pleading was so ingenious and so eloquent, that the president Signor Caravita, felt disposed to give judgment in favour of his client, when the counsel on the other side, instead of replying, simply begged of Alphonsus to reconsider his argument and see whither it was not unsound. Alphonsus to his great confusion and surprise, perceived it to be flawed by reason of his having overlooked one negative particle in the process. The court and audience complimented him upon his able defence and acquitted him of any blame upon the score of negligence; attributing his oversight to the warmth so natural to a young lawyer in his situation. Alphonsus, however, did not so readily acquit himself; but, having bowed to the court, was heard to say, as he withdrew, "false world, I know you, and have done with you;"—he had given up the bar.

Almighty God was pleased to enlighten his mind, during a retreat of three days, which he made under the direction of his confessor; at the end of which period he was confirmed in his resolution, to attend solely to the care of his salvation. Even at this stage of his departure from the world, he experienced the opposition which he had so long to encounter from his father, but his determination was all the more steady for it and he at once repaired to the hospitals of the city, where his vocation took a more specific form and he heard himself invited by mysterious voices to the ecclesiastical state. It was now that his father began to be sturdy in his opposition: he engaged such of his relations as he thought likely to be influential with Alphonsus, to dissuade him from his project,—the congregation of St. Philip Neri, which Alphonsus sought to enter, was obliged to decline receiving him through fear of his father's resentment; and when, at length, a tardy consent was extracted from him, it was only on condition that his son should remain for a year at home. Alphonsus having now nothing to divide his attention with the pursuit of virtue and sacred science, devoted himself unreservedly to the attainment of both,—and applied his powerful intellects so vigorously to the study of theology, as rapidly to fit himself for the office of a teacher in Israel. Instruction is peculiarly the duty of a christian priest; the priest of idols offers sacrifice, but neither sacrifice nor the administration of the sacraments, are even the chief duty of a priest of the New Law, for St. Paul says, that he was sent to preach, rather than to baptize. The rapid and steady progress of Alphonsus in piety and learning, induced Cardinal Pignatelli, the then Archbishop of Naples, to hasten his promotion to tonsure and minor orders; unwilling that the church should longer remain without numbering such a youth as he amongst her ministers. Immediately that Alphonsus was advanced to minor orders, he entered upon the discharge of his functions and kept it with faith and assiduity. Anxious, not only to preserve that purity of life to which he was exhorted by the ordaining bishop, but, moreover, continually to amass new treasures of grace, he regularly attended the religious exercises of the fathers of the mission; a practice which he persevered in up to the time of his ordination to the priesthood. No sooner Alphonsus had received deaconship, than the Cardinal Archbishop, not content with permitting, exhorted him to preach; and the obedient levite, in compliance with the desire of his pastor, preached his first sermon in the parish church of St. John, in Porta, upon the Blessed Sacrament of the Altar. His zeal and unction soon brought upon themselves demands innumerable and his labours were such, that he was seized with a fit of illness, which brought him to the verge of death. Having received the viaticum with that fervent piety which he always manifested towards the Blessed Sacrament, he expressed an anxious wish to have beside his bed the statue of the most holy Mary della Mercede, by whose altar he had hung his sword when about to leave the world. The clergy of the church complied with his request, although the night was far advanced; and no sooner had he beheld and saluted the statue of his blessed mother, than all the mortal symptoms of his disorder vanished and after a short time he was restored to health.

On the 27th of December, 1726, Alphonsus, being in the thirty—first year of his age, was ordained priest. We shall not dilate upon the raptures of Alphonsus, when he found himself on the summit of the holy mountain. We pass over the sentiments of faith, love and gratitude, with which he immolated, for the first time, the sacred victim of the altar. We speak not of the redoubled fervour with which he applied himself to all his usual practices of piety and more especially to the loving adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, we press onward to his apostolical labours and taking a hasty survey of all he did and taught and weighing his title to greatness in the balance of the sanctuary, over which is inscribed, "qui fecerit et docuerit sic homines, hie magnus vocabitur in regno coelorum." We shall see whether his title be such, that in the kingdom of Heaven he is called great.

As a matter of course, the pulpit labours of Alphonsus increased on his advancement to the priesthood; and to these were added the toilsome and revolting duties of the confessional. So great, in fact, was the esteem in which Alphonsus was held by his Archbishop, that he had no sooner been ordained priest, than he was appointed to conduct the retreat of the clergy, although there were amongst them many apostolic and eloquent men of older standing than he. He was peculiarly fitted for the confessional, not by the qualities which he possessed, (all of which are indispensable to every good confessor,) but by the degree in which he possessed them. His tenderness in receiving, his patience in hearing, his sweetness in admonition, were such as few or none had ever met with. The unction with which he represented to the sinner his ingratitude and the moving words by which he sought to excite him to repentance, were irresistible.

Inspired by his zeal for the salvation of souls, he bethought him of a means whereby to confirm his penitents in their holy resolutions and instruct them more at large in the science of perfection. On festival days assembling them around him, in some remote and silent quarter of the city, he there addressed them on spiritual subjects. There encircled by persons of the meanest condition, he was all the better pleased on that account, as they afforded him an opportunity of enlightening them upon many portions of the christian doctrine, of which they had, till then, been ignorant. After a time several priests and some laymen of a spiritual life, joined him in his conferences, when the assembly having been represented to the governor, as of a suspicious character, was dissolved, though not without the innocence of its object having been recognised. The priests upon this, retired to a house in the city and spent their time in exercises of penance and devotion and those of no ordinary character, but, to Alphonsus scarce any extremity of vigour, scarce any pitch of fervour was unknown. Alphonsus took care that the dispersion of his hearers should not be prejudicial to the poor people who shared most of his attention, for he caused the more enlightened and zealous of his penitents, to assemble their less favoured brethren and speak to them on spiritual subjects, with the consent of the Archbishop, in private houses and hired rooms and at length, even in public oratories and chapels.

Matteo Ripa, a truly apostolic priest, having returned from China, with some youths of that nation, destined for the sacred ministry, succeeded in 1729, in establishing a college for the Chinese mission. To this college Alphonsus withdrew, as well to escape the distractions of his father's house, as to perfect himself in the ministry of the divine word, under such a master as Matteo Ripa. Alphonsus lived in the college on no other footing than that of a guest, although for a time he had some thoughts of China, which he relinquished in obedience to his confessor, Father Pagano. Our Saint meanwhile continued to preach in all the churches of Naples to immense congregations and with abundant fruit. At stated periods of the year, he conducted missions in various quarters of the kingdom and while labouring for the sanctification of others, took such measures for his own, as are taken only by saints such as he.

Alphonsus, together with preaching in the Cathedral of Scala, during the novena of Jesus crucified, according to a promise given the bishop Monsignor Santoro, was also engaged in conducting the spiritual exercises, for the nuns of a certain convent and hearing their confessions. One of the sisters by name Maria Celeste Costarossa, a religious of holy life and many supernatural gifts, speaking one day in the confessional, upon spiritual matters, said to him: "Father Alphonsus, it is not the will of God that you should remain in Naples, He calls you to be the founder of a new congregation of Missionary Priests, for the spiritual aid of those souls who are most destitute." Alphonsus astonished and confused, endeavoured to convince her that this was delusion; but she would not be persuaded. In great trouble of mind and not knowing whether he should treat the intimation he had received, as the offspring of an over heated imagination, (though he felt disposed to do so, by reason of its apparent impossibility,) he addressed himself to God in prayer and took counsel of several learned and pious men, all of whom, including the Bishops of Castelmare de Sabia and Scala, assured him that the nun had conveyed to him the will of God and the Bishop of Scala engaged him to establish the first house of the future Order in his diocese. This was enough for Alphonsus—he at once dismissed from his mind all trouble and anxiety and leaving himself in the hands of God, immediately set about performing his holy will. No sooner did the news of his design get wind in Naples, than an almost universal outcry was raised against it. The Archbishop, the clergy and laity were alike averse to it; but it was from the saint's father that it had to encounter the most vigorous opposition. Not content with arraying all his friends in hostility to the design of Alphonsus, he employed against it all the power of a father's tears and that with such effect, that Alphonsus declared it to be the most formidable temptation he ever had to struggle with; having at length, however, won over the Archbishop and propitiated even his father, he set off for Scala and on the ninth of November, 1732, after having celebrated a Mass of the Holy Ghost and sung the "Te Deum," in thanksgiving for all the protection vouchsafed him in this matter, he laid the foundation of his new society. His first companions numbered twelve, consisting of ten priests and two candidates for orders, together with a serving lay—brother, Vito Curzio by name, a rich gentleman of Acquaviva di Bari, who, admonished by a vision at Naples, had chosen that humble post amongst the brethren of the new congregation.

The life which Alphonsus and his companions led in Scala, resembled nothing so exactly as the life of those penitents whom St. John Chrysostom speaks of in his "Mystic Ladder." Their lodging was small and incommodious; their beds a little straw shaken on the floor; their bread black, hard and coarse; their other food disgusting from its insipidity and taken kneeling, their religious exercises never ending, what, with frequent disciplines and continual watchings, are enough to make the most fervent tremble for their comparative tepidity; and here, the question naturally suggests itself, when such were the austerities of all the brethren, how great must not have been the rigour of the holy founder? From time to time they dispersed themselves over the country to conduct the missions and gathered in such harvests of souls (Alphonsus always foremost in labour and success,) as caused the bishop to thank God with all the fervour of his heart, for having provided his diocese with these apostles and above all, with Alphonsus, who was the great instrument in the hands of the Almighty and next to God best entitled to its gratitude.

Whilst Alphonsus and his brethren, labouring thus for their neighbour's salvation and their own, seemed like the primitive christians to have one only heart and one only soul, the enemy contrived to sow his tares amongst them and scatter the infant congregation. Our Saint thinking it high time to have a code of rules framed for the government of his congregation, wished to collect the views of his brethren upon the subject. Some would fain combine the care of poor schools with their missionary labours; some were advocates for more absolute and some for mitigated poverty; some insisted upon increased austerity and some advised relaxation; nearly all condemned the plan of Alphonsus. The Saint at other times so deferential to his brethren, defended his plan and adhered to it in every particular, notwithstanding the opposition of his companions, who, at length deserted him, with the exception of Caesar Sportelli, as yet a secular and the lay—brother Vito Curzio.

As soon as it reached Naples that Alphonsus was abandoned by his brethren, those who had originally been hostile to his design, renewed their condemnation of it in no very temperate strain. They taxed the saint with presumption, and held him up to ridicule, not allowing, even the Archbishop, to escape uncensured for the favour which he shewed Alphonsus; but the venerable Archbishop uninfluenced by these malicious speeches, in his opinion of Alphonsus or his design, sent for the holy man and encouraged him to prosecute his good work, an encouragement which, though well meant, was little needed, as Alphonsus, nothing daunted, went the mission by himself in the confidence that God in his own time would provide him with fellow—labourers. The man of God was not disappointed in his expectations; after a while he was joined by father John Mazzini and as others began to flow in apace, Alphonsus submitted to the holy see the rules he had drawn up for the government of the congregation and which met with the entire approval of the Pope.

The congregation being now distributed into different houses, the brethren set about the election of a superior—general and were unanimous in their choice of Alphonsus, whom they appointed general for life. The manifest protection extended by Divine Providence to the society, conciliated the prejudices of the most hostile and they were now as zealous in reparation as they had before been violent in disapproval. Our saint's father, who had so unremittingly opposed his movements, seeing that the congregation every day acquired stability and strength, visited his son in Ciorani and deeply affected by the sanctity of Alphonsus and his companions, with many tears begged admission as a lay—brother, but was constantly refused. We shall not go into many details upon the government of the holy superior—general; suffice it to say, that he united the greatest humility with the highest dignity—the greatest meekness with the most unlimited command—and all the virtues of the subject with all the qualities of the superior. Bound to enforce the observance of the rule, he was himself the most perfect model of regularity; his poverty was absolute and his obedience subjected him not only to his directors, but to the lay—brothers. These, however, are alike the virtues of the superior and the subject; but in the qualifications, which are peculiarly those of the superior, Alphonsus was equally pre—eminent. He made a yearly visitation of all the houses of his order; and as soon as he had completed the visitation, addressed to each house a circular replete with tender piety and spiritual learning, breathing the most ardent charity towards God and his neighbour and expressive of the tenderest love for the congregation. He was wont to embody in short and pithy sentences, the whole duty of a missionary of the congregation, or place the observance of the rule in a new and striking light. Thus he has been heard to say, that a missionary of the congregation should be a hermit within doors and an apostle abroad; and that he who disrespected the rule, disrespected Jesus Christ—as the rule being the way to perfection and consequently to Heaven, was Jesus himself, who is "the way, the truth, and the life." If there were need of reproof, he never resorted to public admonition until after the second offence; being of opinion that public correction, though beneficial to the community, is seldom useful to the offender. To the novices he was peculiarly affectionate and fatherly; and not only to those immediately under his jurisdiction, but to the novices of all the other houses, whose superiors he instructed to be all openness and love to them. When, as sometimes happened, the number of applicants for admission to the congregation exceeded the means of support which its poverty supplied, Alphonsus never refused admission to those of whose vocation he had hopes, saying that the poverty of the society should not be an obstacle in the way of their vocation and that God never suffered his levites to remain unprovided for.

In training the students for their missionary labours, every other study was of course subordinate to the great object of the congregation—the ministry of the divine word—and it was the anxious care of Alphonsus to impress them with correct notions upon this all important matter. He instructed them to avoid defacing the simplicity of the gospel with the frippery of rhetoric, or even the genuine beauties of purely human eloquence. If their sermons, he said, were not perfectly intelligible to all, they were not as they ought to be; if the dullest old woman were unable to understand them, they were not as they ought to be; if they were in the persuasive words of human wisdom and not in the simplicity of the gospel, they were not as they ought to be; if they were not, in fine, the fruit of piety and meditation, they could not, he said, be what they ought to be. He took especial care that they should fit themselves for the confessional by the study of moral theology; which, he said, should finish only with the life of the student, and without the knowledge of which, a confessor, he said, would damn himself and bring ruin on his penitents. He instructed them, moreover, in the proper treatment of different classes of penitents, impressing upon them the necessity of sweetness and charity, the danger of severity and harshness and the importance of using to advantage their discretion in giving or withholding absolution in those cases where the church has left either course open to them.

When Alphonsus, or any of his companions, travelled to the place where they were to preach the mission, it was on foot, or if the distance were great, on horseback, it being meet, he said, that those who had taken upon them the apostleship, should preserve to it all its simplicity. Having arrived at his destination, he went straight to the principal church; and after a short time spent in prayer before the Blessed Sacrament, mounted the pulpit and exhorted the people to profit by the present grace, which might never be vouchsafed them again if they were to abuse the divine mercy by not taking advantage of the time afforded them for penance. The following days were taken up by a morning and evening sermon; separate catechetical instructions for the young and the adults; the recitation of the rosary and the hearing of confessions. After nightfall some of the fathers went through the most populous parts of the city, or country, as the case might be, holding up a crucifix, reminding the people in a loud voice of their last things and inviting them to listen to the sermons.

Alphonsus, who always preached the evening sermons, was accustomed to discipline himself three times during the course of the mission; once during the sermon upon sin; once during that upon hell; and once during that on scandal; during which last he caused all his companions to discipline themselves likewise, in order to fill the people with a sovereign horror of that dreadful evil. After the general evening sermon, the women left the church and Alphonsus addressed a discourse to the men, exciting them to compunction and to discipline themselves. After he had closed the sermons di terrore, or operating by fear, he entered upon another exercise of three or four days, called by him the exercise of a devout life, consisting of instructions upon prayer and its necessity and of meditations upon the passion of Jesus Christ, which Alphonsus proposed with so much unction and tenderness, as to draw torrents of tears from his entire audience.

Next came the general communions and these he distributed through four days, according to the several conditions of the communicants. On each of the four days he endeavoured to excite sentiments of compunction and the love of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament. First came the communion of the boys and girls under the age of fourteen; next, that of the maidens and widows, which lasted for some days, during which he addressed them on the value of chastity; then came the communion of married women; before which they were enlightened upon the duties of their state; and lastly, on some festival day the communion of the men took place;—the entire mission closing with a sermon upon perseverance and solemn benediction. Nor must we omit to mention, that during all this time, the fathers of the mission were obliged to spend seven hours every morning in the confessional, which they could not leave without permission from himself, or from the president of the mission, whoever he might be.

It would be impossible to enumerate all the wonders wrought by Alphonsus in the places which he visited during his missionary career. The conversions which followed his preaching and his prayers, are, in point of fact, as well as in the eye of faith, the most stupendous of these wonders; but, as the suspension of the laws of nature, as those sensible miracles with which the Almighty was pleased to glorify his servant, are most likely to make an impression upon us, carnal generation that we are, we shall select one of the most remarkable of these and give it to our readers.

Towards the close of a mission concluded by Alphonsus, the town of Amalfi was like another Ninive, so plenteous were the tears and so exemplary was the penance of its inhabitants. Alphonsus addressing them one day upon devotion to the Blessed Virgin, exclaimed, "Ah! you do not pray to her as you ought—I shall address her for you." He then turned towards a statue of the Blessed Virgin and proceeding in a strain of enraptured eloquence, was observed by the congregation to rise some feet above the ground; while, at the same time, the statue of the Blessed Virgin all radiant, beamed upon the extatic Alphonsus and the entire multitude exclaimed, a miracle! a miracle! This lasted for some time, when Alphonsus returning to himself, assured the congregation that it had found favour with the Blessed Virgin.

The sanctity of Alphonsus and the wonders by which his preaching was attended, began to attract the notice of the entire kingdom and amongst others, of Cardinal Spinelli, who immediately fixed his eye upon him for promotion to the episcopacy. Shortly after, the Archbishopric of Palermo becoming vacant, the king determined upon appointing Alphonsus to that dignity, saying, "If the Pope appoint good bishops, I shall appoint still better." Alphonsus, who upon the mere suspicion of Cardinal Spinelli's designs, had left his unfinished mission in Naples, was dreadfully alarmed when he heard of the king's intention and bestirred himself so vigorously to counteract it, that he did at length succeed and was consoled by witnessing the appointment of another. But his joy was of short duration and his escape from the burthen of the episcopacy proved to be nothing more than a reprief; for the see of Sant'Agata de' Goti becoming vacant, he was nominated by the Pope himself to the care of that church. Alphonsus having recovered from the desolation into which he was thrown by the announcement of this intelligence, addressed a letter to the Pope, setting forth his unfitness for that high office, as well by reason of his infirm health, and advanced age, as of his spiritual unworthiness. The Holy Father upon receiving the letter of Alphonsus was deeply moved by the pathetic remonstrances of the saint; and, on the evening of the 14th of March, communicated to his Pro—auditor, Cardinal Negroni, his intention of allowing Alphonsus to decline the dignity; but, on the following morning, informed Cardinal Negroni, that God had inspired him during the night to have Alphonsus consecrated. The Pro—auditor then, by command of the Pope, wrote to Alphonsus, acquainting him with the determination of His Holiness and put him upon his obedience.

The immediate superior of the house having received and read this letter, as he had been commissioned to do by Alphonsus, proceeded, along with some other fathers, to communicate to him the will of His Holiness. Immediately upon entering his apartment, they desired him to say an Ave Maria, which he did accordingly upon his knees, whilst his entire frame bore testimony to the painful workings of his mind. They then proceeded to read to him the letter of the Pope, which when they had finished, he exclaimed, "Obmutui quoniam tu fecisti Domine, gloria Patri, etc." Then turning to his companions with tearful eyes, "God, "he said, "takes me from the congregation for my sins; ah and we must part, after thirty years of love?" But immediately afterwards expressing the most entire resignation to the divine will, he placed the Pope's letter upon his head and several times repeated, "God will have me a bishop, and a bishop will I be."Somae advised him to remonstrate with the Pope again. "No," said Alphonsus, "the Pope has put me on my obedience and I have nothing else for it;" having said which, he was seized with convulsions so violent as to deprive him of the use of speech for more than five hours. A fever of an aggravated nature then set in, caused by his lively dread of the responsibility he was about to incur and the account which he should have to render. The fever was at its height after nine days and his recovery was almost despaired of. "If he die," said the Pope," "he shall have our apostolic benediction—if he recover, let him repair to Rome." It was the will of God that Alphonsus should recover; and immediately upon his restoration to health, he prepared to set out for Rome, in compliance with the orders of His Holiness.

Meanwhile the companions of our Saint, in sore affliction at their approaching bereavement and unwilling to lose his sweet and fatherly government, having assembled in chapter, confirmed him in the perpetual superior—generalship, empowering him at the same time to govern through one of his vicars, when he should find it necessary: and this decree, in order to its greater stability, they submitted to the sacred congregation of bishops and superiors of orders, by whom it was confirmed on the 25th of May, 1762.

Alphonsus having accepted the episcopal office, through pure obedience, as we have seen, set out for Rome accompanied by Father Andrea Villani, a man of approved virtue. It was his original intention to proceed to Rome in the miserable dress which he usually wore, but he was induced by the urgent solicitations of his companions to wear a somewhat more seemly garb, although of sufficiently coarse texture. In passing through Velletri, he was received with demonstrations of the greatest respect, by Cardinal Spinelli, who insisted on his passing an entire day with him. Having arrived in Rome on the 11th of April, he declined occupying the apartment which the Prince of Piombine had prepared for him in his own palace and accepted only the carriage as being absolutely necessary. He took up his residence at the house of the fathers called, "Pii Operarii," but hearing that the Pope was then at Castel Gandolfo, Alphonsus thought he could not better employ the intermediate time, than by visiting the holy house at Loretto. During a fortnight of his residence at Loretto, he contrived to remain unknown, visiting our Lord in the holy chapel early in the morning and late in the evening; but at the end of the fortnight, he was recognized by a Father Penitentiary of the Society of Jesus and thus received the demonstrations of esteem and veneration which he so much dreaded.

Alphonsus, having received intelligence of the return of the Pope to Rome, set out for the city with all possible despatch; and, immediately upon his arrival, had an audience of the Holy Father. His Holiness received him with the greatest cordiality, conversing with him during three hours upon matters of the greatest importance to the church; and amongst other things, upon the practice of frequent communion, which Alphonsus had recommended in a book published at Rome and which the Pope knew to have been opposed in print. His Holiness, who had personal experience of the conduciveness of this practice to the good of souls, desired Alphonsus to support his work against its adversaries; and the saint complied in such a stile as to leave the Pope equally astonished at his learning and his humility. Alphonsus, previous to his consecration, had several other audiences of the Holy Father, who, upon one occasion after having dismissed the bishop elect, said to Monsignor Pasquale Mastrilli, Archbishop of Nazareth, "After the death of Monsignor Liguori we shall have another saint in the church of God."

During his residence in Rome, notwithstanding his retired habits and the scantiness of his retinue, (a single servant,) he was paid the most distinguished respect by generals of religious orders, bishops, princes and cardinals. Almost every moment of his sojourn in the Eternal City he spent in austere watchings, disciplines to blood, constant adoration of the most holy Sacrament and the exercise of acts of mercy. Having been at length formally declared bishop of Sant'Agata de' Goti, by the Sovereign Pontiff, in the secret consistory held on the 14th of June, 1762, Alphonsus was consecrated on the 20th of the same month, the third Sunday after Pentecost, in the sixty—sixth year of his age, in the Church of St. Mary Sopra Minerva, by Cardinal de Rossi, assisted by Monsignor Gorgoni, Archbishop of Emessa and Monsignor Giordani, Archbishop of Nicomedia, governor of Rome. As soon as he had been consecrated, Alphonsus took leave of the Sovereign Pontiff, unwilling that he should be absent from his church a moment longer than was necessary.

The holy bishop having arrived in Naples amid the congratulations of the entire city, withdrew to San Michele de' Pagani, to arrange matters connected with his congregation and appointed Father Andrea Villani his vicar—general, to administer the affairs of the congregation in his room. Upon his return to Naples, many persons of the highest distinction, as well as many of his former colleagues, endeavoured to detain him there and dissuade him from his precipitate journey to Sant' Agata, which seemed to portend so constant a residence in that unwholesome town as would prove ruinous to his health. Their remonstrances, however, were ineffectual, and he set out on the 11th of July, accompanied by his brother Hercules and Father Francis Margotto. His journey through the country was like the triumphal procession of a conqueror. He was met at every stage by reverential multitudes and welcomed into Sant'Agata by the citizens and the chapter of the diocese. Having proceeded to the Church, he spent some time in adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, and then addressing the people in a moving strain, gave them his benediction and the indulgence usual upon such occasions. The very next morning he began the mission to the people, which he continued during eight days, giving each morning spiritual exercises to the clergy, secular and regular, as well as to the gentry; so that shortly after his arrival, the entire aspect of the city and diocese had undergone a most surprising and consoling change.

Alphonsus in the government of his diocese, simply carried out the principles which he had laid down in a book, entitled "Reflections useful to bishops in the government of their Churches," and published before his elevation to the episcopacy. Though removed in body from his congregation, it ceased not to be directed by his spirit, as he was in constant communication with Father Villani and the superiors of houses, continually exhorting and instructing them by letters full of unction and wisdom alike divine. His elevation to the episcopal dignity no wise prejudiced that eminent spirit of poverty by which he had been distinguished while residing with the congregation. His dress (invariably the habit of the congregation) was of the coarsest texture and the clergy of his household, or others interested, were obliged to resort to an order from his confessor, or some such expedient, to induce him to exchange his single suit, no matter how old or tattered, for a new one; whilst the pectoral cross was the only ornament worn by him significant of his pastoral dignity. The spirit of poverty, jointly with his compassion for the poor, led him to consult economy in the most trifling details of his household affairs. The chapter was obliged to interfere to prevent the total dismantlement of the palace; an event which they succeeded in retarding only, not in finally preventing, for, upon being obliged to leave Sant'Agata by reason of his health, he ordered the principal furniture of the palace to be sold and the proceeds applied to the adornment of the Cathedral. He retained, after his promotion, a practice which he had while yet a simple missioner, of using the blank leaves and backs of letters, for his correspondence with familiar friends, or for draughts of the works he was about to publish. His secretary, indeed, remonstrated with him, but Alphonsus was firm. What shame is it? he enquired; holy poverty is the characteristic of a bishop. He left the best apartments to his household clergy, occupying himself, a couple of the most unpretending, and furnished in the meanest style, possessing, in fact, only some straw chairs, a table with an inkstand and a few books, a small wooden bedstead with a straw bed, and coarse sheets, some pictures of saints and one of our blessed Lady of good counsel, together with a little altar for the celebration of Mass, when his health should not permit him to go to the Cathedral. His table was originally very simple and every day experienced new retrenchments, until it reached the standard of insipidity, which Alphonsus had laid out for it. The cook, with whom nothing could induce him to part, spoiled the little that he dressed, having it either badly seasoned, or too salt, or raw, or burned. To endure this might have seemed to others mortification sufficient; but Alphonsus was insatiable of mortification and took measures of his own to increase the insipidity and nauseousness of what he eat. His household resembled nothing so closely as a religious community, so regular were the hours of prayer and silence and meals and religious converse. The extent (we shall not presume to say excess,) to which he carried his bodily austerities and disciplines, was absolutely frightful. His secretary upon one occasion, alarmed by the violence with which, from the sound of the discipline he knew the saint was scourging himself, was strongly tempted to burst open the door and wrest the discipline out of his hands; but we shall, perhaps, give a still more striking instance of the terrible rigour of Alphonsus towards his innocent flesh, when we relate that a Dominican father, one of the Saint's synodal examiners, was obliged to leave the episcopal palace and return to his convent in the middle of the night, so terrified was he by the vehemence, with which the noise led him to believe Alphonsus scourged himself.

If Alphonsus, by reason of his pastoral cares, was unable to pray as much as he could have desired during the day time, he abridged to a mere nothing, the hours of repose, spending the greater part of the night in meditation, or those appalling acts of penance which we have mentioned. The little time which he contrived to steal from his pastoral cares, or his devotions, he spent not in recreation, but in writing, or dictating letters, or composing works for the good of souls, or reading spiritual or theological books. An application unintermitting as was his, could not, unless by miracle, fail to prejudice his health and in addition to his other infirmities, he began to be afflicted with grievous head—aches. But it mattered not, for even when obliged to go out in his carriage, he had his secretary to read a book to him, so that he contrived not to allow a single moment to pass unoccupied. And lest by possibility, a single imperfection should escape his notice, he appointed a discreet and pious priest to make him acquainted with anything he should observe in him, which might require correction.

Alphonsus, who was in every respect so perfect a model of pastoral perfection, was in nothing more admirable than in his strict observance of the duty of residence. Not only did he hasten, at the peril of life, to take possession of his episcopal residence in the unwholesome town of Sant'Agata; but, during the thirteen years of his abode in the diocese, never availed himself of the privileges granted by the Council of Trent and only absented himself upon three occasions of the most pressing nature: First, to attend a general chapter of the congregation; a second time, in obedience to the physicians; and for the last time, before his final removal, he spent a month in Naples, to conduct a most just and interesting suit upon the part of his Congregation.

Alphonsus having fallen sick in Arienzo during one of his yearly visitations, had no sooner recovered his health sufficiently to travel, than he began to think of returning to Sant'Agata and the representations of his vicar—general regarding the unsafe condition of a portion of the palace, should have been ineffectual had not the doctors insisted upon his remaining where he was; the damp and insalubrious air of Sant'Agata being peculiarly hurtful to one afflicted as he was with asthma. But neither his infirmities, nor his withdrawal from the usual seat of episcopal government, caused him to suspend for a day the instructions, private, as well as public, which he was in the habit of giving his flock. He preached as usual on Sundays and holidays; and on Saturdays, in honour of the blessed Virgin; he continued to give missions, conduct retreats and attend at conferences; in a word, he never permitted his health to interfere with the discharge of any of those duties which, even holy bishops deem themselves justified in devolving upon others. He catechised in person, the infants of both sexes, holding out and awarding with his own hand, little prizes for their encouragement. He gave audience to persons of either sex, or any degree, who wished to consult him upon their wants and occasions, spiritual or temporal, but summarily dispatched all visits of mere compliment; and once a year made a visitation of half the diocese, so that he saw every portion of it once in two years. In travelling he rode upon an ass, or hired mule, (his equipage he had early disposed of,) and made use of no other conveyance, no matter how great his infirmities, or what the badness of the road. During the course of the visitation, he everywhere addressed the people, confirmed the children and inspected the churches, even in the poorest and remotest districts; his household, his table and his devotions, wherever he resided being the same as in Sant'Agata. To the sick of his entire diocese he was attentive and not satisfied with relieving their wants when they thrust themselves upon him, took measures to discover such wants as might not have attracted his notice. In the administration of justice in his episcopal court, he was so assiduous and vigilant and weighed so well both sides of the question, that there never was an appeal from his decision to that of the Archiepiscopal Court of Benevento: and with regard to ecclesiastical privileges and immunities, though not so tried, he was full as unflinching an asserter of the church's rights, as was St. Thomas of Canterbury. A criminal having once fled for sanctuary to a church, was taken thence by the officers of justice and an application to the local magistrate for his release, not having been granted, Alphonsus, after warning, proceeded to excommunicate the magistrate and did not desist until the prisoner had been discharged, saying, that were it to cost him his mitre, the immunities of the church should be protected.

If the clergy of a diocese do not correspond with the solicitude of their chief pastor, his exertions for the good of souls are very little worth; and it was for this reason that Alphonsus laboured, by word and work, to render his clergy conformable to the model which he exhibited to them in himself, saying to them by implication, in every good advice he gave them, "imitatores mei estote sicut et Ego Christi."

There were many things in the clergy requiring reformation, when our saint came to the government of the diocese; and he affected a total change, at once so rapidly and noiselessly, that the people perceived it to be finished almost before they had perceived it to be in progress. To the canonries and other benefices in his gift, he collated none whose moral and intellectual fitness he had not ascertained; the moral, by personal experience, or strict investigation and the intellectual, by what is technically termed, a "concursus," or an examination, properly speaking, of two or more candidates, but sometimes of one only. The superior of his diocesan seminary, a man of approved virtue and learning, being candidate for a deanery, the examiners who had formerly been students under him declined to exercise their functions in his regard. He was not, however, on this account, exempted from the examination, for Alphonsus procured other examiners and after a proper scrutiny, advanced him to the deanery, with which the office of penitentiary also was connected. When the nomination rested with the King or Pope, Alphonsus never recommended any one whom he did not think entirely fit, or than whom he believed he could find one better qualified. He has been known to deny the suit of the Prince of Riccia, the Duke and Duchess of Maddaloni, patrons of Sant'Agata and the Archbishop of Bari severally; deeming unfit the persons whom they begged him to recommend. Nor was this strictness confined to his choice of dignitaries only, he was equally exact in the appointment of every priest who was to have the cure of souls and sit in the tribunal of penance. The rules which he drew up for the conduct of his seminary, were equally admirable with every other portion of his government; providing not only for the maintenance of discipline and piety within doors, but for the practice of piety by the students in their own homes during the vacation, at the close of which, if they meant to be readmitted, they should bring with them a certificate of their religious conduct, signed on oath by the parish priest. Need we add, that his care in ascertaining the fitness of those who were sufficiently advanced for promotion to orders, corresponded with those early precautions; or, that he endeavoured to keep green in the memory of his priests, the principles of sacred science and piety by frequent conferences, which they were obliged to attend under pain of suspension, unless able to adduce some valid reason? It was with a view to the improvement of his clergy and in order to supply them with new facilities for preaching the divine word, that he composed the digest, called "Sermons for all the Sundays of the Year," lately translated into English and the present volume, both of which however, may with advant age be used by the faithful indiscriminately. As a book for those engaged in the conduct of spiritual retreats and for the clergy in general, but for them exclusively he composed the admirable "Selva," in which, says the eminent French translator, the Holy Ghost and all the fathers of the church are made to address the clergy, upon their numerous and awful duties.

The regular clergy and conventuals of his diocese, men and women, claimed his most paternal attention. He did his utmost, and with the most perfect success, to improve the character of those peculiarly catholic institutions, especially such as were under the invocation of the Mother of God. His beautiful work entitled the "True Spouse of Jesus Christ, or the Nun Sanctified," will be read with peculiar spiritual advantage by nuns, and with vast profit by any religious whosoever.

If Alphonsus was attentive to the sanctification of the clergy and sacred virgins of his diocese, Oh! how zealously and unremittingly did he not labour for the simple faithful? Not satisfied with his continual preaching by word and example, or his yearly visitations, or the missions he gave in person, or those which he procured by inviting missionaries from other diocese, or providing the people with virtuous and learned clergy; not satisfied with all this, he traced vice and scandals to their strongholds. Verily he was an angel of peace, and went about doing good, reconciling those at variance and even inducing those who had been really and grievously injured to forgive the wronger. A youth having at one time been mortally wounded, Alphonsus hastened to his dwelling and prevailed upon himself and his mother to forgive the murderer. We could wish to cite another instance at least, but this one must suffice out of the many which we have on record.

He exerted himself with the most astonishing activity to put down the absurd and atrocious practice of duelling, often personally interfering to prevent hostile meetings; and at length memorialing the king to put in force those laws which had been directed against duelling in the kingdom of Naples. But there was no vice or scandal which he pursued and extirpated with so much zeal as that of immorality, in the more received and restricted sense. It would be impossible to enumerate all the licentious men and abandoned women whom he reclaimed, in very many cases by personal exertion and often by judicious advice to the civil authorities, who always received it with respect by reason of the esteem in which they held the Saint. Knowing well however that poverty is often the most fatal incentive to vice, he procured honest employment for such young women as he had fears of, and respectable matches for others, giving them portions out of his own revenue. Some whom he reclaimed he sent to asylums of penance; and against those whom he could not reclaim, he called in the arm of the law.

Having been obliged to remove for a while to Nocera de' Pagani for the benefit of the air, a woman of improper character whom he had expelled the diocese, took advantage of his absence to return. So grievously did this intelligence distress him, that Monsignor Valpe, bishop of that city, enquired the cause of his alarm with much concern. "I am a bishop," was the reply given by Alphonsus; and neither the remonstrances of Monsignor Valpe, nor of his friends, could restrain Alphonsus from returning forthwith to his diocese and having the abandoned woman brought before him, to whom he spoke in such a moving strain, that she was really converted by his words, and died in a Naples asylum a true penitent. He was anxious not only to prevent public scandals, but to do away with anything that could lessen the salutary influence of his government upon the people; and for this reason, compensating a company of players who had settled in his diocese, induced them to depart without exhibiting.

Carefully as Alphonsus provided for the spiritual wants of his flock, he was not less assiduous in ministering to their temporal necessities. He knew well that the man who has not bowels of compassion for his neighbour, cannot love God, and that the funds of the church are the patrimony of the poor. We have already seen how rigid was the economy of Alphonsus in his household concerns, and that this was produced partly by charity; but to whatever it was owing, the poor had all the benefit of it. So chary was he of the patrimony of the poor, as he called the revenues of his church, that he would not entertain his brother Hercules and his two children for more than three days, saying, that to entertain them longer than that, would be to defraud the poor. His brother imagining that the revenues of the diocese were more than sufficient for the maintenance of Alphonsus, as a bishop, thought he would relinquish to him the pension which he enjoyed from the estate; but this Alphonsus declined, saying, that the proceeds of his diocese belonged to the poor, and that he required the income for his support. At another time, one of the houses of the congregation being in a state of utter destitution, the superior applied to Alphonsus for some assistance; but the Saint informed him, that all his money belonged to the poor of the dioceses, and that he should look to God for aid elsewhere.

He had an alms for everyone who asked it and summoned his vicar—general and others to the aid of his own zeal in discovering such as shame (so ill—consorted with penury,) prevented from putting in their petitions with the others. Superannuated priests, old people of every description, widows with families, and more especially young maidens whose poverty might be the occasion of their fall, were the objects of his tenderest care. We have already mentioned his care of the sick; and it was at least equalled by his care of those in prison, both as concerned their spiritual and temporal wants. But all his other acts of love were outdone by one act of stupendous charity, in the year 1765, during which Italy was afflicted in a great and prevailing famine. As if in preparation for the disastrous season, Alphonsus, contray to custom, had laid up a large store of corn, and as soon as the scarcity began to be felt, distributed it to the poor. After having expended his entire store, he wrote to every one of wealth and distinction and more especially to his brother Hercules, to contribute to the relief of the starving population. He afterwards gave orders for the secret sale of the carriage and mules which his brother had presented to him, as well as of his pectoral cross, and the ring given him by Monsignor Gianini, substituting for them gilded things of trifling value.

But, notwithstanding all his efforts, thousands remained unsupplied and in the madness of their hunger attacked the corporate officers; for whose safety Alphonsus has been known to expose his own life to the fury of the mob.

Alphonsus had for some time been very weakly, and in bad health, but even while labouring under a disorder, or rather a complication of disorders, which the physicians looked upon as most dangerous and in fact mortal, he preserved the utmost serenity and joyousness. In 1769 the people of Arienzo, where Alphonsus then resided, called for a procession and novena to propitiate the Almighty, and draw down rain upon the languishing country; and Alphonsus, although from the nature of his disorder he could scarce move an inch, insisted upon preaching in the church himself, attracting thither immense crowds and edifying those even who could barely hear his voice, without distinguishing a word. And now in addition to his former sufferings, he became afflicted with a rheumatic fever of the most malignant nature. To be moved or shifted was a most intolerable suffering and compliance with the wants of nature a perfect agony. His secretary and the canons exerted themselves in vain to induce him to send to Naples for physicians; he replied, that he should be content with those whom God had provided for him in his diocese, but he was at length obliged by Father Villani to receive the visits of doctors from Naples, who amongst other remedies, prescribed the use of warm baths, a thing most repugnant to his virginal modesty and which put him upon several expedients to prevent its being offended in his person.

But the rheumatism was not the only, nor indeed the most grievous disorder by which Alphonsus was affected. A gangrenous sore upon his breast, caused by the friction of his chin, which continually lay upon it, had not only eaten into the flesh, but was now beginning to affect the bone; everything threatened mortification and death its inevitable result. The alarming progress of the sore was in a great measure, if not entirely, owing to the circumstance before mentioned of the Saint's beard being merely clipped, not shorn; but whatever the cause, it now looked so threatening that it was deemed prudent to administer to him the sacrament of Extreme Unction. His secretary, however, who still had hopes of his recovery—hopes which the event soon justified—summoned another eminent physician from Naples, who prevented the mortification from setting in and in a short time caused the sore itself to disappear.

All this while our saint not only never murmured, but preserved the utmost composure. Every morning he heard mass and communicated in his chamber, never allowing any of his mortifications to suffer interruption, or diminution beyond what obedience to his medical and spiritual superior rendered imperative. Nor did he anywise relax in his attention to the affairs of the diocese: the examination of clerics, the mission amongst the people, the conferences in theology and every thing else went on as usual under his active superintendence and though he was unable to make the visitation of the diocese as usual, (which duty he now devolved upon his vicar—general,) yet he failed not to preach on all occasions and the bare sight of his poor suffering limbs and bent neck, sufficed to fill the multitudes who flocked to hear him, not only with compassion for himself, but with the tenderest love of God. In a word, he left no duty unfulfilled, for while his vicar—general made the visitation, Monsignor Puoti, Archbishop of Amalfi, administered the sacrament of confirmation, in various places at his request.

To his utter affliction, he had for some time been obliged by the position of his head (leaning as it did upon his breast,) to give up saying mass, as he could not without infinite danger receive the sacred species of blood. Indeed it was with great difficulty he could at any time contrive to swallow a drop of water, until the expedient of a tube, suggested to him by a religious of the Society of Jesus, having proved successful, enabled him to drink with the greatest ease imaginable. Charmed with this discovery, his friends exhorted him to apply to the Pope for a dispensation, enabling him to receive the divine blood through such a tube; but as this is a privilege usually in the exclusive enjoyment of the Sovereign Pontiff, Alphonsus was too humble to think of becoming a sharer in it and therefore declined applying to the Pope. God, however, "had regard to the humility of his servant;" for shortly afterwards, an Augustinian father proposed to Alphonsus that he should receive the adorable blood seated and assisted by a priest in surplice and stole, who should take care to prevent the occurrence of any accident; and the Saint infinitely delighted with this expedient and fortified by the opinions on several divines upon this subject, renewed with unspeakable joy of spirit, the celebration of our awful mysteries.

Alphonsus had accepted the bishopric through pure obedience and ever held it with fear and trembling; but after a time his advanced years and complicated infirmities, raised grievous scruples in his mind upon the score of incapacity, inducing him to think of resigning his office into the hands of the Pope and retiring with his permission to one of the houses of the congregation. Lest however, as he said: "The cell to which he should retire, might be to him a hell in consequence of his having withdrawn from an office in which God wished him to remain;" he took counsel of learned and pious men and finding them favourable to his resignation, applied to Clement XIII. Who had appointed him, for his removal; and received for answer, that his name alone was sufficient, for the well—ordering the diocese. He received this answer with perfect submission to the will of God, as intimated to him by His Holiness; but after a time, his increasing infirmities awakening new scruples in his breast and supplying him with new reasons for requesting the acceptance of his resignation, he applied to Clement XIV and received for answer, that one prayer from his bed of pain, would be more worth than a thousand visitations and disciplines to blood; for the Saint had put forward his inability to make the visitation of his diocese as a ground for his removal.

Alphonsus again bowed in submission to the will of God and it was to no purpose that his own scruples, or the representations of bishops his advisers and others, solicited him to renew his application to that Pope. "If I apply," he said, "my application will not be granted; we shall see what his successor will do for me," an answer which almost tempted those who heard him to smile, Alphonsus being brought to the grave's edge by infirmity and years, while the Pope was yet hale and vigorous. For five weary years after this did Alphonsus continue to govern his diocese and break to his flock the bread of the divine word. Ascending the pulpit, his feeble step propped upon several supporters, his worn frame and drooping head moved everyone to tears, but no sooner had he begun to speak, than he was renewed in youth and vigour; his nerves and sinews relaxed from their habitual rigidity and he preached with all his natural vehemence and fervour. Upon leaving the pulpit, he relapsed into his former state. By order of the physicians, he was now obliged to procure a carriage and take an airing every day, together with eating meat in lent and sundry other indulgences which mortified Alphonsus infinitely more than could have done the most grievous austerity.

For thirteen years had Alphonsus borne the burthen of the episcopacy, when, on the 21st of September, 1774, being seated in his arm chair, he fell into a tranquil slumber, which lasted not only that night, but during a portion of the next day, the servant having orders from the vicar—general not to disturb him. On the 22nd, about one o'clock in the afternoon, he awoke and pulled the bell. Seeing the attendants in tears, he enquired of them, what was the matter? and on being told that he had not eaten nor spoken for two days, "True," he replied, "I have been to attend the Pope, who has just expired," and as shortly afterwards came to be known, the Pope had actually just expired at that very moment.

Upon the earliest opportunity Alphonsus made application to Pius the VI for permission to retire from his office and that Pontiff, although at first disposed to act as his predecessor had done, knowing that the bare presence of Alphonsus was enough to sanctify the diocese, was at length induced by the representations of many distinguished persons to accede, though (as he said) with great sorrow, to the request of Alphonsus and accept his resignation.

Immediately that Alphonsus had received the welcome intelligence, "blessed be God," he exclaimed, "who has removed a mountain from my breast?" and in a few days after, having arranged all matters for his departure, left the diocese amid the lamentations of the entire flock and directed his course towards San Michele de' Pagni where there was a house of his order. Having reached his destination, he humbly besought the fathers to receive him once more amongst them. As he ascended the stairs, leading to the choir, he repeated the "Gloria Patri," and exclaimed, "how light is not now this cross upon my breast, which was so heavy when first I mounted the steps of the palace of Sant'Agata?" Here he lived completely after the manner of the other fathers of the congregation, attending all the exercises where and when it was done by the rest of the community and enjoying every distinction and indulgence, the carriage drives, the two apartments, the silver service and the invalid fare by mere compulsion and solely through obedience. For the rest, the Pope had given him permission to retain the portable altar in his chamber for his own use, and that of others, and had assigned him a pension of eight hundred ducats upon the diocese of Sant'Agata, which occasioned him so many scruples, that he wrote concerning it to the Grand Penitentiary, who left the affair in the hands of the Saint's confessor and thus set him at ease. Of this pension, however, the Saint appropriated barely what was necessary and distributed the rest amongst public mendicants, or private pensioners of his. For many years he continued to preach in several of the neighbouring churches, and especially in the parish church of Saint Michael, where his congregation was engaged in giving the mission. Upon one occasion during a season of terrible drought, wretchedly infirm as he was, he dragged himself along an entire street in a procession, with a halter about his neck, a crown of thorns upon his head, and his garments covered with ashes. He foretold to the people the happy result of the procession; and, it is useless to say, that the prediction was soon verified. During all this time he ceased not to compose works for the sanctification of souls.—Amongst other works composed and published by him after his return to San Michele de' Pagni, he gave to the world the book entitled, "Admirable Dispositions of Divine Providence, for the Salvation of the World, through means of Jesus Christ;" and dedicated to Pius VI, who was pleased to acknowledge it as an especial favour and compliment the blessed author in the loftiest and at the same time, most affectionate strain. But the health of Alphonsus, which had been all along declining, began rapidly to grow worse. From the 29th of November, 1779, he was unable to say Mass and continued thence forward to communicate in one kind; his manner of life, being, in other respects as before described. Indeed, we should rather say, that in proportion to the increase of his decrepitude and weakness his abstemiousness and general spirit of mortification increased and he certainly would have persevered in the use of that dreadful implement of penance the discipline, to his last breath, had he not been forbidden by his confessor and when obliged to part with it and its fellows, he ordered his lay—brother in attendance to throw into some sewer the box in which he used to keep them.

Although the Saint in detaching his affections from all things in this world, had weaned his heart from all mere earthly affection to his relations, he still watched unceasingly over their salvation. At the end of every interview he counselled them to attend to it; and prevailed upon his niece, Donna Teresina, to become a Benedictine nun, in the convent of St. Marcellinus, in Naples.

Alphonsus, who had now for some years, as we have mentioned, been unable to say Mass, still took his airing in the carriage and was helped into the church; but, from the 25th of September, 1784, he was obliged to give up the drive; and from the 30th of October following, was confined to his room. His sight now began to fail him and he grew deaf, so as to render it necessary for him to be addressed through a speaking trumpet. But his resignation to the will of God was perfect. "I am deaf, O Lord," he exclaimed; "let me be more deaf, if it so please you;" and some person happening to speak of the loss of reason during one's last moments. "Preserve me from that, my God," he said, "because then I could not make an act of your love when dying—but yet—do with me what you please." Alphonsus distinctly foretold the year of his death, on the 13th of September, 1786, saying to a Carmelite priest: "Father Joseph, I shall die next year, pray to God and the Queen of Sorrows for me;" and here we must not omit to mention, that he had a peculiar devotion to the dolours of the Mother of God, as may be seen from one of the sermons in this volume. A few days before his death, he said to the lay—brother, Francis Anthony Romito: "Yet a few days, and I shall be in the performance of another function," meaning the new position he was to occupy m the church upon his bier.

On the 18th of July, 1787, in addition to his old complaints, he was attacked by a sharp fever, together with a terrible dysentery and retention of urine. These were symptoms so little to be mistaken, that, although he had been absolved three days before by Father Vincenzo Magaldi of the congregation, he confessed again to Father Lorenzo Negri of the congregation also and after having received absolution, was released from all his usual anxiety and broke forth into expressions of the liveliest joy and hope, the Lord being doubtless willing to console his servant by a foretaste of Paradise, for all that he had made him suffer during this life and especially for the grievous temptations against faith, by which he had been assailed sometime after his retirement from his diocese. His sufferings lasted for fourteen days, during which he was constantly engaged in acts of piety, keeping his eyes lovingly fixed upon the crucifix and image of the blessed Mother; confessing frequently and communicating every day.

The news of his mortal illness having been spread abroad, priests, secular as well as regular and persons of the highest distinction, came from all parts to kiss his hand, bringing kerchiefs and other such things, to sanctify by contact with him and preserve as relics. At length it become necessary for him to receive the sacrament of Extreme Unction, which he did with the most fervent acts of faith, hope, charity, resignation and joy. On the 25th of the same month, he received the Blessed Sacrament as a viaticum; and when the time for communicating approached, every moment appeared intolerably long and unable to contain himself, he incessantly exclaimed, give me the body of my Jesus—when will Jesus come to me?—when shall I possess him? His longings having been at length satisfied, he sunk into a long and deep meditation upon the love of Jesus in the most Holy Sacrament.

Sometime after, the lay—brothers in attendance approached his bed and begged to have his blessing in reward of their long and faithful service. Alphonsus immediately lifting his hand, blessed them in the words of the Church: "Benedictio Dei omnipotentis, Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, descendat super vos et maneat semper." Having been reminded by Father Lorenzo Negri, that he had still to bestow his blessing on all the houses and fathers of the congregation, as well as upon the chapter and diocese of Sant'Agata, which then widowed by the death of Monsignor Rossi, the successor of St. Alphonsus, he complied; and then, without a suggestion from any one, said with much solemnity and emphasis, "I bless the fathers of the kingdom; I bless the King, his ministers, generals and judges, who shall invoke the intercession of the saints, and do justice." His nephew, Joseph, having come to visit him, threw himself upon his knees by the bedside of his dying uncle. The Saint tenderly stretching out his hand to him, said frequently, I thank you; and then being asked for something by way of a memorial, gave him much wholesome advice, and finished by telling him to save his soul.

Four days before his death he was seized with convulsions so violent as to deprive him of the use of speech. On the thirtieth day of the month, Father Villani not thinking it safe to give him the Viaticum, as he was afraid he should not be able to swallow, one of the fathers desired him to make a spiritual communion, which he did, shewing by his eyes and various signs, that he joined in the devout sentiments suggested by that father. On the day before his death, Monsignor Tafuri came to visit him and seeing him so near his dissolution, reverentially kissed his hand and placed it on his head. On the day of his death, just before the commencement of his agony, upon hearing the names of Jesus and Mary, he opened his eyes and appeared somewhat to revive. What is even more surprising, on the night before his death, the image of the blessed Mother having been brought near his bed, he not only opened his eyes, but fixing them upon it, smiled sweetly, his countenance all radiant with delight. Whence we may all conclude, that the divine Mother blessed her holy client with one of those visits which it was his daily prayer to have at the hour of death, and which he so often held out to all who should be devout to Mary.

Alphonsus straining the crucifix and image of most holy Mary to his breast, the brethren in tears and prayer around him, calmly and without struggle or contortion, breathed forth his blessed soul, on Tuesday, the 1st of August, 1787.

It would be useless to add anything even to these meagre details in praise of a saint, decidedly the greatest of modern times and excelled by very few in any age. It will, I suppose, be in the recollection of the reader in what manner we promised to test the pretensions of Alphonsus to the title of great amongst the sons of God. "Qui fecerit, "says the gospel, "ET docuerit sic homines, hie magnus vocabitur in regno Caelorum." That he was a model of all virtue, few will be found bold enough to dispute; and if some of our separated brethren have envied us St. Bernard, I think they should feel proud to be able to call St. Liguori theirs. No one, I think, will be disposed to deny that he has made out his claim to the first ingredient of heavenly greatness, that of having "done;" and for the second, rich in the accumulated treasures of the Holy Scriptures, the Fathers and Doctors of the Church,—rich in the treasures revealed to him by the Spirit of God in meditation—rich in the treasures of experience; he poured all these treasures into the bosom of the faithful by apostolic words and writings—establishing thus his title to the second ingredient of heavenly greatness, that of having "so taught men."

This being so, it became the duty of the Church, after the juridical proof of the miracles which must always, according to her wise ordinances, precede the enrolment of any of her children amongst the saints—it became her duty to make him great in the veneration of the faithful on earth, whom God had made great in the kingdom of his glory.

On the 21st day of December, 1809, the venerable Pontiff Pius VII. issued the decree for the beatification of Alphonsus and on the 26th of May, 1836, our Most Holy Father, Gregory, after having gone through the glorious proofs of his sanctity, vouchsafed to the Church by the Almighty, after the beatification of his servant, proceeded with the solemn ceremony of canonization, or enrolment amongst the saints.

NOTE—St. Francis Girolamo, of the Society of Jesus, when the infant Alphonsus was presented to him for his blessing, not only blessed him, but said to his mother, "This child shall live to the age of Ninety, shall be a Bishop, and perform great things for Jesus Christ." This remarkable prophecy was inadvertently omitted in the text.

DECLARATION OF ST. LIGUORI.

CONFORMABLY to the decrees of Urban VIII., I declare, that for the miracles and miraculous gifts attributed, in this book, to divers servants of God and which have not yet received the sanction of the Holy See, I expect no belief beyond what is usually given to history supported by human authority—and I further declare, that in styling any one Saint, or Blessed, who has not yet been canonized or beatified, I do so merely in compliance with the familiar custom of men.

SERMON THE FIRST

THE LORD APPEARS ANGRY, NOT THAT HE MEANS TO PUNISH US, BUT IN ORDER THAT WE MAY CLEANSE OURSELVES OF OUR SINS AND THUS ENABLE HIM TO PARDON US

"Heu consolabor super hostibus meis et vindicabor de inimicia meis."—Isa. 1:24.

"Ah, I will comfort myself oyer my adversaries: and I will be revenged of my enemies."

SUCH is the language of God, when speaking of punishment and vengeance: He says that he is constrained by his justice, to take vengeance on his enemies. But, mark you, he begins with the word.—"Heu," "ah:" this word is an exclamation of grief, by which he would give us to understand, that if he were capable of weeping when about to punish, he should weep bitterly at being compelled to afflict us his creatures, whom he has loved so dearly as to give up his life through love for us. "Heu," says Cornelius a Lapide, "dolentis est vox non insultantis: significant se dolentem et invitum punire peccatores." No, this God who is the father of mercies and so much loves us, is not of a disposition to punish and afflict but rather to pardon and console us. "Ego enim scio cogitationes quas ego cogito super vos ait Dominus, cogitationes pacis et non afflictionis."—Jer. 29:11. "For I know the thoughts that I think towards you, saith the Lord, thoughts of peace and not of affliction." But some one will say, since such is his character, why does he now punish us? or, at least, appear as if he meant to punish us? Why so? Because he wishes to be merciful towards us: this anger which he now displays, is all mercy and patience. Let us then, my brethren, understand how the Lord at present appears in wrath, not with a view to our punishment, but in order that we may cleanse ourselves of our sins and thus enable him to pardon us. Such is the subject of our discourse. God threatens to chastise in order to deliver us from chastisement.

The threats of men ordinarily proceed from their pride and impotence; whence, if they have it in their power to take vengeance on an object they threaten nothing, lest they should thereby give their enemies an opportunity of escape. It is only when they want the power to wreak their vengeance, that they betake themselves to threats, in order to gratify their passion, by awakening at least the fears of their enemies. Not so the threats of which God makes use, on the contrary, their nature is quite different. His threats do not arise from his inability to chastise, because he can be avenged when he wills; but he bears with us in order to see us penitent and thus exempt from punishment. "Thou overlookest the sins of men for the sake of repentance."—Wisd. 11:24. Neither does he threaten from hatred, in order to torment us with fear; God threatens from love, in order that we may be converted to him and thereby escape chastisement: he threatens, because he does not wish to see us lost: he threatens, in fine, because he loves our souls. "Parcis autem omnibus quoniam tua sunt Domine, qui amas animas. But thou sparest all, because they are thine, O Lord, who lovest souls."—Wis. 11:27. He threatens; but notwithstanding bears with us and delays the infliction, because he wishes to see us converted not lost. "Patienter agit, propter vos nolens aliquem perire, sed omnes ad poenitentiam reverti." "He dealeth patiently for your sake, not willing that any should perish, but that all should return to penance."—2 Peter 3:9, thus the threats of God are all acts of tenderness and amorous calls of his goodness, by which he means to save us from the punishment which we deserve.

"Yet forty days," exclaimed Jonas, "and Nineve shall be destroyed."—Jonas 3:4. Wretched Ninevites, he cries, the day of your chastisement is come; I announce it to you on the part of God: Know, that within forty days Nineve shall be destroyed and cease to exist. But how comes it that Nineve did penance and was not destroyed? "And God had mercy."—Ibid. 10. Whereat Jonas was afflicted and making lamentation before the Lord, said to him —"Therefore, I went before thee into Tarsis, for I knew that thou art a gracious and merciful God, patient and of much compassion and easy to forgive evil."—Jonas 4:2. He then left Nineve and was screened from the rays of the burning sun, by an ivy which God caused to overshadow his head. But how did the Lord next act? He withered the ivy, whereat Jonas was so much afflicted that he wished for death. God then said to him, "Thou hast grieved for the ivy for which thou hast not laboured, nor made it to grow and shall not I spare Nineve?"—Jonas 4:10. Thou grievest for the ivy which thou hast not created and shall not I pardon the men who are the work of my hands? The destruction which the Lord caused to be held out against Nineve, was, according to the explanation of St. Basil, not an actual prophecy, but a simple threat, by which he meant to bring about the conversion of that city. The saint says, that God often appears in wrath because he wishes to deal mercifully with us; and threatens, not with the intention of chastising but of delivering us from chastisement: "Indignans miseretur et minitans salvare desiderat." St. Austin adds, that when any one cries out to you "take care," it is a sign he does not mean to injure you: "Qui clamat tibi, observa: non vult ferire." And thus exactly does God act in our regard, he threatens us with chastisement, says St. Jerome, not that he means to inflict it, but to spare us if we profit by the warning. "In hoc dementia Dei ostenditur: qui enim praedicit poenam non vult punire peccatores." You, O Lord, says St. Gregory, are severe, but then most so when you wish to save us; you threaten, but in so threatening you have no other object than to bring us to repentance: "Saevis et salvas; terris et vocas." The Lord could chastise sinners without warning by a sudden death, which should not leave them time for repentance; but no, he displays his wrath, he brandishes his scourge; in order that he may see them reformed, not punished.

The Lord said to Jeremiah: thou shalt say to them—"If so be, they will hearken and be converted everyone from his evil way: that I may repent me of the evil which I think to do unto them."—Jer. 26:3. Go, he says and tell the sinners if they wish to hear you, that if they cease from their sins, I shall spare them the chastisements which I intended to have inflicted on them. And now, my brethren, mark me. The Lord addresses you in a similar way out of my mouth. If you amend, he will revoke the sentence of punishment. St. Jerome says, "Neque Deus hominibus sed vitiis irascitur." God is wroth, not with us, but with our sins; and St. Chrysostom adds, that if we remember our sins God will forget them. "Si nos peccatorum meminerimus Deus obliviscetur." He desires that we being humbled should reform and crave pardon of him. "Because they are humbled I will not destroy them."—2 Paral. 12:7.

But, in order to amend, we must be led to it by fear of punishment, otherwise, we never should be brought to change our lives. True it is, God protects him who places hope in his mercy. "He is the protector of all who trust in him."—Ps. 17:31. But he who hopes in the mercy of the Lord is always the man who fears his justice. "They that fear the Lord have hoped in the Lord: he is their protector and their helper."—Ps. 113:11.

The Lord often speaks of the rigour of his judgments, and of hell and of the great number who go thither." Be not afraid of them who kill the body fear ye him, who after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell."—Luke 12:4, 5. "Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction and many there are who enter thereat."—Matt. 7:13. And why does the Lord so often speak thus? In order that fear may keep us from vice and from the passions and from occasions; and that thus we may reasonably hope for salvation, which is only for the innocent, or the penitent who hope and fear. O what strength has not the fear of hell to rein us in from sin! To that end has God created hell. He has created us and redeemed us by his death, that we might be happy with him, he has imposed upon us the obligation of hoping for eternal life and on that account encourages us, by saying that all those who hope in him shall be saved. "For, none of them that wait on thee shall be confounded."—Ps. 24:2. On the other hand, it is his wish and command that we should be in fear of eternal damnation. Some heretics hold, that all who are not in sin should consider themselves as assuredly just and predestined; but these have with reason been condemned by the Council of Trent,—(Sess. 6, can. 14 & 15,) because, such a presumption is as perilous to salvation as fear is conducive to it. "And let him be your dread and he shall be a sanctification unto you."—Isa. 8:13, 14. The holy fear of God makes man holy. Wherefore, David begged of God the grace of fear, in order that fear might destroy in him the inclinations of the flesh. "Pierce thou my flesh with thy fear."—Ps. 118:120.

We should then fear on account of our sins, but this fear ought not to dej ect us; it should rather excite us to confidence in the divine mercy, as was the case with the Prophet himself. "For thy namesake, O Lord, thou wilt pardon my sin for it is great.—Ps. 24:11. How is that? Pardon me because my sin is great? Yes, because the divine mercy is most conspicuous in the case of greatest misery; and he who has been the greatest sinner, is he who glorifies most the divine mercy, by hoping in God, who has promised to save all those who hope in him. "He will save them, because they have hoped in him."—Ps. 36:40. For this reason it is, Ecclesiasticus says, that the fear of the Lord bringeth not pain but joy and gladness: "The fear of the Lord shall delight the heart and shall give joy and gladness."—Eccles. 1: 21. Thus this very fear leads to the acquisition of a firm hope in God, which makes the soul happy: "He that feareth the Lord shall tremble at nothing and shall not be afraid, for he is his hope: The soul of him that feareth the Lord is blessed."—Eccles. 34:16, 17. Yes, blessed, beca use fear draws man away from sin. "The fear of the Lord driveth out sin," (Eccles. 1:27,) and at the same time infuses into him a great desire of observing the commandments: "Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord: he shall delight exceedingly in his commandments."—Ps. 111:1.

We must, then, persuade ourselves that chastisement is not what the nature of God inclines him to. God, because by his nature he is infinite goodness, ("Deus cujus natura bonitas,") says St. Leo, has no other desire than to bless us and to see us happy. When he punishes he is obliged to do so, in order to satisfy his justice, not to gratify his inclination. Isaiah says, that punishment is a work contrary to the heart of God. "The Lord shall be angry that he may do his work, his strange work his work is strange to him."—Isa. 28:21. And therefore, does the Lord say, that he sometimes almost feigns the intention of punishing us: "Ego fingo contra vos malum." But why does he do so? For this reason: "Let every man of you return from his evil way."—Jer. 28:16. He does so in order to our reformation and consequently our exemption from the chastisement deserved by us. The apostle writes, that God "hath mercy on whom he will and whom he will he hardeneth." Rom. 9:18. With regard to which passage, St. Bernard says, that God of himself wishes to love us, but that we force him to condemn us: "Sed quod misereatur proprium illi est: nam quod condemnat, nos eum cogimus." He calls himself the father of mercies, not of vengeance. Whence it comes that his tenderness all springs from himself and his severity from us. And who has ever been able to comprehend the greatness of the divine mercies? David says, that God, even while yet angry, feels compassion for us: "Thou hast been angry and hast had mercy on us."—Ps. 59:1. "O ira misericors," exclaims the abbot Beroncosio, "quce irascitur ut subveniat minatur ut parcat." O merciful wrath, which art enkindled but to succour and threatenest but to pardon. "Thou hast shewn," continues David, "thou hast shewn thy people hard things, thou hast made us drunk with the wine of sorrow." God discovers himself to us armed with a scourge, but he does so in order to see us penitent and contrite for the offences which we are committing against him: " Thou hast given a warning to them that fear thee: that they may flee before the bow: that thy beloved may be delivered." He appears with the bow already bent, upon the point of sending off the arrow, but he does not send it off, because he wishes that our terror should bring about amendment and that thus we should escape the chastisement. "That thy beloved may be delivered." I wish to terrify them, says God, in order that struck by fear they may rise from the bed of sin and return to me. "In their affliction they will rise early to me."—Osee. 6:1. Yes, the Lord although he sees us so ungrateful and worthy of punishment, is eager to free us from it, because how ungrateful soever we be, he loves us and wishes us well. "Give us help from trouble." Thus, in fine, prayed David: and thus ought we to pray. Grant, O Lord, that this scourge which now afflicts us, may open our eyes, so that we depart from sin; because, if we do not here have done with it, sin will lead us to eternal damnation, which is a scourge enduring forever. What shall we then do my brethren? Do you not see that God is angered? He can no longer bear with us. "The Lord is angry." Do you not behold the scourges of God increasing every day? "Crescit malitia crescit inopia rerum." Our sins increase, says St. Chrysostom, and our scourges increase likewise: God, my brethren, is wroth: but with all his anger he has commanded me to say, what he formerly commanded to be said by the prophet Zachary: "And thou shalt say to them, thus saith the Lord of Hosts: turn ye to me saith the Lord of Hosts and I will turn to you saith the Lord of Hosts."—Zach. 1:3. Sinners, saith the Lord, you have turned your backs upon me and therefore have constrained me to deprive you of my grace. Do not oblige me to drive you forever from my face and punish you in hell without hope of pardon. Have done with it: abandon sin, be converted to me and I promise to pardon you all your offences and once more to embrace you as my children. "Turn ye to me, saith the Lord of Hosts and I will turn to you." Why do you wish to perish? (mark how tenderly the Lord speaks). "And why will you die, O house of Israel."—Ezech. 28:31. Why will you fling yourselves into that burning furnace? "Return ye and live." Ibid. 32. Return to me, I await you with open arms, ready to receive and pardon you.

Doubt not of this, O sinner, continues the Lord. "Learn to do well and then come and accuse me, saith the Lord: if your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow."—Isa. 1:17, 18. Take courage, saith the Lord, change your life, come to me and if I do not pardon you, "accuse me:" As if he were to say, accuse me of lying and bad faith; but, no, I shall not be unfaithful, your conscience now so black shall by my grace become as white as snow. No; I will not chastise you if you reform, says the Lord because I am God not man. "I will not execute the fierceness of my wrath because I am God and not man."—0see. 11:9. He says besides, that men never forget an injury, but that when he sees a sinner penitent, he forgets all his offences. "I will not remember all his iniquities that he hath done.—Ezech. 18:22. Let us then at once return to God, but let it be at once. We have offended him enough already, let us not tempt his anger any further. Behold him, he calls us and is ready to pardon us if we repent of our evil deeds, and promise him to change our lives.*

SERMON THE SECOND

SINNERS WILL NOT PROFIT BY THE DIVINE THREATS UNTIL THE CHASTISEMENT HAS COME UPON THEM

"Si Poenitentiam non egeritis omnes similiter peribitis."

"Except you do penance you shall all likewise perish." Luke 13:5.

AFTER our Lord had commanded our first parents not to eat of the forbidden fruit, unhappy Eve approached the tree and was addressed from it by the serpent, who said to her: Why has God forbidden you to eat of this delightful fruit? "Why hath God commanded you?" Eve replies: "God hath commanded us that we should not eat and that we should not touch it, lest perhaps we die."—Gen. 3:3. Behold the weakness of Eve! The Lord had absolutely threatened them with death and she now begins to speak of it as doubtful: "Lest perhaps we die." If I eat of it, she said, I shall perhaps die. But [the devil seeing that Eve was little in fear of the divine threat, proceeded to encourage her by saying: "No, you shall not die the death;" and thus he deceived her and caused her to prevaricate and eat the apple. Thus, even now, does the enemy continue to deceive so many poor sinners. God threatens: stop, sinners and do penance, because if not you shall damn yourselves, as so many others have done: "Except you do penance, you shall all likewise perish." The devil says to them: "No, you shall not die the death." Fear nothing, sin on, continue to enjoy yourselves, because God is merciful; he will pardon you by and by and you shall be saved. "Deus timorem incutit," says St. Procopius, "Diabolus adimit."

God only desires to terrify them by his threats, in order that they may depart from sin and thus be saved. The devil wishes to destroy that fear, in order that they may persevere in sin and thus be lost. Many are the wretches who believe the devil in preference to God and are thus miserably damned. At present, behold the Lord displays his anger and threatens us with chastisement. Who knows how many there may be in this country who have no thought of changing their lives, in the hope that God will be appeased, and that it will be nothing. Hence the subject of the present discourse. Sinners will not profit by the divine threats, until the chastisement shall have come upon them. My brethren, if we do not amend, the chastisement will come; if we do not put an end to our crimes, God will.

When Lot was warned by the Lord that he was about to destroy Sodom, Lot at once informed his sons-inlaw: "Arise! get you out of this place, because the Lord will destroy this city."—Gen. 19:14. But they would not believe him: "And he seemed to them to speak as it were in jest." They imagined that he wished to sport with their fears, by terrifying them with such a threat. But the punishment overtook them and they remained to be the sport of the flames. My brethren, what do we expect? God warns us that chastisement hangs over us; let us put a period to our sins, or shall we wait for God to do it? Hear, O sinner! what St. Paul says to you: "See, then, the severity and goodness of God—towards them, indeed, that are fallen, the severity—but towards thee the goodness of God, if thou abide in goodness, otherwise thou also shalt be cut off."—Rom. 11:22. Consider, says the apostle, the justice which the Lord has exercised towards so many whom he has punished, and condemned to hell; "towards them, indeed that are fallen, the severity." Consider the mercy with which he has treated you; but towards thee the goodness of God." You must abandon sin; if you change your ways, avoid the occasions of sin, frequent the sacraments and continue to lead a christian life, the Lord will remit your punishment, "if you abide in goodness;" if not you shall perish, " otherwise thou also shalt be cut off." God has already borne with you too long, he can bear with you no longer. God is merciful, but he is just withal; he deals mercifully with those who fear him; he cannot act thus towards the obstinate.

Such a person laments when he sees himself punished and says, why has God deprived me of my health? why has he taken from me this child, or this parent? "Ah, sinner! What have you said," exclaims Jeremiah, "your sins have withholden good things from you." It was not the desire of God to deprive you of any blessing, of any gain, of your son, or your parent; it would have been the wish of God to make you happy in all things, but your sins have not allowed him. In the book of Job, we read these words: "Is it a great matter that God should comfort thee? But thy wicked words hinder this."—Job. 15:11. The Lord would fain console you, but your blasphemy, your murmuring, your obscene words spoken to the scandal of so many, have prevented him. It is not God, but accursed sin, that renders us miserable and unhappy. "Sin maketh nations miserable."—Prov. 14:34. We are wrong in complaining of God when he deals hardly with us. Oh! How much more hardly do we deal with him, repaying with ingratitude the favours which he has bestowed on us! "Quid quserimur, dum dure agit nobiscum Deus? multo durius cum Deo nos agimus."

Sinners imagine that sin procures them happiness; but it is sin which makes them miserable and afflicted in every respect. "Because thou didst not serve the Lord thy God," saith the Lord, "in joy and gladness of heart thou shalt serve thy enemy, whom the Lord will send upon thee, in hunger, and thirst, and nakedness and in want of all things till he consume thee."—Deut. 28:47, 48. Because thou hast not wished to serve thy God in the peace which all those taste who serve him, thou shalt serve thy enemy in poverty and affliction, until he shall have finished by making thee lose both soul and body. David says, that the sinner by his crimes, digs himself the pit into which he falls: "He is fallen into the hole he made."—Ps. 7:16. Recollect the prodigal son: he, in order to live without restraint and banquet as he pleased, left his father; but then, for having left his father, he is reduced to tend swine; reduced to such a degree of misery, that of the vile food with which the swine are filled, he has not wherewithal to fill himself: "And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks the swine did eat and no man gave unto him."—Luke 15:16. St. Bernardine of Sienna, (dom. 2. Quadrag.) relates that a certain impious son, dragged his father along the ground. What happened to him afterwards? One day he was himself dragged by his own son in like manner, when arriving at a certain place, he exclaimed, "No more—stop here, no more—thus far did I drag my own father—stop." St. Baronius mentions a circumstance of a like nature, (all anno 33. num. 6.) concerning the daughter of Herodias, who caused John the Baptist to be beheaded. He tells of her, that one day as she was crossing a frozen river, the ice broke under her and she remained with her head only above the aperture. By dint of her struggles to save herself from death, she had her head severed from her body and thus died. Oh, how just is not God, when the time of vengeance arrives! he causes the sinner to be caught and strangled in the net which his own hands have made. "The Lord shall be known when he executeth judgments, the sinner hath been caught in the works of his own hands."—Ps. 9:17.

Let us tremble, my brethren, when we see others punished, knowing, as we do, that we ourselves have deserved the same punishments. When the tower of Siloe fell upon eighteen persons and killed them, the Lord said to many who were present: "Think you that they also were debtors above all the men that dwelt in Jerusalem."—Luke 13:4. Do you think that these wretches alone were in debt to God's justice on account of their sins? You are yet debtors to it; and if you do not penance, you shall be punished as well as they: "Except you do penance, you shall all likewise perish." O, how many unfortunate men damn themselves by false hope in the divine mercy? Yes, God is merciful and therefore assists and protects them who hope in his mercy: "He is the protector of all that trust in him."—Ps. 17:31. But he assists and protects those only who hope in him, with the intention of changing their lives, not those whose hope is accompanied by a perverse intention of continuing to offend him. The hope of the latter is not acceptable to God, he abominates and punishes it: "Their hope the abomination of the soul." Job 11:20. Poor sinners, their greatest misery is, that they are lost, and do not know it. They jest, and they laugh, and they despise the threats of God, as if God had assured them that he should not punish them. "Et unde," exclaims St. Bernard, "unde haec maledicta securitas?" Whence, O blind that you are, whence this accursed security? accursed, because it is this security which brings you to hell. "I will come to them that are at rest, and dwell securely."—Ezech. 38:11. The Lord is patient, but when the hour of chastisement arrives, then will he justly condemn to hell those wretches who continue in sin and live in peace, as if there were no hell for them.

Let sin be no more for us, my brethren; let us be converted if we wish to escape the scourge which hangs over us. If we do not cease from sin, God will be obliged to punish us: "For evil doers shall be cut off."—Ps. 36:9. The obstinate are not only finally shut out from Paradise, but hurried off the earth, lest their example should draw others into hell. And let us reflect that these temporal scourges are nothing in comparison with those eternal chastisements, hope of relief from which there is none. Give ear, O sinner! my brother, give ear! "For now the axe is laid to the root of the trees."—Luke 3:9. The author of the "Imperfect Work," in his comment upon this passage (hom. 5,) says: "Non ad ramos posita dicitur, sed ad radicem, ut irreparabiliter exterminetur." He says, that when the branches are lopped, the tree continues still to live; but when the tree is felled from the root, it then dies and is cast into the fire. The Lord stands with the scourge in his hand and you still continue in disgrace with him. "The axe is laid to the root." Tremble lest God should make you die in your sins, for if you die thus, you shall be cast into the fire of hell, where your ruin shall be hopeless for eternity.

But, you will say, I have committed many sins during the past, and the Lord has borne with me. I may, therefore, hope that he will deal mercifully with me for the future. God says, do not speak so: "Say not I have sinned and what harm hath befallen me? for the Most High is a patient rewarder."—Eccl. 5:4. Do not say so, for God bears with you now, but he will not always bear with you. He endures, to a certain extent and then pays off all. "Now, therefore, stand up, that I may plead in judgment against you concerning all the kindness of the Lord," (1 Kings 12:7.) said Samuel to the Hebrews. O how powerfully does not the abuse of the divine mercies assist in procuring the damnation of the ungrateful! "Gather them together as sheep for a sacrifice and prepare them for the day of slaughter."—Jer. 12:3. In the end the herd of those who will not be converted shall be victims of divine justice and the Lord will condemn them to eternal death, on "the day of slaughter," when the day of his just vengeance shall have arrived, (and we have reason always to be in dread, as long as we are not resolved to abandon sin,) lest that day should be already near. "God is not mocked; for what things a man shall sow, these also shall he reap."—Gal. 6:7:8. Sinners expect to mock God by confessing at Easter, or two or three times a year and then returning to their vomit and hoping after that to obtain salvation. "He is a mocker, not a penitent," says St. Isidore, "who continues to do that for which he is penitent;" but "God is not mocked."

What salvation?—what salvation do you expect? "for what things a man shall sow, them also shall he reap." What things do you sow? blasphemy, revenge, theft, impurity: what then do you hope for? He who sows in sin, can hope to reap nothing but chastisements and hell. "For he that soweth in his flesh," continues the same apostle, "of his flesh also shall reap corruption." Continue, impure wretch! continue to live sunk in the mire of your impurity, be converted into pitch within his bowels, ye his impurities. "A day shall come," says St. Peter Damian, "a day shall come, or rather a night, when your lust shall be turned into pitch, to feed an eternal flame within your bowels."—Epist. 6. St. John Chrysostom says, that some pretend not to see: "fingunt non videre;" they see the chastisements and pretend not to see them. And then others, St. Ambrose says, have no fear of punishment, until they see it has overtaken them: "Nihil timent quia nihil vident." To all these it will happen as it did to mankind at the time of the deluge. The patriarch Noah foretold and announced to them, the punishments which God had prepared for their sins; but the sinners would not believe him and notwithstanding that the ark was building before their eyes, they did not change their lives, but went on sinning until the punishment was upon them, until they were smothered in the deluge "And they knew not till the flood came and took them all away."—Matt. 24:39. The same happened to the great Babylon, in the Apocalypse, who said: "I sit a queen and I shall not see grief." She persevered in her impurity, in the hope of not being punished, but the chastisement at length came as had been predicted: "Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death and mourning and famine and she shall be burnt with fire."—Apoc. 18:7, 8.

Brother, who knows whether this is not the last call which God may give you? Our Lord says, that a certain owner of a vineyard, finding a fig-tree for the third year without fruit, said, "Behold, for these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree and I find none; cut it down therefore, why cumbereth it the ground?"—Luke 13:7. Then the dresser of the vine replied: "Lord, let it alone this year also and if happily it bear fruit—but if not, then, after that, thou shalt cut it down." Let us enter into ourselves, my brethren, for years has God been visiting our souls and has found no other fruit therein than thorns and thistles, that is to say sins. Hear how the divine justice exclaims, "cut it down therefore, why cumbereth it the earth?" but mercy pleads, "let it alone this year also." Have courage, let us give it one trial more; let us see whether it will not be converted at this other call. But tremble lest the same mercy may not have granted to justice that if you do not now amend, your life shall be cut off and your soul condemned to hell. Tremble, brother and take measures that the mouth of the pit do not close over you. Such was the prayer of David: "let not the deep swallow me up; and let not the pit shut her mouth upon me."—Ps. 68:16. It is that which sin effects, causing the mouth of the pit, that is, the state of damnation into which the sinner has fallen, to close over him by degrees. As long as that pit is not entirely closed, there is some hope of escape; but if it once shut, what further hope remains for you? By the closing of the pit, I mean the sinner's being shut out from every glimmer of grace and stopping at nothing; that being the accomplishment of what the wise man has said: "The wicked man, when he is come into the depth of sins, contemneth."—Prov. 18:3. He despises the laws of God, admonitions, sermons, excommunication, threats—he despises hell itself; so that persons have been known to say, numbers go to hell and I amongst the rest. Can the man who speaks so be saved? He can be saved, but it is morally impossible he should. Brother, what do you say? Perhaps you have yourself come to the contempt of the chastisements of God. What do you say? Well, and if you had, what should you do? Should you despair? No; you know what you have to do. Have recourse to the Mother of God. Although you should be in despair and abandoned by God, Blosius says, that Mary is the hope of the despairing, and the aid of the abandoned: "Spes desperantium, adjutrix destitutorum." St. Bernard says the same thing when he exclaims, the despairing man who hopes in thee ceases to be desperate: "In te sperat qui desperat." But if God wishes that I should be lost, what hope can there be for me? But, says God, no, my son, I do not wish to see you lost: "I desire not the death of the wicked." And what then do you desire, O Lord? I wish him to be converted and recover the life of my grace: "But that the wicked turn from his way and live."—Ezech. 33:11. Haste then, brother, fling yourself at the feet of Jesus Christ; behold him! see how he stands with his arms open to embrace you! &c.

SERMON THE THIRD

GOD IS MERCIFUL FOR A SEASON AND THEN CHASTISES

"Indulsistigenti Domine indulsistigenti; nunquid glorificatuses?"

"Thou hast been favourable to the nation, O Lord, thou hast been favourable to the nation; hast thou been glorified?"—Isa. 26:15.

LORD, thou hast often pardoned this people; thou hast threatened it with destruction by earthquake, by pestilence, in neighbouring countries; by the infirmities and death of its own citizens; but you have afterwards taken pity on them : "Thou hast been favourable to the nation, O Lord, thou hast been favourable to the nation; hast thou been glorified?" You have pardoned us, you have dealt mercifully with us; what have you received in return? Have thy people abandoned their sins? have they changed their lives? No, they have gone on from bad to worse; that momentary fear passed, they have begun afresh to offend thee and provoke thy wrath. But my brethren, perhaps you imagine that God will always wait, always pardon and never punish? No; God is merciful for a season, (such is the subject of the day's discourse,) God is merciful for a season, then executes judgment, and punishes.

We must persuade ourselves that God cannot do otherwise than hate sin, he is holiness itself and therefore cannot but hate that monster, his enemy, whose malice is altogether opposed to the perfection of God. And if God hate sin, he must necessarily hate the sinner who makes league with sin, "But to God the wicked and his wickedness are hateful alike."—Wisd. 14:9. O God, with what an expression of grief and with what reason do you not complain of those who despise you, to take part with your enemy. "Hear, O ye Heavens and give ear, O earth, for the Lord hath spoken; I have brought up children and exalted them; but they have despised me."—Isa. 1:2. Hear, O ye Heavens, he says, and give ear, O earth, witness the ingratitude with which I am treated by men. I have brought them up and exalted them as my children and they have repaid me with contempt and outrage. "The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib: but Israel hath not known me, they are gone away backwards."—Isa. 1:3, 4.

The beast of the field, the ox and the ass, continues the Lord, know their master and are grateful to him, but my children have not known me and have turned their back upon me. But how is this? "Beneficia etiam ferse sentiunt," says Seneca; the very brutes are grateful to their, benefactors; see that dog how he serves and obeys and is faithful to his master, who feeds him; even the wild beasts, the tiger and the lion are grateful to those who feed them. And God, my brethren, who, till now has provided us with everything, who has given us food and raiment: What more? who has kept us in existence up to the moment when we offended him: how have we treated him? how do we purpose to act in future? Do we not think to live on as we have been living? Do we not perhaps think that there is no punishment, no hell for us? But harken and know that as the Lord cannot but hate sin, because he is holy, so he cannot but chastise it when the sinner is obstinate, because he is just.

When he does chastise, it is not to please himself, but because we drive him to it. The wise man says, that God did not create hell, through a desire of condemning man thereto and that he does not rejoice in their damnation, because he does not wish to see his creatures perish: "For God made not death, neither hath he pleasure in the destruction of the living; for he created all things that they might be."—Wisd. 1:13, 14. No gardener plants a tree in order to cut it down and burn it. It was not God's desire to see us miserable and in torment; and therefore, says St. Chrysostom, he waits so long before he takes vengeance of the sinner: "Ad reposcendum de peccantibus ultionem consuevit Deus moras nectere." He waits for our conversion, that he may then be able to use his mercy in our regard. "Therefore the Lord waiteth, that he may have mercy on you."—Isa. 30:18. Our God, says the same St. Chrysostom, is in haste to save and slow to condemn. "Ad salutem velox, tardans ad demolitonem." When there is question of pardon, no sooner has the sinner repented than he is forgiven by God. Scarcely had David said "peccavi," when he was informed by the prophet that his pardon was already granted: "The Lord also hath taken away thy sin."—2 Kings 12:13. Yes, because we do not desire pardon so anxiously as he desires to pardon us." "Non ita tua condari peccata cupis," says the same holy doctor, "quam tibi remissa esse expetit." On the other hand, when there is question of punishment, he waits, he admonishes, he sends us warning of it beforehand: "For the Lord God doth nothing without revealing his secret to his servants, the prophets."—Amos, 3:7.

But when, at length, God sees that we are willing to yield neither to benefits, nor threats, nor admonitions and that we will not amend, then he is forced by our own selves to punish us and while punishing us, he will place before our eyes the great mercies he before extended to us: "Thouthoughtest unjustly that 1shall be like to thee; but I will reprove thee and set before thy face." He will then say to the sinner, think you, O sinner, that I had forgotten, as you had done, the outrages you put upon me and the graces I dispensed to you? St. Austin says, that God does not hate but loves us and that he only hates our sins: "Odit Deus et amat; odit tua, amat te." He is not wroth with men, says St. Jerome, but with their sins: "Neque Deus hominibus sed vitiis irascitur." The saint says, that by his nature God is inclined to benefit us and that it is we ourselves who oblige him to chastise us and assume the appearance of severity, which he has not of himself: "Deus qui natura benignus est; vestris peccatis cogitur personam, quam non habet crudelitatis assumere." It is this which David means to express, when he says that the Lord in chastising is like a drunken man who strikes in his sleep: "And the Lord was awaked as one out of sleep and he smote his enemies."—Ps. 77:65. Theodoret adds that, as drunkenness is not natural to man, so chastisement does not naturally belong to God; it is we who force him into that wrath which is not his by nature. "Thesaurizans sibi iram, quam Deus naturaliter non habet." St. Jerome, reflecting on those words which Jesus Christ on the day of general judgment will address to the reprobate: "Depart from me you cursed, into everlasting fire, which was prepared for the devil and his angels enquires, who has prepared this fire for sinners? God perhaps. No, because God never created souls for hell as the impious Luther taught: this fire has been kindled for sinners by their own sins: "Comparaverunt delictis suis." He who sows in sin, shall reap chastisement. "He that soweth iniquity, shall reap evil."—Prov. 22:8. When the soul commits sin, she voluntarily obliges herself to pay the penalty thereof and thus condemns herself to the pains of hell. "For you have said, we have entered into a league with death and we have made a covenant with hell."—Isa. 28:15. Hence St. Ambrose well says, that God has not condemned any one, but that each one is the author of his own chastisement. "Nullum prius Dominus condemnat, sed unusquisque sibi est auctor poenae." And, the Holy Ghost says, that the sinner shall be consumed by the hatred which he bears himself, "with the rod of his anger he shall be consumed." He, says Salvian, who offends God, has no more cruel enemy than himself, since he himself has caused the torments which he suffers. "Ipse sibi parat peccator quod patitur; nihil itaque est in nos crudelius nobis." God does not wish to see us in affliction, but it is we who draw down sufferings upon ourselves, and by our sins enkindle the flames in which we are to burn. "Nos etiam nolente Deo, nos cruciamus; nam ccelestis irae accendimus incendia quibus ardescimus." God punishes us, because we oblige him to punish us.

But, I know, you say, the mercies of God are great: no matter how manifold my sins, I have in view a change of life by and by and God will have mercy upon me. But no, God desires you not to speak thus. "And say not the mercy of the Lord is great, he will have mercy on the multitude of my sins."—Eccl. 5:6. And why has the Lord forbidden you to say so? The reason is this, "for mercy and wrath quickly come from him."—Ibid. 7. Yes, it is true, God has patience, God waits for some sinners; I say some, for there are some whom God does not wait for at all: how many has he not sent to hell immediately after the first transgression? Others he does wait for, but he will not always wait for them; he spares them for a certain time and then punishes. "The Lord patiently expecteth, that when the day of judgment shall come, he may punish them in the fulness of their sins."—2 Mach; 6:14. Mark well, " when the day of judgment shall come:" when the day of vengeance shall arrive, "in the fullness of their sins." When the measure of sins which God has determined to pardon is filled up, he will punish. Then the Lord will have no mercy and will chastise unremittingly. The city of Jericho did not fall during the first circuit made by the ark, it did not fall at the fifth, or at the sixth, but it fell at last at the seventh.—Jos. 9:20. And thus it will happen with thee, says St. Austin, "veniet septimus arcse circuitus, et civitas vanitatis corruet." God has pardoned you your first sin, your tenth, your seventieth, perhaps your thousandth; he has often called you, he now calls you again; tremble lest this should be the last circuit taken by the ark, that is, the last call, after which, if you do not change your life, it will be over with you. "For the earth," says the apostle," that drinketh in the rain which cometh often upon it and bringeth forth thorns and briars is reprobate and very near unto a curse, whose end is to be burned."—Heb. 6:7:8. That soul, he says, which has often received the waters of divine light and grace and instead of bearing fruit produces nought but the thorns of sin, is nigh unto a curse and her end will be to burn eternally in hell fire. In a word, when the period comes, God punishes.

And let us know, that when God wishes to punish, he is able and knows how to do it. "The daughter of Sion shall be left as a city that is laid waste."—Isa. 1:8. How many cities do we not know to have been destroyed and levelled with the ground, by reason of the sins of the inhabitants, whom God could no longer bear with. One day, Jesus Christ being within sight of the city of Jerusalem, gazed upon it and thinking of the ruin which her crimes were to draw down upon her, our Kedeemer, who is so full of compassion for our miseries, began to weep: "seeing the city, he wept over it,"—Luke 19:41, saying: "They shall not leave in thee a stone upon a stone, because thou hast not known the time of thy visitation."—Ibid. 44. Poor city, there shall not be left in thee a stone upon a stone, because thou hast not been willing to know the grace which I gave thee in visiting thee with so many benefits, and bestowing upon thee so many tokens of my love; whilst thou hast ungratefully despised me and driven me away. "Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children and thou wouldst not, behold your house shall be left to you desolate."—Ibid. 13:34:35. Sinful brother, who knows whether God does not at this moment look upon your soul and weep? Perhaps he sees, that you will not turn to account this visit which he now pays you, this summons which he gives you to change your life. "How often would I and thou wouldst not." How often, says the Lord, have I wished to draw you to me by the lights which I have given you? How often have I called you and you would not hear me? You have been deaf to me and fled from me. "Behold your house shall be left to you desolate." Behold I am already on the point of abandoning you, and if I abandon you, your ruin will be inevitable, irreparable.

"We would have cured Babylon but she is not humbled, let us forsake her."—Jerem. 41:9. The physician when he sees that the patient will not adopt his remedies, which he himself carries to him with so much kindness and which the other flings out of the window; what does he do at length? He turns his back upon him and abandons him. My brethren, by how many remedies, by how many inspirations, by how many calls has not God endeavoured to avert damnation from you? What more can he do? If you damn yourself, can you complain of God who has called you in so many different ways? God calls you by the voice of his minister, he calls you by the voice that is within you, he calls you by his favours, he calls you lastly by temporal punishments; in order that you may learn to dread those which are eternal. St. Bernardine of Sienna says, that for certain sins, more especially those which are scandalous, there is no more effectual method of doing away with them, than by temporal punishments .—"Pro talibus admonendis, nullum reperitur remedium nisi Dei flagellum." But, when the Lord sees that his favours serve only to make the sinner more insolent in his evil life, when he sees that his threats are disregarded, when he perceives, in a word, that he speaks and is not heard; then he abandons the sinner and chastises him with eternal death. Therefore does he say, "Because I called and you refused and have neglected my reprehensions, I will also laugh in your destruction and will mock when that shall come which you feared."—Prov. 1:24–26. You, says God, have laughed a t my words, my threats and my chastisements, your last chastisement shall come and then I will laugh at ye. "And it, (the rod,) was turned into a serpent."—Exod. 4:3. St. Bruno, in his commentary upon this passage, says, "the rod is turned into a serpent, when they will not amend." The eternal will succeed the temporal punishment.

O how well does not God know how to chastise and so to order it, that from the instruments and motives of sin should be drawn the chastisement! "Per quae quis peccat per hax et torquetur."—Sap. 10. The Jews put Jesus Christ to death, for fear the Romans should seize on their possessions. "If we let him alone," said they," all will believe in him, and the Romans will come and take away our place and nation."—11:48. But the same sin of putting Jesus Christ to death,—was the cause of their being shortly after despoiled of everything by the Romans. "They feared they should lose temporal possessions," says St. Austin," and thought not of eternal life, and so lost both."—Hom. in fer. 5. Pass. In trying to save their possessions, they lost their souls, the punishment came and they lost both. Thus it falls out with many; they lose their souls for the things of earth; but God often condemns them to beggary in this world and reprobation in the next.

My brethren, provoke no longer the anger of your God, know that in proportion to the multitude of his mercies towards you; in proportion to the length of time he has borne with you, your punishment will be greater, if you do not amend. "The Lord makes up for the slowness of his chastisement," says St. Gregory, "by its grievousness when it does come." "Woe to thee Corozain," thus does the Lord speak to a soul who has abused his favours, "Woe to thee Bethsaida, for if in Tyre and Sidon had been wrought the mighty things which have been wrought in you, they would have done penance long ago, sitting in sackcloth and ashes."—Luke 10:13. Yes, my brethren, if the graces which have been given to you, had been given to a Turk or an Indian, "if in Tyre and Sidon, had been wrought the mighty works which have been wrought in you," he would have now been a saint, or at least, have done great penance for his sins; and have you become a saint? have you at least done penance for your many mortal sins, for your many evil thoughts, words, and scandals? see you not how God is angry with you? how he stands with his scourge in his hand? Do you see not death hanging over you?

And, what are we to do? you enquire: are we to despair? No, God does not wish us to despair. "Let us go with confidence to the throne of grace:" that is what we are to do, as St. Paul exhorts us, in order "that we may obtain mercy, and find grace in seasonable aid."—Heb. 4:16. Let us at once go to the throne of grace, that we may receive the pardon of our sins and the remission of the punishment which overhangs us. By "seasonable aid" the apostle means to convey, that the aid which God may be willing to lend us to-day, he may deny to-morrow. At once, then, to the throne of grace. But, what is the throne of grace? Jesus Christ, my brethren, is the throne of grace: "And he is the propitiation for our sins." Jesus it is, who by the merit of his blood can obtain pardon for us, but we must apply immediately. The Redeemer, during his preaching in Juda, cured the sick and dispensed other favours as he went along, whoever was on the spot to ask a favour of him, obtained it; but whoever was negligent and allowed him to pass without a request, remained as he was: "Who went about doing good."—Acts 10:38. It was this caused St. Austin to say: "timeo Jesura transeuntem," by which he meant to express, that when the Lord offers us his grace, we must immediately correspond, doing our utmost to obtain it, that otherwise he will pass on and leave us without it. "To-day, if you shall hear his voice, harden not your hearts."—Ps. 94:8. Today God calls you, give yourself to God today, if you wait for tomorrow, intending to give yourself to him then, perhaps he will have ceased to call and you will remain deserted. Mary, the Queen and the mother of mercies, is also a throne of grace, as St. Antoninus says. Hence, if you see that God is angry with you, St. Bonaventure exhorts you to have recourse to the hope of sinners. “Si videris Dominum indignatum ad spem peccatorum confugias.” Go, have recourse to the hope of sinners: Mary is the hope of sinners, Mary who is called “the mother of holy hope.”—Eccl. 24:24. But we must take notice, that holy hope is the hope of that sinner who repents him of his evil ways and determines upon a change of life; but if any one pursues an evil course in the hope that Mary will succour and save him, such a hope is false, such a hope is bad and rash. Let us then repent of our sins, resolve to amend, and then have recourse to Mary, with a confidence that she will assist and save us.

SERMON THE FOURTH

UPON THE FOUR PRINCIPAL GATES OF HELL

"Defixse sunt in terra portse ejus.''

"Her gates are sunk into the ground."—Lam. 2:9.

"BROAD is the way that leadeth to destruction and many there are who go in thereat."—Matt. 7:13. Hell has then different gates, but these gates stand on our earth. "Her gates are sunk into the ground." These are the vices by which men offend God and draw down upon themselves, chastisements and eternal death. Amongst the other vices, there are four, which send most souls to hell and on this earth bring upon men the scourges of God; and these four are, hatred, blasphemy, theft and impurity. Behold the four gates, by which the greater number of souls enter hell; and it is of these four, that I mean to speak today; in order that you may amend and cure yourselves of these four vices, otherwise God will cure you of them, but by your own destruction.

The first gate of hell is hatred. As paradise is the kingdom of love, so hell is the kingdom of hatred. Father, says such a person, I am grateful to, and love my friends; but I cannot endure him who does me an injury. Now brother, you must know, that the barbarians, the Turks and Indians say and do, all this: "Do not also the Heathens this?"—Matt. 5:47; says the Lord. To wish well to him, who serves you is a natural thing, it is done not only by the infidel, but even by the brutes and wild beasts. "But, I say to you." Hear what I say to you, says Jesus Christ; hear my law, which is a law of love: "Love your enemies." I wish, that you, my disciples, should love even your enemies. "Do good to them that hate you;" you must do good to them that wish you ill, "and pray for them that persecute and calumniate you if you can do nothing else, you must pray for them who persecute you and then you shall be the children of God your father: "that you may be the children of your father who is in heaven."—Matt. 5:44, 45. St. Austin then is right, in saying, that it is by love alone, a child of God is known from a child of the devil. "Sola dilectio decernit inter filios Dei, et filios diaboli." Thus have the saints always done; they have loved their enemies. A certain woman had traduced the honour of St. Catherine of Sienna and the saint attended this same woman in her sickness and ministered to her as a servant. St. Acaius sold his garment, to succour one who had taken away his character. St. Ambrose gave to an assassin, who had attempted his life, a daily allowance, in order that he might have wherewithal to live. Such may indeed be called the children of God. Is it a great matter, says St. Thomas of Villanova, that often when we have received an injury from any one, we forgive it at the suit of a friend who pleads for him? And shall we not do the same when God commands it?

Oh, how well grounded a hope of pardon has not he, who pardons the man who has offended him. He has the promise of God himself, who says, "Forgive and you shall be forgiven."—Luke 6:37. "By forgiving others," says St. Chrysostom," you earn pardon for yourself." But he, on the contrary, who will have vengeance, how can he hope for pardon for his sins? Such a person, in saying the "Our Father," condemns himself when he says: "forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." Then, when such a person wishes to take vengeance, he says to God: Lord, do not pardon me, because I will not pardon my enemies. You give judgment in your own cause, says St. John Chrysostom: "Tu in tui causa fers sententiam."—Hom. 18. in Joan. But, be assured, that you shall be judged without mercy, if you show not mercy to your neighbour. "For judgment without mercy to him that hath not done judgment."—James 2:13. But how, says St. Austin, how can he who will not forgive his enemy, according to the command of God, have the face to ask pardon from God for his offences. "Qua fronte indulgentiam peccatorem obtinere poterit, qui prascipienti dare veniam non acquiescit?" If then, my brethren, you wish to have revenge, bid adieu to paradise: "Without are dogs."—Apoc. 22:15. Dogs, on account of their natural fury, are taken to represent the revengeful. These dogs are shut out from paradise; they have a hell in this life; and they shall have hell in the next. "He who is at enmity with any one, (says St. John Chrysostom,) never enjoys peace, he is in everlasting trouble:" "Qui inimicum habet nunquam fruitur pace, perpetuo sestuat."—Hom. 22.

But father, such a one has taken away my good name: "Honorem meum nemini dabo." Such is forsooth the proverb, ever in the mouths of those hell-hounds who seek for revenge. He has taken away my honour, I must take his life. And is the life of a man at your disposal? God alone is master of life. "For it is thou, O Lord, that hast the power of life and death."—Wisd. 16:13. Do you wish to take vengeance of your enemy? God wishes to take vengeance of thee. Vengeance belongs to God alone. "Revenge is mine and I will repay them in due time."—Deut. 33:35. But how else you say, can my honour be repaired? Well and in order to repair your honour, you must trample under foot the honour of God. Do you not know, says St. Paul, that when you transgress the law, you dishonour God? "Thou, by transgression of the law dishonourest God."—Rom. 2:23. And what honour is this of yours' that you wish to repair? It is the same as the honour of a Turk, of an Idolator: a Christian's honour is to obey God and observe his law. But other men will look down upon me; and so, for fear you should be looked down upon, you must condemn yourself to hell. But if you forgive, the good will praise you; wherefore it is, that Chrysostom says: if you wish to be revenged, do good to your enemy. "Beneficiis eum affice et ultus es."—Hom. 20:10, 6. because then, others will condemn your enemy and speak well of you. It is not true, that he, loses his honour, who, when he has been injured or insulted, says: I am a Christian, I neither can nor will be revenged. Such a person gains, instead of losing honour and saves his soul besides. On the contrary, he who takes revenge will be punished by God, not only in the other life, but in this also. He is obliged to fly the justice of men, after having taken that vengeance, which will render his life henceforward miserable. What an unhappiness to live a fugitive; to be always in dread of justice; always in dread of the kindred of his victim; tormented with remorse of conscience and condemned to hell? And let us further know, my brethren, that revenge and the desire of revenge are alike enormous, are the same sin. Should we at any time receive an offence, what are we to do? When our passion begins to rise, we must have recourse to God and to the most holy Mary; who will help us and get strength for us to forgive. We should then endeavour to say: Lord, for the love of you, I forgive the injury that has been done me and do you in your mercy, forgive me all the injuries I have done you.

Let us pass on to the second gate of hell, which is blasphemy. Some, when things go wrong with them, do not attack man, but endeavour to wreak their vengeance upon God himself by blasphemy. Know, my brethren, what manner of sin blasphemy is. A certain author says: "every sin, compared with blasphemy, is light;" and first of all, St. John Chrysostom says, there is nothing worse than blasphemy: "Blasphemia pejus nihil."—Hom. 1. ad pop. Antioch. Other sins, says St. Bernard, are committed through frailty, but this only through malice: "Alia peccata videntur procedere ex fragilitate et ignorantia, sed blasphemia procedit ex propria malitia."—Serm. 33. With reason, then, does St. Bernardine of Sienna call blasphemy a diabolical sin, because the blasphemer, like a demon, attacks God himself. He is worse than those who crucified Jesus Christ, because they did not know him to be God; but he who blasphemes, knows him to be God and insults him face to face. He is worse than the dogs, because dogs do not bite their masters, who feed them, but the blasphemer outrages God, who is at that very moment bestowing favours on him. What punishment, says St. Austin, will suffice to chastise so horrid a crime? "Quae supplicia sufficiunt cum Deo fit ista tam nefaria injuria?"—De civit. Dei, cap. 9. We should not wonder, says Julius III. in his twentythird bull, that the scourges of God do not cease while such a crime exists amongst us: "Minime mirandum si flagella non amoveantur."

We read in the preface to the pragmatic sanction in France, that King Robert when praying for the peace of the kingdom, was answered by the crucifix, that the kingdom never should have had peace if he had not eradicated blasphemy. The Lord threatens to destroy the kingdom in which this accursed vice reigns. "They have blasphemed the Holy One of Israel your land is desolate it shall be desolate."—Isa. 1:4, 7.

Oh, if there were always found someone to do what St. John Chrysostom advises: "Contera os ejus, percussione manum tuam sanctifica." The mouth of the accursed blasphemer should he struck and he should then be stoned, as the old law commanded: "And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, dying let him die: all the multitude shall stone him."—24:26. But it would be better if that were done which St. Louis, king of France, put in force; he commanded by edict, that every blasphemer should be branded on the mouth with an iron. A certain nobleman having blasphemed, many persons besought the king not to inflict that punishment upon him; but St. Louis insisted upon its infliction in every instance; and some taxing him with excessive cruelty on that account, he replied that he would suffer his own mouth to be burned, sooner than allow such an outrage to be put upon God in his kingdom.

Tell me, blasphemer, of what country are you? Allow me to tell you, you belong to hell. St. Peter was known in the house of Caiphas for a Galilean by his speech. "Surely thou also art one of them," it was said to him," for even thy speech doth discover thee."—Matt. 26:73. What is the language of the damned? blasphemy, "And they blasphemed the God of Heaven, because of their pains and wounds."—Apoc. 16:11. What do you gain, my brethren, by these your blasphemies? you gain no honour by them. Blasphemers are abhorred even by their blasphemous companions. Do you gain any temporal advantage? Do you not see that this accursed vice keep us forever in beggary? "Sin maketh nations miserable."—Prov. 14:34. Do you derive pleasure from it? What pleasure do you derive from baspheming God? The pleasure of the damned; and that moment of madness past, what pain and bitterness does it not leave in. your heart? Resolve to rid yourself of this vice, in any event. Take care if you do not abandon it now, that you will not carry it with you to death, as has happened to so many who have died with blasphemy in their mouths. But, Father, what can I do when the madness comes upon me? Good God! and are there no other means of working it off than by blasphemy? Say, cursed be my sins. Mother of God assist me, give me patience; your passion, your anger will pass off quickly and you will find yourself in the grace of God after the trial. If you do not act thus, you will find yourself more afflicted and more lost than before.

Let us now pass on to the consideration of the third great gate of hell, by which so large a portion of the damned enter; I mean theft. Some, so to speak, adore money as their God and look upon it as the object of all their desires. "The idols of the Gentiles are silver and gold."—Ps. 113:4. But the sentence of condemnation has already been pronounced against such; "nor covetous nor extortioners shall possess the kingdom of God."—1 Cor. 6:10. It is true that theft is not the most enormous of sins, but St. Antoninus says that it very much endangers salvation: "Nullum peccatum periculosius furto." The reason is because for the remission of other sins, true repentance only is required; but repentance is not enough for the remission of theft, there must be restitution and this is made with difficulty. A certain hermit had once the following vision: he saw Lucifer seated on a throne and enquiring of one of his demons, why he had been so long about returning. The latter replied that he had been detained by his endeavours to tempt a thief, not to restore what he had stolen. Let this fool be severely punished, said Lucifer. To what purpose have you spent this time? Do you not know that he who has taken the property of another, never restores it? And in truth, so it is; the property of another becomes to him who takes it, like his own blood; and the pain of suffering one's blood to be drawn for another is very difficult to endure. We learn it every day from experience; innumerable thefts take place, how much restitution do you see?

My brethren, see that you take not the property of your neighbour and if during the past you have ever failed in this respect, make restitution as soon as possible. If you cannot at once make full restitution, do it by degrees. Know that the property of another in your possession will not only be the means of bringing you to hell, but will make you miserable even in this life. Thou hast despoiled others, says the prophet, and others shall despoil thee. "Because thou hast spoiled many nations, all that shall be left of the people shall spoil thee."—Habac. 2:8. The property of another brings with it a curse which will fall upon the entire house of the thief. "This is the curse that goeth forth over the face of the earth and it shall come to the house of the thief."—Zachar. 5:3, 4; that is to say, (as St. Gregory Nazianzen explains it,) that the thief shall lose not only the stolen property, but his own. "Qui opes inique possidet, etiam suas amittit." The goods of another are as fire and smoke to consume everything that comes in their way.

Remember well, mothers and wives, when children or husbands bring home the property of their neighbour, remember well, to chide and reprove them; not to applaud their action, or even consent to it by silence. Tobias hearing a lamb bleat in his house, "take heed," said he, lest perhaps it be stolen; restore ye it to its owners."—Tob. 2:21. St. Austin says that Tobias, because he loved God, did not wish to hear the sound of theft in his house: "Nolebat sonum furti audire in domo." Some persons take the property of their neighbour and then are fain to quiet their consciences by alms-deeds. Christ, says St. John Chrysostom, will not be fed with the plunder of others: "Non vult Christus rapina nutriri." The sins of this kind, committed by the great, are their acts of injustice, their putting-others to loss, their depriving the poor of what is their due. These are descriptions of theft which require perfect restitution, and a restitution most difficult of all to make, and most likely to be the cause of one's damnation.

We have now, lastly, to speak of the fourth gate of hell, which is impurity, a nd it is by this gate that the greater number of the damned enter. Some will say that it is a trifling sin. Is it a trifling sin? It is a mortal sin. St. Antoninus writes, that such is the nauseousness of this sin; that the devils themselves cannot endure it. Moreover, the doctors of the church say that certain demons, who have been superior to the rest, remembering their ancient dignity, disdain; tempting to so loathsome a sin. Consider then, how disgusting he must be to God, who, like a dog, is ever returning to his vomit, or wallowing like a pig in the stinking mire of this accursed vice. "The dog is returned to his vomit; and the sow that was washed, to her rolling in the mire.—2 Ps. 2:22. The impure say, moreover, God has compassion on us who are subject to this vice, because he knows that we are flesh. What do you say? God has compassion on this vice. But you must know that the most horrible chastisements with which God has ever visited the earth, have been drawn down by this vice. St. Jerome says that this is the only sin of which we read, that it caused God to repent him of having made man. "It repented him that he had made man for all flesh had corrupted its way."—Gen. 6:6, 12. Wherefore it is, Eusebius says, that there is no sin which God punishes so rigorously, even upon earth, as this: "Pro nullo peccato, tarn manifestum judicium exercuit Deus, quam pro isto. Euseb. epist. ad Damas. He once sent fire from Heaven upon five cities, and consumed all their inhabitants for this sin. Principally on account of this sin did God destroy mankind, with the exception of eight persons, by the deluge. It is a sin which God punishes, not only in the other life, but in this also. In confirmation of this, you have only to enter the hospitals, and see there the many poor young men, who were once strong and robust, but are now weak, squalid, full of pains, tormented with lancets and caustic, and ulcers, all through this accursed vice. "Because thou hast forgotten me and cast me off behind thy back, bear thou also thy wickedness and thy fornications."—Ezech. 23:35. Because, says God, you have forgotten me and turned your back upon me, for a miserable pleasure of the flesh, I am resolved that even in this life you shall pay the forfeit of your wickedness.

God has compassion upon men subject to this sin. It is this sin which sends most men to hell. St. Remigius says, that the greater number of the damned are in hell through this vice. Father Segnier writes, that as this vice fills the world with sinners, so it fills hell with damned souls; and before him St. Bernard wrote, "this sin draws the whole world, as it were, into sin."—Yol. 4. Serm. 21. And before St. Bernard, St. Isidore said, that "the human race is brought under the power of the devil, more by lust, than by all the other vices."—Book 2. Sent. cap. 39. The reason is, because this vice proceeds from the natural inclination of the flesh. Hence the angelic doctor says, that the devil does not take such complacency in securing the commission of any other sin as of this, because the person who is plunged in this infernal mire, remains fast therein, and almost wholly unable to free himself more. "Nullus in peccato tenacior quam luxuriosus," says St. Thomas of Villanova.—Cap. 1. de St. Idelph. Moreover, this vice deprives one of all light, for the impure man becomes so blind, as almost wholly to forget God, "Voluptates impudicae," says St. Laurence Justinian, "oblivionem Dei inducunt," de lib. vitse, which is in accordance with what is said by the prophet Osee: "They will not set their thoughts to return to their God; for the spirit of fornication is in the midst of them, and they have not known God."—Osee 5:4. The impure man knows not God; he obeys neither God nor reason, as St. Jerome says; he obeys only the sensual appetite which causes him to act the beast: "Nec paret rationi qui impetu ducitur."—St. Hier. in epist.

This sin, because it flatters, makes us fall at once into the habit of it, a habit which some carry with them even to death. You see husbands and decrepid old men, indulge in the same thoughts, and committing the same sins, as they committed in their youth. And because sins of this kind are so easily committed, they become multiplied without number. Ask of the sinner how many impure thoughts he has consented to; he will tell you he cannot remember. But brother, if you cannot tell the number, God can; and you know that a single immodest thought is enough to send you to hell. How many immodest words have you spoken, in which you took delight yourself, and by which you scandalized your neighbour? From thoughts and words you proceed to acts and to those innumerable impurities which those wretches roll and wallow in like swine, "sus in volutacro luti," without ever being satisfied, for this vice is never satisfied. But father, you will say, how can I hold out against the innumerable temptations which assail me? I am weak, I am flesh. And since you are weak, why not recommend yourself to God, and to most holy Mary, who is the mother of purity? Since you are flesh, why do you throw yourself in the way of sin? Why do you not mortify your eyes? Why do you gaze upon those objects whence temptations flow. St. Aloysius never raised his eyes to look even upon his mother. It is to be remarked moreover, that this sin brings with it innumerable others; enmities, thefts and more especially, sacrilegious confessions and communions, by reason of the shame which will not allow of these impurities being disclosed in confession. And let us remark here in passing, that it is sacrilege above all things, that brings upon us sickness and death; for, says the apostle, "he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord and then he adds: "therefore are many infirm and weak among you."—1 Cor. 9:29, 30. And St. Chrysostom in explanation of that passage says, that St. Paul speaks of persons who were chastised with bodily infirmities, because they received the sacrament with a guilty conscience. "Quandoquidem peccabant, quod participes fierent mysteriorum, non expurgata conscienta."—Chrysot. in cap. 3. Isaisae.

My brethren, should you ever have been sunk in this vice, I do not bid you be disheartened, but arise at once from this foul and infernal pit; beg of God forthwith to give you light, and stretch out his hand to you. The first thing that you have to do is to break with the occasion of sin, without that, preaching and tears, and resolutions, and confessions, all are lost. Remove the occasions, and then constantly recommend yourself to God, and to Mary the mother of purity. No matter how grievously you may be tempted, do not be discouraged by the temptation; at once call to your aid Jesus and Mary, pronouncing their sacred names. These blessed names have the virtue of making the devil fly, and stifling that hellish flame within you. If the devil persist in tempting you, persevere you in calling upon Jesus and Mary, and certainly you shall not fall. In order to rid yourself of your evil habits, undertake some special devotion to our Lady; begin to fast in her honour upon Saturdays; contrive to visit her image every day and beg of her to obtain for you deliverance from that vice: each morning immediately that you rise, never omit saying three "Hail Mary's" to her purity, and do the same when going to bed: and above all things, as I have said, when the temptation is most troublesome, call quickly upon Jesus and Mary. Beware brother, if you do not be converted now, you may never be converted.

SERMON THE FIFTH

EXTERNAL DEVOTIONS ARE OF LITTLE USE IF WE DO NOT CLEANSE OUR SOULS FROM SIN

"Et nunc nolite illudere ut forte constringantur vinculatua."

"And now do not mock, lest your bonds be tied strait." Isai. 27:22.

GOD commands Jonas to go and preach to Ninive. Jonas, instead of obeying God, flies by sea towards Tharsis. But, behold! a great tempest threatens to sink the ship; and Jonas knowing that the tempest was raised in punishment of his disobedience, said to the crew of the vessel: "take me up and cast me into the sea and the sea shall be calm to you; for I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you."—Jon. 1:12. And they actually did cast him into the sea and the tempest ceased thereupon. "And the sea ceased from raging."—Ibid. 15. Then if Jonas had not been thrown into the sea, the tempest should not have ceased. Consider well, my brethren, what we are to learn from this. It is, that if we do not cast sin out of our souls, the tempest, that is, the scourge of God, will not cease. The tempest is excited by our sins; the tempest which is hurrying us to destruction. "Our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away."—Isa. 64:6. Behold, we have penitential exercises, novenas, and exposition of the blessed sacrament; but to what purpose are those, if we be not converted; if we do not rid our souls of sin? Such is the subject of our discourse. External devotions are of little use, if we do not abandon our sins; because otherwise we cannot please God.

It is said that the pain is not removed before the thorn has been plucked out. St. Jerome writes, God is never angered, since anger is passion, and passion is incompatible with God. He is always tranquil; and even in the act of punishing, his tranquillity is not in the least disturbed. "But thou being master of power, judgest with tranquility."—Wisd. 12:18. But the malice of mortal sin is so great, that if God were cap able of wrath and affliction, it would enrage and afflict him. It is this that sinners do as far as in them lies, according to that of Isaiah: "But they provoked to wrath and afflicted the spirit of his Holy One."—Isa. 63:10. Moses writes, that when God was about to send the deluge, he declared himself to be so much. afflicted by the sins of men as to be obliged to exterminate them from the earth. "And being touched inwardly with sorrow of heart, he said, I will destroy man whom I have created, from the face of the earth."—Gen. 6:6.

Chrysostom says, that sin is the only cause of all our sufferings and chastisements: "Ubi est fons peccati, illic est plaga supplicii."—In Psal. 3. Commenting upon these words in Genesis, which the Lord spoke after the deluge: "I will place my bow in the clouds."—Gen. 9:13. St. Ambrose remarks that God does not say, I will place my arrow, but my bow, in the clouds; giving us thereby to understand that it is always the sinner who fixes the arrow in the bow of God, by provoking him to chastisement.

If we wish to be pleasing to the Lord, we must remove the cause of his anger, which is sin. The man sick of the palsy besought Jesus Christ to restore the health of his body; but, before granting his request, our Lord first restored his soul's health, by giving him sorrow for his sins, and then saying to him: " Be of good heart, son, thy sins are forgiven thee."—Matt. 9:2. St. Thomas says, that the Redeemer first removed the cause of his infirmity, namely, his sins and then freed him from the infirmity itself: "Iste petebat sanitatem corporis, et Dominus dat animae, quia tanquam bonus medicus auferre voluit mali radicem."—& Thom. in Matt. loc. cit. Sin is the root of every evil, as we find in St. Bernardine of Sienna; " Causa infirmitatis saepius sunt peccata." Hence the Lord after having healed him, warned him against sin in these words: "Go thy way and sin no more, lest something worse befall thee."—Ecclesiasticus said the same before our Lord; "My son, in thy sickness cleanse thy heart from sin and then give place to the physician."—Eccl. 33:9. You must first apply to the physician of the soul, in order that he may free you from your sins and then to the physician of the body, that he may cure you of your disease. In a word, the cause of all our chastisements is sin; and still more than sin, our obstinacy in it, as St. Basil says, "Nostri causa hoec invehuntur qui retinemus cor impoenitans."—In Isa. 9. We have offended God, and are, notwithstanding, unwilling to do penance. When God calls by the voice of his punishment, he desires that he should be heard; if he be not, he shall be compelled by ourselves to curse us: "But if thou wilt not hear the voice of the Lord, thy God all these curses shall come upon thee, cursed shalt thou be in the city, cursed in the field, &c."—Deut. 28:15, 16. When we offend God, we provoke all creatures to punish us. St. Anselm says that in the same manner as a servant, when he offends his master, draws down upon him the wrath not only of his master, but of the whole family; so we, when we offend God, excite against us the anger of all creatures, "Non solum iram Dei promeruimus, sed totam creationem contra nos excitavimus."—De similit. cap. 101. And St. Gregory says, that we have more especially irritated against us those creatures which we have made use of against our Creator: "Cuncta quae ad usum pravitatis infleximus, ad usum nobis vertuntur ultionis."—Hom. 35, in Evang. God's mercy holds in those creatures, that they may not afflict us, but when he sees that we make no account of his threats, and continue to live on in our former way, he will then make use of those creatures to take vengeance on us for the injuries we have done him : " He will arm the creature for the revenge of his enemies."—Wisd. 5:18. "And the whole world shall fight with him against the unwise."—Ib. 21. "There is no creature," says St. John Chrysostom, which will not feel anger when it sees its Lord in anger."—Hom. in absol.

If then, my brethren, we do not appease God by our conversion we never shall be free from chastisement. What folly, says St. Gregory, could be more extreme, than to imagine that God should cease from chastising before we should have ceased to offend? "Est primum dementiae genus, nolle a malis quiescere, et Deum velle a sua ultione cessare"—Mor. lib. 8 Ep. 41. Many now come to the church and hear the sermon, but go away without confession, or change of life. If we do not remove the cause of the scourge, how can we expect to he delivered from the scourge itself: "Nee amputamus causas morbi ut morbus auferatur."—St Jerome. We continue to irritate God, and then wonder that God should continue to chastise us. "Impure as we are," says Salvian, "we wonder why we should be so miserable." Do we think that God is appeased by the mere circumstance of our appearing at church, without repenting of our sins, without restoring the property, or character, of our neighbour, without flying those occasions of sin which keep us at a distance from God. Ah, let us not mock the Lord! "And now do not mock, lest your bonds be tied strait."—Isa. 28:22. Do not mock God, says the prophet, lest those bonds which are securing you for hell, be tied strait. Cornelius a Lapide, in commenting on the above passage of Isaiah says, that when the fox is caught in the snare, its efforts to disengage itself only serve to entangle it the more: "Impii illusores, irridendo Dei minas et poenes, magis iisdem se adstringunt." My brethren, let us have done; let us no more irritate God, the chastisement is near at hand: "For I have heard of the Lord the God of Hosts," continues the prophet, " a consumption, and a cutting short upon all the earth."—Isa. 28:22. I am not the prophet Isaiah, but I can say that I see the scourge which is hanging over us, if we do not be converted.

Hear how the Lord says to you: "Who requires these things at your hands?"—Isa. 1:12. Who required your perpetual exercises and your visits of devotion to the church? I will have nothing from you, unless you abandon sin; "offer sacrifice no more in vain."—Ib. 13. Of what use are your devotions, if you do not amend your lives. "My soul hateth your solemnities."—Ib. 14. Know, says the Lord, that your homage and external devotions are hateful to my soul, whilst you think by these to avert your chastisement, without removing your offences; "with burnt offerings thou wilt not be delighted; a sacrifice to God is an afflicted spirit."—Ps. 50:18, 19. No devotions, or alms, or penitential works, are accepted by God from a soul in the state of sin and without repentance. God accepts the acts of him alone who is contrite for his sin and resolved upon a change of life.

O, how God is not to be mocked! I never commanded you, he says, to perform those devotions and acts of penance: "For I spoke not to your Fathers concerning the matter of burnt offering and sacrifices, but this thing I commanded them, saying: hearken to my voice and I will be your God."—Jer. 7:22. "What I wish of you, says God, is, that you hear my voice and change your life and make a good confession, with real sorrow, for you must know yourselves, that your other confessions, followed by so many relapses, have been worth nothing. I wish that you should do violence to yourselves in breaking with that connection, with that company. I wish that you should endeavour to restore that property, to make good to your neighbour such a loss. —"Hearken to my voice," obey my command, "and I will be your God." I will then be to you the God of mercy, such as you would have me to be. Cardinal Ugon, in his comment upon these words of our Lord, in the gospel according to St. Matthew: "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."—Matt. 11:15. says, "alii habent aures sed non aures audiendi." Some have ears, but ears which do not serve them for hearing. How many attend sermons and receive admonitions from the confessor, in which they are told all that they must do in order to please God; but they leave the church only to live worse than before. How can God be appeased by such? or how can such be delivered from the divine chastisement? "Offer up the sacrifice of justice and trust in the Lord," Ps. 4:6. says David. Honour God not in appearance, but by works. It is that which is meant by "the sacrifice of justice," honour him by bewailing your sins, by the frequentation of the sacraments, by a change of life and then hope in the Lord; but to hope while you continue the state of sin, is not hope, it is rashness, it is a deceit of the enemy and renders you more odious in the sight of God and more deserving of punishment.

My brethren, you see that the Lord is in wrath, that he already has his hand lifted to strike with the scourge which threatens us; how do you think to escape? "Who hath shewed you to flee from the wrath to come?"—Matt. 3:7. "Bring forth, therefore, fruit worthy of penance," Ibid. 8. says the Baptist, preaching to the Jews of his day. You must do penance, but penance deserving of his pardon, that is, it must be true and resolute. Your anger must be changed into meekness, by the forgiveness of those who offend you; your intemperance must become abstinence, by observing the fasts commanded, at least, by the Church and by abstaining from the immoderate use of intoxicating drinks which change man into a beast, therefore you must avoid the public house; impurity must give way in you to chastity, by your not returning to that filthy vomit, by resisting evil thoughts, by not using bad words, by flying bad companions, and dangerous conversation. "You must bring forth fruit worthy of penance," and the bringing forth of such fruit, implies also that we attend to the service of God, and endeavour to serve him more than we offended him; "for, as you have yielded your members to serve uncleanness and iniquity so now yield your members to love justice."—Kom. 6:19. Thus have done a St. Mary Magdalen, a St. Austin, a St. Mary of Egypt, a St. Margaret of Crotona, who by their works of penance and sanctification, rendered themselves more dear to God than others who had been less sinful, but more tepid. St. Gregory says, that "for the most part, a fervent life after sin is the more pleasing to God, than a life which, though innocent, is tepid." And thus does the Saint explain the following passage of the gospel: "There shall be joy in Heaven upon one sinner that doth penance, more than upon ninety-nine just who need not penance."—Luke 15:7. This is understood of the sinner who after having arisen from sin, sets about serving God with more fervour than others who have long been just.

This is to bring forth fruit worthy of penance, not content one's self with hearing sermons and visiting the church, without abandoning sin, or flying the occasion of it. To act thus, is rather a mockery of God and calculated to excite him to greater wrath. "And, think not," pursues the Baptist, "think not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham for our father."—Matt. 3:9. It will not do to say, we have the mother of God to assist us, we have our patron saint to procure us deliverance; because, if we do not abandon our sins, the saints cannot help us. The saints are the friends of God, whence they not only have no inclination, but they should even feel ashamed to succour the obstinate. Let us tremble, because the Lord has already published the sentence, "that every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be cut down, and cast into the fire."—Matt. 7:19. Brother, how many years have you been in the world? Tell me what fruit of good works have you hitherto borne, what honour have you rendered to God by your life? Sin, outrage, contempt, such are the fruit you have borne, the honour you have rendered to God.—God now in his mercy gives you time for penace, in order that you may bewail the injuries you have done him and love him, the remainder of your days. What do you intend to do? What have you resolved upon? Resolve at once to give yourself to God. What do you expect? unless that if you do not at once turn to God, you shall be cut down and cast into the fire of hell. But let us now bring our instruction to a conclusion; the Lord has sent me to preach here today and has inspired you to come and listen to me, because he wishes to spare you the punishment which threatens you, if you do really turn to him; "leave not out one word, if so be, they will hearken and be converted, everyone from his evil way, that I may repent me of the evil which I think to do unto them."—Jer. 26:2, 3. The Lord has desired me to tell you on his part, that he is willing to relent and withdraw the scourge which he meant to inflict upon you: "That I may repent me of the evil which I think to do unto them but on this condition, "if so be, they will hearken and be converted everyone from his evil way," if they truly reform, otherwise he will put his threat in execution.—Tremble then if you be not yet resolved to change your life. But on the other hand, be joyful if you mean to turn in good earnest to God. "Let the heard of them rejoice that seek the Lord," Ps, 104:3. because God is all tenderness and love to those that seek him. "The Lord is good to the soul that seeketh him."—Lam. 3:25. Neither does the Lord know how to reject a heart humble and contrite for its offences. "A contrite and humble heart, O God, thou wilt not despise."—Ps. 1:19. Let us be joyful then, if we have the good intention of changing our lives and if on seeing ourselves guilty of so many sins before the Lord, we stand very much in fear of the divine judgments, let us have recourse to the mother of mercies, the most holy Mary, who defends and secures from the divine vengeance all those who take refuge under her mantle.—"I am the citadel of all those who fly to me," thus is she made to speak by St. John Damascene.

SERMON THE SIXTH

GOD CHASTISES US IN THIS LIFE FOR OUR GOOD, NOT FOR OUR DESTRUCTION

"Non enim delectaris in perditionibus nostris."

"For thou art not delighted in our being lost."—Job. 3:22.

LET US feel persuaded, my brethren, that there is no one who loves us more than God. St. Theresa says, that God loves us more than we love ourselves. He has loved us from eternity. "Yea I have loved thee with an everlasting love."—Jer. 31:3. It is the love he has borne us which has drawn us from nothing and given us being. "Therefore have I drawn thee, taking pity on thee."—Ibid. Hence, when God chastises us upon the earth, it is not because he wishes to injure us, but because he wishes us well and loves us. "But, of this every one is sure that worshippeth thee, that his life, if it be under trial shall be crowned: and if it be under tribulation shall be delivered."—Job. 3:21. So spoke Sara the wife of Tobias; Lord, he who serves thee is sure that after the trial shall have passed he shall be crowned and that after tribulation he shall be spared the punishment which he deserved; "for thou art not delighted in our being lost: because after a storm thou makest a calm, and after tears and weeping, thou pourest in joyfulness."—Ibid. 21, 22. After the tempest of chastisement he gives us peace and after mourning, joy and gladness. My brethren, let us convince ourselves of what I have undertaken to show you today, namely, that God does not afflict us in this life for our injury but for our good, in order that we may cease from sin, and by recovering his grace escape eternal punishment. "And I will give my fear in their heart, that they may not revolt from me."—Jer. 32:40. The Lord says, that he infuses his fear into our hearts, in order that he may enable us to triumph over our passion for earthly pleasures, for which ungrateful that we are, we have left him. And when sinners have left him, how does he make them look into themselves, and recover his grace? By putting on the appearance of anger and chastising them in this life: "In thy anger thou shalt break the people in pieces." Another version according to St. Austin has: "In thy wrath thou shalt conduct the people." The saint enquiring, what is the meaning of his conducting the people in his wrath! he then replies: "You, O Lord! fill us with tribulations, in order that being thus afflicted, we may abandon our sins and return to you." When the mother wishes to wean her infant how does she proceed? She puts bitters upon her breast. Thus the Lord endeavours to draw our souls to himself, and wean them from the pleasures of this earth, which make them live in forgetfulness of their eternal salvation; he fills with bitterness all their pleasures, pomps and possessions, in order, that not finding peace in those things they may turn to God, who alone can satisfy them. "In their affliction they will rise early to me."—Osee. 6:1. God says within himself, if I allow those sinners to enjoy their pleasures undisturbed, they will remain in the sleep of sin: they must be afflicted, in order that recovering from their lethargy they may return to me. When they shall be in tribulation they will say: "Come, let us return to the Lord, for he hath taken us, and he will heal us: he will strike and he will cure us."—Osee. 6:1, 2. What shall become of us, say those sinners, as they enter into themselves, if we do not turn from our evil courses? God will not be appeased and will with justice continue to punish us, come on, let us retrace our steps; for he will cure us and if he has afflicted us just now, he will upon our return think of consoling us with his mercy.

"In the day of my trouble I sought God and I was not deceived:"—Ps. 74:3, because he raised me up. For this reason does the prophet thank the Lord, that he hath humbled him after his sin; because he was thus taught to observe the divine laws: "It is good for me, that thou hast humbled me, that I may learn thy justifications."—Ps. 118:71. Tribulation is for the sinner, at once a punishment and a grace, says St. Austin: "Poena est, et gratia est." It is a punishment in as much as it has been drawn down upon him by his sins; but it is a grace and an important grace, in as much as it may ward eternal destruction from him and is an assurance that God means to deal mercifully with him, if he look into himself and receive with thankfulness that tribulation which has opened his eyes to his miserable condition and invites him to return to God. Let us then be converted, my brethren and we shall escape from our several chastisements: "Quid servat post poenam," says St. Austin, "qui per gratiam exhibet poenam." He who turns to God, smarting from the scourge has no longer anything to fear; because God scourges only in order that we may return to him and this end once obtained, the Lord will scourge no more.

St. Bernard says, that is impossible to pass from the pleasures of the earth to those of Paradise: "Difficile est, imo impossibile, ut prassentibus quis fruatur bonis et futuris: ut de deliciis transeat ad delicias:"—De inter. Dom. chap. 45. Therefore does the Lord say, "Envy not the man who prospereth in his way, the man who doth unjust things."—Ps. 36:7. "Does he prosper?" says St. Austin, "ay but' in his own way,' and do you suffer? Yo u do, but it is in the way of God." You who walk before God are in tribulation, but he, evil as is his way, prospers. Mark now, what the saint says in conclusion: "He has prosperity in this life, he shall be miserable in the next; you have tribulation in this life, you shall be happy in the next." Be glad, therefore, O sinners! and thank God when he punishes you in this life, and takes vengeance of your sins; because you may know thereby, that he means to treat you with mercy in the next. "Thou wast a merciful God to them and taking vengeance on their inventions."—Ps. 98:8. The Lord when he chastises us, has not chastisement so much in view as our conversion. God said to Nabuchodonozor: "Thou shalt eat grass like an ox and seven times shall pass over thee, till thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men."—Dan. 4:29. For seven years, Nabuchodonozor, shalt thou be compelled to feed upon grass like a beast, in order that you may know I am the Lord; that it is I, who give kingdoms, and take them away; and that you may thus be cured of your pride. And in fact, this judgment, did cause the haughty king to enter into himself and change; so that, after having been restored to his former condition, he said: "Therefore I, Nabuchodonosor, do now, praise and magnify the King of Heaven."—Ibid. 34. And God gave him back his kingdom. "Libenter commutavit sententiam," says St. Jerome: "quia vidit opera commutata."

Unhappy we, says the same saint, when God does not punish us in this life! It is a sign, that he means us for eternal chastisements. "Magua est ira Dei quando non nobis irascitur; reservat nos sicut vitulum in occisione."—Hier. in cit. Psal. 36. What do we conclude, he continues, when the surgeon sees the flesh about to mortify and does not cut it away? we conclude, that he abandons the patient to death? God spares the sinner in this life, says St. Gregory, only to chastise us in the next: "Parcit ut in perpetuum feriat."—Mor. lib. 8. cap. 9. Woe to those sinners, to whom God has ceased to speak and appears not to be in anger. "I will cease and be angry no more."—Ezeck. 16: 42. The Lord then, goes on to say: "But, thou hast provoked me in all these things: and thou shalt know, that I am the Lord, that thou mayest remember and be confounded."—Ibid. 43, 62, 63. A day will come, he says, ungrateful sinner, when you shall know what I am, then shall you remember the graces I have given you; and see with confusion, your black ingratitude. Woe to the sinner, who goes on in his evil life and whom God in his vengea nce suffers to accomplish his perverse desires, according to what is said by the prophet: "Israel hearkened not to me, so I let them go according to the desires of their heart."—Ps. 80:12, 13. It is a sign, that the Lord wishes to reward them on this earth, for whatever little good they may have done, and reserves the chastisement of their sins for eternity: speaking of the sinner whom he treats thus in this life, the Lord says: "Let us have pity on the wicked, but he will not learn justice and he shall not see the glory of the Lord."—Isa. 26:10. Thus, does the poor sinner hasten on to his ruin, because seeing himself prosperous, he deceives himself into the expectation, that as God is dealing mercifully with him now, he will continue to do the same; and by this delusion, he will be led to live on in his sins. But, will the Lord, be always thus merciful to him? No, the day of punishment will come at length, when he shall be excluded from paradise and flung into the dungeon of the rebels; "and he shall not see the glory of the Lord." "Let us have pity on the wicked," far from me, says St. Jerome, be this mercy: "Longe a me misericordia tam rigorosa," Lord, he says, extend not to me this dreadful pity; if I have offended you, let me be chastised for it in this life; because, if you do not chastise me here in this life, I shall have to be chastised in the other world, for all eternity. For this reason, did St. Austin say: "Lord, here cut, here burn, that you may spare during eternity:" chastise me here, O God and do not spare me now, in order, that I may be spared the punishment of hell. "Domine hie seca, hie non parcas, ut in asternum parcas." When the surgeon cuts the imposthume of the patient, it is a sign that he means to have him healed. St. Austin says: "it is most merciful of the Lord, not to suffer iniquity to pass unpunished." The Lord deals very mercifully with the sinner, when by chastisement he makes him enter into himself in this life. Hence Job, besought the Lord so earnestly to afflict him. "And, that this may be my comfort, that afflicting me with sorrow he spare not."—Job. 6:10.

Jonas slept in the ship when he was flying from the Lord; but God seeing that the wretched man was on the brink of temporal and eternal death, caused him to be warned of the tempest: "Why art thou fast asleep, rise up, call upon thy God."—Jon. 1:6. God, my brethren, now warns ye in like manner. You have been in the state of sin, deprived of sanctifying grace, the chastisement has come and that chastisement is the voice of God, saying to you, "why are you fast asleep? rise and call upon your God." Awake, sinner! do not live on forgetful of your soul and of God. Open your eyes and see how you stand upon the verge of hell, where so many wretches are now bewailing sins less grievous than yours and are you asleep? have you no thought of confession? no thought of rescuing yourself from eternal death? "Rise, call upon your God." Up from that infernal pit into which you have fallen; pray to God to pardon you, beg of him this at least, if you are not at once resolved to change your life, that he will give you light and make you see the wretched state in which you stand. Learn how to profit by the warning which the Lord vouchsafes you. Jeremias first sees a rod. "I see a rod watching;" he next sees a boiling caldron: "I see a boiling caldron."—Jer. 1:12, 13. Saint Ambrose, in speaking of this passage, explains it thus: he who is not corrected by the rod, shall be thrown into the caldron, there to burn: "Qui virga, non corrigitur in olla mittitur ut ardeat."—In psal. 38. He whom the temporal chastisement fails to convert, shall be sent to burn eternally in hell-fire. Sinful brother, listen to God who addresses himself to your heart, by this chastisement and calls on you to do penance. Tell me what answer do you make him? The prodigal son, after having left his father, thought no more upon him, whilst he continued to live amid delights; but when he saw himself reduced to that state of misery described in the gospel, poor, deserted, obliged to tend swine and not allowed to fill himself with the food wherewith the swine were filled, then, he came to himself and said: "How many hired servants in my father's house abound with bread and I here perish with hunger?"—Luke 15:17. "I will arise and go to my father."—Ibid. 18. And so he did and was lovingly received by his father. Brother, you have to do in like manner. You see the unhappy life you have hitherto led, by living away from God; a life full of thorns and bitterness; a life which could not be otherwise, as being, without God, who alone can give content. You see how many servants of God who love him, lead a happy life and enjoy continual peace, the peace of God, which, as the apostle says, surpasses all the pleasures of the senses. "The peace of God, which surpasseth all understanding."—Phil. 4:7. And what are you doing? Do you not feel that you suffer a hell in this life? Do you not know that you shall suffer one in the next? Take courage, say with the prodigal: "I will arise and go to my father." I will arise from this sleep of death—this state of damnation and return to God. It is true, that I have sufficiently outraged him, by leaving him so much against his desire, but he is still my father. "I will arise and go to my father." And when you shall go to that Father, what shall you say to him? Say what the prodigal said to his father: "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, I am not now worthy to be called thy son."—Ibid. 18, 19. Father, I acknowledge my error, I have done ill to leave you who have so much loved me; I see now, that I am no longer worthy to be called your son; receive me at least, as your servant; restore me at least, to your grace and then chastise me as you please.

O happy you, if you say and do thus! the same will happen you which befel the prodigal son. The father, when he saw his son retracing his steps and perceived that he had humbled himself for his fault, not only did not drive him off—not only received him into his house, but embraced and kissed him as his son; "and running to him, fell upon his neck and kissed him."—Ibid. 20. He then clothed him with a precious garment, which represents the robe of grace; "Bring forth quickly the first robe, and put it on him."—Ibid. 22. And he, moreover, makes a great feast in the house, to commemorate the recovery of his son, whom he looked upon as lost and dead; "let us eat and make merry, because this my son was dead and is come to life again—was lost and is found."—Ibid. 23, 24. Let us then be joyful, my brethren; it is true, that God appears to be in wrath, but he is still our Father ; let us retrace our steps in penance and he will be appeased and spare us. Behold Mary our Mother praying for us on the one hand and on the other turned towards us, saying, "In me is all hope of life and of virtue come over to me all."—Eccl. 24:25, 26. My children, does that Mother of Mercy say to us, my poor afflicted children, have recourse to me, and in me you shall find all hope ; my Son denies me nothing. "Qui invenerit me inveniet vitam." You were dead by sin; come to me, find me and you shall find life—the life of divine grace, which I shall recover for you by my intercession.

SERMON THE SEVENTH

GOD CHASTISES US IN THIS LIFE, ONLY THAT HE MAY SHOW US MERCY IN THE NEXT

"Ego quos amo arguo et castigo."

"Such as I love, I rebuke and chastise."—Apoc. 3:19.

WHEN the Lord had raised that great tempest which threatened to sink the ship in which Jonas was sailing, in punishment of his disobedience to the divine command, that he should preach to the Ninevites, everyone in the vessel was watching and in great fear, praying each to his own God, with the exception of Jonas, who was asleep within the vessel; "He fell into a deep sleep."—Jon. 1:5. But, knowing that he was the cause of the tempest, he caused himself to be thrown into the sea and was there swallowed by the whale. When Jonas found himself in the belly of that fish and in such extreme danger of death, he addressed himself to God in prayer and God delivered him; "I cried out of my affliction to the Lord, and the Lord heard me."—Jon. 2:3. "Behold," says St. Zeno, "how Jonas, who slumbered in the ship, is awake in the whale." While in the ship, he slumbered in his sin; but when suffering chastisement and upon the point of death, he opened his eyes and remembered God; hence he had recourse to the divine mercy which delivered him, causing the fish to leave him safe and sound upon the shore. Many persons, before seeing the divine chastisements, sleep in their sins, forgetful of God; but the Lord, because he does not desire their destruction, sends them afflictions, roused by which from their lethargy, they return to him and thus he is enabled to avoid punishing them during all eternity. Such, then, is the subject of this discourse. God punishes us in this life, in order to spare us in the next.

We have not been created for this earth; we have been created for the blessed kingdom of Paradise. For this reason it is, says St. Austin, that God mingles so much bitterness with the delights of the world, in order that we may not forget him and eternal life. "Si cessaret Deus et non misceret amaritudines felicitatibus soeculi, oblivisceremur ejus." If, living as we do amid so many thorns in this life, we are strongly attached to it and long so little after Paradise; how little should we not value Paradise, if God were not to embitter continually the pleasures of this earth? And if we have offended God, we must needs be punished for it, either in this world or in the next. St. Ambrose says that God is merciful as well when he punishes, as when he does not; "Quam pius quam clemens in utroque Dens cum miseretur aut vindicat."—Lib. 6. in Luc. The chastisements of God are the effect of his love; they are, to be sure, punishments, but punishments which ward off from us eternal punishment and bring us to everlasting happiness. "But whilst we are judged, we are chastised by the Lord, that we be not condemned with this world."—1 Cor. 11:32. And Judith reminded the Hebrews of the same truth, when they were under the scourge of the Lord; "Let us believe that these scourges of the Lord, with which like servants we are chastised, have happened for our amendment and not for our destruction."—Judith 8:27. Sarah, the wife of Tobias, says the same: "But of this every one is sure that worshippeth thee if his life be under correction, it shall be allowed to come to thy mercy, for thou art not delighted in our being lost."—Tob. 3:21, 22. Lord, she said, you chastise us here, in order that you may spare us ' in the other life, for thou dost not desire our destruction.

"We have it from God himself, that those whom he loves in this life he chastises, in order that they may be converted: "Those whom I love, I rebuke and chastise."—Apoc. 3:19. Where God loves, says St. Basil of Selucia, severity is usually the pledge of his graces: "Ubi amor est, severitas solet esse pignus gratiarum." Unhappy are the sinners who living in the state of sin, prosper in this life; it is a sign that God reserves them for everlasting punishment. "The sinner hath provoked the Lord, according to the multitude of his wrath, he will not seek him."—Ps. 10:4. Behold! says St. Austin, speaking of the passage quoted, behold the most grievous chastisement! "Non quaeret, multum irascitur dum non requiret." When he does not appear to take notice of the sinner and leaves him unpunished, it is a sign that he is very wroth. I call you, says God to him whom he chastises and will you be deaf to my voice? Son, be converted, otherwise you shall confirm my anger, since I shall cease to regard your salvation and allow you to live on in your sins without punishment, but only that I may punish you in the life to come. "And my indignation shall rest in thee; and my jealousy shall depart from thee, and I will cease and be angry no more."—Ezech. 16:42. The apostle warns you, my brethren, not to be deaf to the voice of God, for that on the day of judgment your obstinacy shall be rewarded with a dreadful chastisement and that chastisement eternal. "But according to thy hardness and impenitent heart, thou treasurest up to thyself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the just judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his works."—Rom. 2:5, 6.

So that, St. Jerome says, that there cannot be a greater punishment for a sinner, than that he should not be punished in this life: "Magna ira quando peccantibus non irascitur Deus." And Saint Isodore Pelusiota says, that sinners who are punished in this life, do not deserve pity, but those only who die without having been punished: "Delinquentes et in hac vita castigati non deplorandi sunt, sed qui impuniti abeunt."—Lib. 5. epist. 269. It is not so bad, continues the Saint, to be simply sick, as to have no one to cure you: "Non tam molestum aegrotare, quam morbo medelam non afferri." St. Austin says, in another part, that when God does not chastise the sinner in this world, he chastises him most severely; whence, he concludes, that there is no greater misfortune than impunity for a sinner: "Si impunita dimittit Deus tunc punit infestius; quoniam nihil est infelicius felicitate peccatorum."—Epist. 5. ad Marcell. After England had rebelled against the church, God did not visit her with temporal scourges, her riches have been increasing from that time; but her chastisement is all the greater on that account; as she is left to perish in her sin. "Nihil infelicius felicitate peccantium." The absence of punishment, is the greatest punishment, says the same holy doctor, "Nulla poena magna poena."—Serm. 37. De verb. Dom. The not receiving chastisement in this life for sin, is a great chastisement and prosperity in sin a still greater.

"Why then," Job enquires, "do the wicked live, are they advanced and strengthened with riches?"—Job 21:7. How comes it, O Lord, that sinners, instead of being taken out of this life in poverty and tribulation, enjoy health and honours, and riches? The holy man answers, "They spend their days in wealth and in a moment they go down to hell."—Ibid. 13. Wretched men! they enjoy their riches for a few days and when the hour of chastisement comes, when they least expect it, they are condemned to burn forever in that place of torments. Jeremiah makes the self same enquiry: "Why doth the way of the wicked prosper?"—Jer. 12:1 and then adds, "gather them together, as sheep for a sacrifice."—Ibid. 3. Animals destined for sacrifice, are kept from all labour and fattened up for slaughter. Thus does God act towards the obstinate, he abandons them and suffers them to fatten on the pleasures of this life, in order to sacrifice them in the other to his eternal justice; for these, says Minutius Felix, are fed like victims for the slaughter. "Hi enim ut victimae ad supplicium saginantur." These wretched men, says David, shall not be punished in this life, they shall enjoy their fleeting pleasures; by and by their dream shall have ceased : " neither shall they be scourged like other men, they have suddenly ceased to be; as the dream of them that awake, O Lord, so in thy city thou shalt bring their image to nothing."—Ps. 72:5, 19, 20. How painful is not the case of a poor man, who dreams that he has grown rich or great and upon awaking finds himself the miserable and sick creature he is? "And the enemies of the Lord shall vanish like smoke."—Ps. 36:20. The happiness of sinners is as suddenly dissipated, as is smoke by a breath of air. "Smoke," observes St. Gregory, in his comment upon this passage,

"vanishes in its ascent." And the same is the case with sinners: "I have seen the wicked highly exalted and I passed by and lo! he was not."—Ps. 36:35, 36. Minutius Felix says, in his comment upon the place cited, the unhappy men are exalted the higher, that their fall may be the greater: "Miseri Altius extolluntur ut profundius decidant." The Lord allows the sinner to be exalted for his greater punishment, in order that his fall may be the more grievous, as is said by David, "When they were lifted up thou hast cast them down."—Ps.72:18. If the sick man, says St. Chrysostom, suffer hunger or thirst by order of his physician, it is a sign that the physician has hopes of him; but if the doctor allow him to eat what he pleases and drink as much as he likes, what are we to conclude from that? It is plain that the physician has given him over. And thus, says St. Gregory, it is a manifest sign that God abandons the sinner to perdition, when he never thwarts his evil purposes: "Manifestum perditionis indicium quando nulla contrarietas impedit quod mens perversa concepit:" and in the book of proverbs we read, that "the prosperity of fools shall destroy them." As lightning precedes thunder, says St. Bernard, so is prosperity the forerunner of damnation for the sinner: "Sicut fulgur tonitrum portat ita prosperitas supplicia sempiterna."—Serm. in fer. 5. Dom. ii. Quadrag. The greatest punishment inflicted by God is, when he allows the sinner to sleep on in sin, without rousing him from that sleep of death in which he is buried: "I will make them drunk, that they may sleep an everlasting sleep and awake no more, saith the Lord."—Jerem. 51:39. Cain, after the crime of murdering his brother, was afraid that he should be killed by the first person he should meet: "Omnis qui invenerit me, occidet me."—Gen. 4:14; but the Lord assured him that he should live and that no one should kill him, which assurance of a long life, according to St. Ambrose, was Cain's greatest punishment: "Longaeva vita vindicta est; favor enim impiorum est si subito moriantur."—Lib. 2. de Abil. cap. 9. The saint says, that God treats the obstinate sinner mercifully, when he gives him an early death, because he thus saves him from as many hells, as he should have committed sins, during a longer life. Let sinners then, live according to the desires of their hearts, let them enjoy their pleasures in peace, there will at length come a time when they shall be caught as fish upon the hook. "As fishes are taken with the hook so men are taken in the evil time."—Ecclesiastes 9:12. Whence, St. Austin says, "Do not rejoice like the fish who is delighted with the bait, for the fisherman has not yet pulled the hook." If you were to see a condemned man, making merry at a banquet, with the halter round his neck and every moment awaiting the order for execution, which would you envy or pity him? Neither should you envy the sinner who is happy in his vices. "Nondum traxit hamum piscator." That wretched sinner is already on the hook, he is already in the infernal net; when the time of chastisement shall have arrived, then the wretch will know and deplore his damnation, but all to no purpose.

On the contrary, it is a good sign when a sinner is chastised and suffers tribulation in this life, it is a sign that God has still merciful views upon him; and that he wishes to substitute a temporal for an eternal punishment in his regard. God, says St. Chrysostom, when he punishes us on this earth, does not do so out of hatred to us, but that he may draw us to himself. "Cum irascitur non odio hoc facit, sed ut ad se attrahat quos non vult perire."—In Matt. 4. hom. 14. He chastises for a little while, that he may have you with him for eternity. "Aversatur ad tempus ut te secum habet in aeternum." When the physician uses the knife, he does so to cure, says St. Austin: "Medici percutiunt et sanant." And God, the saint continues, does the same in our regard. "Soevire videtur Deus, ne metuas; Pater est, nunquam enim scevit ut perdat." But, does not God say the same himself? "Those whom I love, I rebuke and chastise, be zealous therefore, and do penance."—Apoc. 3:19. Son, says God, I love you, and therefore I chastise you; "be zealous," see how good I am to you, endeavour you to act in like manner towards me; do penance for your sins, if you wish that I should spare you the chastisement which you deserve: at least, accept with patience and turn, to advantage the tribulation which I send you. In this cross, which now afflicts you, hear you my voice calling upon you to turn to me, and fly from hell which is close upon you. "Behold! I stand at the gate and knock;" I am knocking at the door of your heart; open then to me and know that when the sinner who has driven me from his heart, shall open the door again to me, I will enter and keep him company forever." If any man shall hear my voice, and open to me the door, I will come into him, and will sup with him, and he with me."—Apoc. 3:20. I shall remain united to him forever on this earth; and if he remain faithful, I shall seat him beside me, on the throne of my eternal kingdom. "To him that shall overcome, I will give to sit with me in my throne."—Apoc. 3:21.

What, must we look upon God as a tyrant, who should take pleasure in our sufferings? He does take pleasure in punishing us, hut exactly the same pleasure as a father takes in correcting his son, he does not take pleasure in the pain which he inflicts, but in the amendment it will work. "My son, reject not the correction of the Lord; and do not faint when thou art chastised by him, for whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth and as a father in the son, he pleaseth himself."—Prov. 3:11, 12. He chastises you, because he loves you, it is not that he wishes to see you afflicted but converted; and if he takes pleasure in your suffering, he does so in as much, as it is an instrument of conversion, just as a father who chastises his son, derives pleasure, not from the affliction of his son, but from the amendment which he hopes to see in him, and which will prevent him from working his own ruin. Chastisement, makes us return to God, says St. Chrysostom: "Poenae nos ad Deum perducunt;" and it is to this end God inflicts it, in order that we may not stay away from him.

Why then, my brethren, do you complain of God when in tribulation? You ought to thank him prostrate on the earth; tell me now, if a man condemned to die, were to have his sentence changed by the prince from death into one hour's imprisonment and if he were to complain of that one hour, would his complaint be justifiable? Oh, would he not rather deserve, that the prince should reverse the last sentence and condemn him a second time to death? You have long and often deserved hell by your sins. And do you know all that the word hell conveys? Know, that it is more dreadful to suffer for one moment in hell, than to suffer for an hundred years the most frightful torments which the martyrs have suffered on earth; and in this hell, you should have had to suffer during all eternity. And yet, you complain if God send you some tribulation, some infirmity, some loss. Thank God, and say: Lord, this chastisement is trifling compared with my sins. I ought to have been in hell burning, deserted by all and in despair: I thank you for having called me to yourself by this tribulation which you have sent me. God, says Oleastro, often calls sinners to repentance by temporal chastisements: "Paena est modus loquendi Dei quo culpam ostendit." By earthly chastisements the Lord shows us the immense punishment which our sins deserve; and therefore, afflicts us on this earth, that we may be converted and escape eternal flames. Wretched then, as we have been, wretched indeed is that sinner, who is left unpunished in this life, but still more wretched he, who admonished by affliction, does not amend. "Non est grave," says St. Basil, "plaga affici sed plaga. meliorum non affici." It is not a grievous thing to be afflicted by God, on this earth, after one has sinned; but it is very grievous not to be converted by the affliction sent, and to be like those of whom David speaks, who although visited by the divine chastisement, still sleep on in their sins. "At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, they have all slumbered."—Ps. 75:7. As if the sound of the scourges, and the thunders of God, instead of rousing them from their lethargy, served only to make them sleep more soundly. "I struck you, yet you returned not to me."—Amos. 4:9. I have scourged you says God, in order that you might return to me; but ye, ungrateful that you are, have been deaf to my calls. Unhappy the sinner, who acts like him, of whom the Lord says, "he shall send lightnings against him his heart shall be as hard as a stone and as firm as a smith's anvil."—Job. 41:14, 15. God visits him with chastisement and he, instead of being softened; and returning to the Lord by penance, shall be "as firm as a smith's anvil," he shall grow more hardened under the blows of God, as the anvil grows continually harder under the hammer of the smith; and shall become like the impious Achaz, of whom the scripture says, " in the time of his distress, he increased contempt against the Lord."—Parall. 28:22. Unhappy man, instead of humbling himself, he the more despised the Lord.

Do you know what more happens to these rash beings? They begin to suffer hell, even in this life. "He shall rain snares upon the sinners; fire and brimstone and storms of wind shall be the portion of their cup."—Ps. 10:7. The Lord shall rain upon them his chastisement, sickness, misery and every bitterness; but this is not the entire, it is only a portion of their cup, that is, of their chastisement. "The Lord says, 'the portion' only of their cup;" observes St. Gregory, because their suffering begins here indeed; but shall be continued throughout eternity." He deserves all this, who being afflicted by the Lord for his conversion, continues to earn chastisement and provoke the Lord to greater wrath. "In flagellis positum," says St. Austin: "flagellis digna committere, est scevientem acrius ad iracundum concitare." What can I do, O sinner! to work your conversion? will the Lord then say. I have called you by sermons and inspirations and you have despised them, I have called you by favours and you have grown more insolent, I have called you by scourges and you continue to offend me. "For what shall I strike you any more, you that increase transgression and the daughter of Sion shall be left as a city that is laid waste."—Isa. 1:5, 8. Do you not wish to hearken even to my chastisements? Do you wish that I should abandon you? I shall be obliged to do it if you do not amend.

My brethren, let us no longer abuse the mercy which God uses towards us. Let not be like the nettle, which stings him who strikes it. God afflicts us, because he loves us, and wishes to see us reformed: "Optima consideratio," says Oleastro, "cum senseris poenam, culpae memenisse." When we feel the chastisement, we should bethink us of our sins and say with the brethren of Joseph, "we deserve to suffer these things, because we have sinned against our brother"—Gen. 47:21. Lord, you punish us justly, because we have offended you, our father and God. "Thou art just, O God! and thy judgment is right."—Ps. 118:137, "everything thou hast done to us, thou hast done in true judgment."—Dan. 3:31. Lord, thou art just and dost with justice punish us, we accept this tribulation which you send us, give us strength to suffer it with patience. And here we should do well to remember, what God once said to a nun: "You have sinned, you must do penance, you must pray."—Disingan. de Teres. Parola. 3. sec. 6. Some sinners are satisfied, with recommending themselves to the servants of God, but they must moreover pray and do penance. Let us do so, because when the Lord shall see our resignation, he will not only forgive our sins, but even remit the chastisement; and if God continues to afflict us, let us have recourse to that Lady, who is called the consolatrix of the afflicted. All the saints compassionate us in our sufferings, but there is not of them, as St. Antoninus says, who feels so much for us as this divine mother Mary: "Non reperitur aliquis sanctorum ita nobis compati in infirmatatibus sicut mulier haec B. Virgo Maria." And Eichard of St. Lorenzo adds, that this mother of mercy cannot behold unhappy sufferers, without succouring them. "Non potest miserias scire et non subvenire."

SERMON THE EIGHTH

PRAYERS APPEASE GOD AND AVERT FROM US THE CHASTISEMENT WE DESERVE, PROVIDED WE PURPOSE TO AMEND

"Petite et accepietis, quaerite et invenietis."

" Ask and you shall receive, seek and you shall find." John 16:24.

HE who has a good heart, cannot but feel compassion for the afflicted, and wish to see all men happy. But, who has a heart as good as the Lord's? He by his nature is infinite goodness, whence it is, that God by his nature has an extreme desire to deliver us from every evil and render us happy in all things, nay, even partakers of his own happiness. He wishes, therefore, that for our greater good, we beg of him the graces which we stand in need of, that we may be spared the chastisement which we deserve and arrive at life everlasting. Hence, he has promised to hear the prayers of him who prays to him, with hope in his goodness. "Petite et accipietis." But, to come at once to the subject of our discourse: God is appeased by prayers and led to withdraw the chastisement which we deserve, provided we purpose to amend.

God wishes that we should all be saved, as the apostle assures us, God, "who will have all men to be saved."—1 Tim. 2:4. And although he sees so many sinners who deserve hell, he does not wish that any of them should be lost, but that they should be restored to his grace by penance, and be saved. "Not willing that any should perish, but that all should return to penance."—2 Peter 3:9. But before delivering us from the punishment we have deserved and dispensing his graces, he wishes to be sought in prayer. "By prayer," says St. Laurence Justinian, "the wrath of God is suspended, his vengeance is delayed and pardon finally procured." O how great are not the promises which God makes to him who prays. "Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will deliver thee," 49:15. "cry to me and I will hear thee."—Jer. 33:3. "You shall ask whatever you will and it shall be done unto you."—John 15:7. Theodoret says, that prayer is one only instrument, but that it can effect all things: "Oratio cum sit una, omnia potest." And let us bear mind, my brethren, that when we pray and ask things conducive to salvation, not even our sins can prevent our receiving the graces which we beg.—"For, every one that asketh receiveth."—Matt. 7:8. Jesus Christ here says, that whoever asks, be he just or in sin, shall receive. Wherefore, did David say, "For thou, O Lord, art sweet and mild and plenteous in mercy to all that call upon thee."—Ps. 85:5. Hence, the Apostle St. James, in order to excite us to prayer, tells us: "But if any of you want wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men abundantly, and upbraideth not."—James 1:5. When God is solicited, he gives more than is asked of him, he "giveth to all men abundantly. When one man asks a favour of another whom he may have formerly injured, the latter usually reproaches him with the injury that had been done him; but not so God, he never "upbraideth." When we beg of him some grace for the good of our souls, he never reproaches us with the offences which we have committed against him; but he hears us, and consoles us as though we had always served him faithfully. "Hitherto you have not asked anything in my name," said the Lord one day to his disciples, and to-day he says the same thing to us: "Ask and you shall receive, that your joy may be full."—John 16:24. As if he were to say, why do you complain of me? You have only yourselves to blame—you have not asked graces of me, and therefore you have not received them. Ask of me, henceforward, what you please and it shall be granted you; and if you have not merit sufficient to obtain it, ask it of my Father in my name; that is, through my merits, and whatever it be, I promise you that you shall obtain it. "Amen, amen, I say to you; if you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it to you."—John 16:23. The princes of the earth, says St. John Chrysostom, give audience only to a few, and that seldom; but access can always be had to God by everyone, at all times and with certainty of a favourable hearing. "Aures principis paucis patent, Dei vero omnibus volentibus." Rely, then, upon these great promises, so often repeated by the Lord in the Scriptures; and let us ever be attentive to beg of him those graces which are necessary for salvation, namely, the pardon of our sins, perseverance in his grace, his holy love, resignation to his divine will, a happy death, and Paradise. By prayer, we shall attain all; without prayer, we shall have nothing. What the Holy Fathers and theologians commonly say, namely, that prayer is necessary to adults, as a means of salvation, comes to this, that it is impossible for anyone to be saved without prayer. Lessius wisely says, that it ought to be of faith, that without prayer salvation is impossible. "Fide tenendum est orationem adultis ad salutem necessariam esse." And this is clearly to be drawn from the Scriptures, which say: "Ask and you shall receive: for, as he who seeks, obtains, says St. Theresa, he who does not seek, does not obtain. "Pray, that ye enter not into temptation."—Matt. 26:41. "We ought always to pray."—Luke 18. The words "seek" and "pray" and "we ought," according to the opinions of most theologians, along with St. Thomas, imply a precept binding under pain of mortal sin. Let us pray, then and pray with great confidence—confidence in what? In that divine promise by which God has made himself our debtor. "Promittendo debitorem se facit." He has promised; he cannot be wanting to his promise; let us seek and hope and we must be saved. "No one hath hoped in the Lord and hath been confounded."—Eccl. 2:11. There never has been and never will be found any one to hope in the Lord and be lost, as the prophet assures us: "he is the protector of all that trust in him." But how comes it then, that some persons ask graces and do not obtain them? St. James answers that it is because they ask ill. "You ask and receive not, because you ask amiss."—James 4:3. You must not only ask and hope, but ask and hope as you ought, which brings us to the second point.

God has all the desire to deliver us from every evil and to share his blessings with us, as I said in the beginning, but he wishes to be sought in prayer and prayed to as he should, in order that we should be heard. How can God think of hearing that sinner who prays to him that he may be freed from his afflictions, whilst he is unwilling to abandon sin, which is the cause of his afflictions. When the impious Jeroboam stretched out his hand against the prophet, who reproached him with his wretchedness, the Lord caused his hand to wither up, so that he could not draw it back. "And his hand which he stretched forth against him withered and he was not able to draw it back again to him."—3 Kings 13:4. Then the king turned to the man of God and besought him to beg of the Lord to restore his hand to him. Theodoret says, with regard to this circumstance, "fool that he was to have asked the prophet's prayers for the restoration of his hand and not for pardon of his sins." Thus do many act; they beg of God to deliver them from their afflictions, they beg of the servants of God to avert by their prayers the threatened chastisements, but they do not seek to obtain the grace of abandoning their sins and changing their lives. And, how can such persons hope to be freed from the chastisement, when they will not remove its cause. What is it arms the hand of the Lord with thunders to chastise and afflict us? Oh, it is accursed sin! "census peccati poena," says Tertullian. The afflictions we suffer, are a fine which must be paid by him whom sin has subjected to the penalty. St. Basil, in like manner says, that sin is a note of hand which we give against ourselves: "Est chirographum quoddam contra nos." Since we sin, we voluntarily go in debt to God's justice. It is not God then, who makes us miserable, it is sin. Sin it is which obliges God to create chastisements, "famine and affliction, and scourges, all things are created for the wicked."—Eccl. 40:9, 10.

Jeremiah, addressing the divine vengeance, says, "O thou sword of the Lord, how long will thou not be quiet? Go into thy scabbard, rest and be still."—Jerem. 47:6. But then, he goes on to say, "How shall it be quiet when the Lord hath given it a charge against Ascalon? How can the sword of the Lord ever be quiet, if sinners do not choose to abandon their sin, notwithstanding that the Lord has given a charge to his sword, to execute vengeance as long as sinners shall continue to deserve it. But some will say, we make novenas, we fast, we give alms, we pray to God, why are we not heard? To them the Lord replies, "When they fast, I will not hear their prayers, and when they offer holocausts and victims, I will not receive them, for I will consume them by the sword, and by famine, and by pestilence."—Jer. 14:12. How, exclaims the Lord! how can I hear the prayers of those who beg to be freed from their afflictions and not from their sins, because they do not wish to reform. What care I for their fasts and their sacrifices and their alms, when they will not change their lives. "I will consume them by the sword." With all their prayers, and devotions, and penitential exercises, I shall be obliged, by my justice, to punish them.

Let us not then, my brethren, trust to prayers or other devotions, unaccompanied by a resolution to amend. You pray, you smite your breast and call for mercy, but that is not enough. The impious Antiochus prayed, but the scriptures say, that his prayers failed to obtain mercy from God. "Then this wicked man prayed to the Lord, of whom he was not to obtain mercy."—2 Mach. 9:13. The unhappy man, finding himself devoured by worms and near his end, prayed for life, but without having sorrow for his sins. Neither let us trust in our holy protectors, if we do not purpose to amend. Some say we have our patron, or some other saint who will defend us; we have our mother, Mary, to procure our deliverance. "Who hath shewed you to flee from the wrath to come? and think not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham for our Father."—Matt. 3:7, 9. How can we think to escape punishment, if we do not abandon sin? How can the saints think of assisting us, if we persist in exasperating the Lord? St. Chrysostom says, of what use was Jeremiah to the Jews? "Quid profuit Jeremiah Judaeis." The Jews had Jeremiah to pray for them, but, notwithstanding all the prayers of that holy prophet, they received the chastisement, because they did not wish to give up their sins. Beyond doubt, says the holy doctor, the prayers of the saints contribute much to obtain the divine mercy for us, but when? when we do penance: "Prosunt plurimum, sed quando aliquid agimus." They are useful, but only when we do ourselves violence to abandon sin, to fly occasions and return to God's favour. The emperor Foca, in order to defend himself from his enemies, raised walls and multiplied fortifications, but he heard a voice saying to him from heaven, "you build walls, but when the enemy is within, the city is .easily taken." We must then expel this enemy, which is sin, from our souls, otherwise God cannot exempt us from chastisement because he is just and cannot leave sin unpunished. Another time the citizens of Antioch prayed to Mary, to avert from them a scourge which overhung them; and whilst they were praying, St. Bertoldus heard the divine mother replying from heaven, "Abandon your sins and I shall be propitious to you." Let us then beg of the Lord to use mercy towards us, but let us pray as David prayed: "Lord incline unto my aid." God wishes to aid us, but he wishes that we should aid ourselves, by doing all that depends upon us. "He who desires to be assisted," says Ilatero, "must do all that he can to assist himself." God wishes to save us, but we must not imagine that God will do all without our doing anything. St. Austin says, "he who created you without your help, will not save you without your help." What do you expect sinful brother? That God will bring you to Paradise with all your sins upon you? Do you continue to draw down upon you the divine scourges and yet hope to be delivered from them? Must God save you while you persist in damning yourself?

If we purpose truly to turn to God, then let us pray to him and rejoice; even though the sins of the entire world were ours, we should be heard as I said to you in the beginning. Everyone who prays with a purpose of amendment, obtains mercy; "Omnis qui petit accipit." Let our prayers be in the name of Jesus Christ, who has promised that the Eternal Father will grant us everything we ask in his name; that is, through his merits. "If you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it to you." Let us pray and never cease from prayer; thus we shall obtain every grace and save ourselves. It is to this we are exhorted by St. Bernard, who tells us to pray to God through the intercession of Mary: "Let us seek grace and seek it through Mary; because he who seeks through her, obtains his request and cannot be disappointed.—De. Aquaed. Mary, when she is prayed to by us, certainly pleads for us with her Son; and when Mary prays for us, she obtains what she demands and her prayer cannot be refused by a son who loves her so much.

SERMON THE NINTH

MOST HOLY MARY IS THE MEDIATRIX OF SINNERS

"Ego murus et ubera mea sicut turris; ex quo factus sum corameo quasi pacem reperiens."

"I am a wall and my breasts are as a tower, since I am become in his presence as one finding peace."—Cant. 8:10.

DIVINE grace is an infinite treasure, because it makes us friends of God. "For she is an infinite treasure to men, which they that use become the friends of God."—Wisd. 7:14. Hence it follows, that if there cannot be a greater happiness than to enjoy the grace of God, there cannot be a greater misery than to incur his displeasure by sin, which makes us his enemies. "But to God the wicked and his wickedness are hateful alike."—Wisd. 14:9. But if, my brethren, any of you have had the misfortune to forfeit this divine grace by sin, do not despair, but console yourselves with the reflection, that you have in Jesus Christ himself a mediator, who can obtain pardon for you and restore you the grace you have lost. "And he is the propitiation for our sins."—1 John 2:2. What have you to fear, says St. Bernard, when you can have recourse to so great a mediator? He can do all things with his Eternal Father. "Jesum tibi dedit mediatorem; quid apud Patrem talis Alius non obtineat?"—Serm. de aquaed. He has satisfied the divine justice for you, continues the holy abbot and has nailed your sins to the cross, having taken them away from your soul. "Quid timetis modicae fidei? peccata affixit cruce suis manibus." But if, notwithstanding all this, you fear to approach Jesus Christ on account of his divine majesty, God has given you another advocate with his Son and that advocate is Mary. "Sed forsitan et in ipsam majestatem vereare divinam; advocatum habere vis apud ipsum? Recurre ad Mariam."

Thus Mary has been given to the world as a mediatrix between God and sinners. Hear the words which the Holy Ghost makes her speak in the divine canticles: "I am a wall and my breasts are as a tower, since I am become in his presence as one finding peace." I am, she says, the refuge of those who fly to me; my breasts, that is my mercy, are like a tower of defence to everyone who has recourse to me; and he who is the enemy of God, let him know that I am the mediatrix of peace between God and sinners. "Ipsa reperit pacem inimicis, vitam perditis salutem desperatis," says Cardinal Ugon. For this reason is Mary called, "beautiful as the curtains of Solomon."—Cant. 1:4. In the tents of David naught was to be heard of but war; in the tents of Solomon naught is spoken of but peace. By this we are to understand, that Mary has no other ministry in heaven than that of peace and pardon. Hence St Andrew Avillino calls her the pleader of Paradise, but what are those occupations in which Mary is engaged? "Mary," says the venerable Bede, "stands in the presence of her son, praying unceasingly for sinners." And the blessed Amadeo says, that" Mary, all-powerful by her prayers, stands before the face of God, continually interceding for us " Thus Mary never ceases to implore of God by her all-powerful prayers all graces for us, if we do not refuse them. And are there any found to refuse the graces solicited for them by this divine Mother? Yes, there are found such—yes, those who will not abandon sin, who will not give up this friendship, this occasion; who will not restore their neighbour's property—those are they who will not receive the graces begged for them by Mary, because Mary wishes to obtain for them the grace of breaking off this connexion, of flying this occasion of weakness and they will not do it. And such as will not do it, positively refuses the grace sought for them by Mary. She from heaven sees well all our miseries and clangers; and oh, how deeply is she not touched with compassion for us! With what motherly affection is she not always endeavouring to assist us! "Videt enim, nostra discrimina," continues the blessed Amadeo, "nostrique clemens Domina materno affectu miseretur."

One day St. Bridget heard Jesus Christ saying to Mary: "Mother, ask of me what you will." And Mary replying to him: "I ask mercy for the unfortunate."—Rev. lib. 1:100, 46. As if she were to say to him, Son, since you have made me the Mother of Mercy and Advocate of Sinners, can I ask aught else of you than mercy for the unhappy? In a word, St. Austin says, that amongst all the saints, we have not one who is so solicitous for our salvation as Mary: "Unam ac te solam pro nobis in coelo fatemur esse sollicitam."—Ap. S. Bon. in Spech. lec. 6.

Isaiah complains in his day as follows: "Behold, thou art angry there is none who riseth up and taketh hold of thee."—Isai. 64:5, 7. Lord, said the prophet, you are justly angry with us for our sins and there is no one to appease you, or draw you from chastising us. St. Bonaventure says, that the prophet had reason to speak thus, since there was no Mary then: "Ante Mariam non fuit qui sic Deum retinere auderet."—In spec cap. 12. But at present, if Jesus Christ wishes to chastise a sinner and the sinner recommend himself to Mary, she by her prayers for him restrains her son, and averts the chastisement from him. "Detinet filium ne percutiat," there is no one he says, so well able to hold back the sword of the Lord, "nemo tam idoneus qui Domini gladio manus objiciat." Justly, then, did St. Andrew call Mary the peace of the Lord with men: "Salve divina cum hominibus reconciliatio."—Orat. 2, de Ass. And St. Justin called her the "Arbitress," saying, "Verbum usum est virgine sequestra." "Sequestra" signifies an arbitress, to whose decision disputants bind themselves to yield. By which St. Justin means to say, that Jesus lays before Mary all his reasons for punishing such a sinner, that she may negotiate a peace; and the sinner, on the other side, places himself in her hands. Thus Mary, on the one side, obtains for the sinner the grace of amendment and penance on the other; he obtains pardon for him of her son and thus it is concluded. Such is the ministry in the exercise of which Mary is continually occupied.

When Noah judged that the deluge ought to have ceased, he dismissed the dove from the ark. She returned with a branch of olive, significant of the peace which God had concluded with the world. This dove was a figure of Mary. "Tu es ilia," says St. Bonaventure, "fidelissima columba Noe, quae inter Deum et mundum spirituali diluvio submersum mediatrix fidelissima extitisti." You, O Mary! are the dove all-faithful to him who invokes you—you are the dove who interceding with God, have obtained for us peace and salvation. "Per te pax coelestis donata est," says St. Epiphanius. The author of the Poemerium enquires how it happens that in the Old Law, the Lord was so vigorous in his chastisements, of universal deluge, of fire from heaven, of fiery serpents and such like punishments; whereas, he now deals so mercifully with us, who have sinned more grievously than those of old? "Quare parcit nunc mundo ipse Deus qui olim multo his minora peccata gravius punivit?" And he answers, he does it all through love of Mary, who intercedes for us. "Totum hoc facit propter beatam Virginem."—Ap. P. Pepe. Grand. etc. "O how long since should the earth have been destroyed!" says St. Fulgentus, "if Mary had not interposed." Wherefore the church wishes that we should call this divine Mother our hope. "Spes nostra salve." The impious Luther could not endure that the church should teach us to call Mary our hope. He said that our hope ought to rest in God alone—not in the creature; and that God curses him who places his confidence in creatures: "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man."—Jer. 17:5. True; but that is understood of those who trust in creatures, in contempt of God, or independently of him. But we hope in Mary, as our mediatrix with the Lord. In the same manner as Jesus is our mediator of right with his Eternal Father, because by the merits of his passion he obtains pardon for penitent sinners, so Mary is mediatrix by divine favour with her son and is such a mediatrix that her son grants her every request; nay that he wishes that every grace should pass through her hands. "The Lord," says St. Bernard, "has placed in Mary the plentitude of all good; so that if aught of hope, or grace, or salvation, is in us, we know that we derive it from Mary."—Serm. de aquaed. The Lord has confided to Mary the treasure of mercies which he wishes to have dealt out to us and therefore wishes that we should acknowledge every grace as coming through her. Whence the saint calls her his chief confidence and the principal ground of his hope.

"Hose maxima mea fiducia hoec tota ratio spei meae." For which reason he exhorts us to look for grace always through the intercession of Mary. "Quoeremus gratiam et per Mariam quoeremus." And for the same reason the church, in despite of Luther, calls Mary our hope, "Spes nostra salve."

Hence also do the saints call Mary the ladder, the moon and the city of refuge. She is called by St. Bernard the ladder of sinners: "Hoec scala peccatorum." It is sin which separates us from God. "But your iniquities have divided between you and your God."—Isa. 59:2. A soul in the state of grace is in union with God and God in union with it. "He that abideth in charity, abideth in God, and God in him."—1 John 4:16. But when the soul turns her back upon God, then is she separated from him—plunged into an abyss of misery and as far removed from him, as sin itself. But when shall this wretched soul find a ladder by which to mount once more to God and be again united to him? Mary is that ladder, to whom, if the sinner have recourse, no matter what his misery, or how great the filth of sins, he can come out of the pit of perdition. "You," says St. Bernard, "do not abhor the sinner, however loathsome he be; if he once sigh to you, you reach him your hand to draw him out of the gulph of despair."—Orat. paneg. ad B. V. For the same reason is she called the moon; "Fair as the moon."—Cant. 6:9. "As the moon," says St. Bernard, "is placed between the sun and earth, so is Mary stationed between God and us, to pour out his graces continually upon us."—Serm. 14. de Nat. Dom. Hence, also, she is called the city of refuge, as she is made to call herself by St. John Damascene: "Ego civitas omnium ad me confugientium." In the ancient law there were five cities of sanctuary; to which, if any one fled, he was secure of not being pursued by justice, no matter what his crime. At present we have not so many cities of sanctuary—we have only Mary, to whom if any one shall have fled, he may rest secure of not being pursued by the divine justice. In the cities of the old law, every delinquent was not secure, nor could all his crimes escape unpunished; but Mary is a city of refuge, which receives every criminal. "There is no one so much cast off by God," said this blessed Mother to St. Bridget, "who, if he have recourse to me, shall not return to God, and receive pardon."—Rev. lib. 1. cap. 6.

Mary, so far from disdaining to assist sinners, prides herself upon the function of advocate of sinners, so that she is related to have said to the venerable sister, Mary Villain, "next to my dignity of mother of God, there is nothing which I so much value as my office of advocate of sinners." "To this end," says Idiota, who takes it from St. John Chrysostom, "have you been chosen from eternity mother of God, that those whose sins should exclude them from participation in the merits of your Son, might be made partakers of them by your intercession." This was the principal office for the fulfilment of which God created her, and placed her in the world: "feed thy kids."—Cant. 1,7. By kids he means sinners and those kids are given in care to Mary, in order that they, who, on the day of judgment, should, by their sins have deserved to stand upon the left, may, by her intercession, stand upon the right. "Feed thy kids," says William of Paris, "whom thou shalt convert into sheep, that they who should have been placed to the left, may, through thy intercession, take their stand upon the right." But we must not forget to notice what has been said upon this passage by William of England: "feed thy kids." Who are the kids of Mary? "these sinners," he says, "who pay her no devotion, who do not beg of her to obtain their conversion, are not the kids of Mary and shall be placed on the left." St. Bridget one day heard Jesus Christ saying to his mother, "you give assistance to everyone endeavouring to rise to God." Mary assists everyone who does himself violence to leave his evil life and turn to God, or at least, prays to her that he may receive strength to do so; if he have not that desire, the divine mother herself cannot assist him. Mary then assists only those sinners who honour her by some special devotion and who, if they yet remain in disgrace with God, have recourse to her, that she may obtain pardon for them and work their deliverance from their present infernal condition. The sinner who acts thus from his heart is secure, because Mary, as we have said before, has been, therefore, created that she might have charge of sinners and lead them to God. The Lord revealed this to St. Catherine of Sienna: "Haec est a me electa tanquam esca dulcissima ad capiendos hominos, potissimum peccatores."—Ap. Bios. mon. spir. And the blessed mother herself said to Saint Bridget, that as the magnet attracts iron, so she draws the hard hearts of men to herself and to God. "Sicut magnes attrahit ferrum sic ego attraho dura corda."—Rev. lib. 3. cap. 32. But we must always bear in mind that these hearts, notwithstanding their hardness, must desire liberation from their unhappy state. Ah, if all had recourse to Mary with, at least this desire, she would procure salvation for all. "What fear of damnation should that man feel," says the Abbot Adam, "to whom Mary offers herself for a mother and an advocate?" He enquires again, "could it be possible that you, the mother of mercy, should not intercede with the Redeemer for the soul he has redeemed?" He lastly makes answer: "Ah, you must intercede, because God who placed his Son mediator between man and heaven, has placed you mediator between his Son and guilty man."

Then sinner, says St. Bernard, give thanks to him who has provided you with such a mediatrix: "Age gratias ei, qui talem tibi mediatricem providit."—Serm. in sign. mag. Thank your God, who, in order to manifest his mercy towards you, has given you not only his Son for a mediator in his own right, but that you might have more confidence; has given you Mary as a mediatrix with that Son. Therefore it is, St. Austin calls her the only hope of sinners. "Spes unica peccatorum." And St. Bonaventure: "If by reason of your iniquities you see the Lord in anger and fear to approach him, have recourse to the hope of sinners, who is Mary. She will not reject you because you are too wretched; "it is her office to assist the wretched." And William of Paris says exactly the same: "It is thy office to place thyself between God and man."—Cap. 18. de Reth. lib. Hence, when we have recourse to Mary, let everyone say to her with Saint Thomas of Villanova: "Ah, therefore, thou our advocate fulfil thy office." Since you are mother of God and advocate of the wretched, assist me who am so wretched, if you do not assist me, I am lost; and let us proceed to address her in the words of St. Bernard: " Remember, O most pious virgin, that from the beginning, etc. etc." I do not wish to be the first unhappy man who shall have had recourse to you and yet be abandoned by you.

SERMON THE TENTH

FOR THE FEAST OF ST. JOSEPH

GOD, through the great love which he bears us and the great desire which he has for our salvation, has added to the other means of salvation which he has offered us, that of devotion to the saints, whom, as being his friends, he wishes to intercede for us, and procure for us by their prayers those graces which we do not deserve ourselves. And this is not because the merits of Jesus Christ are not superabundantly sufficient to obtain every grace for us, but because he wishes to honour his faithful servants, by making them co-operators in the work of our salvation and on the other hand to give us a greater assurance of obtaining graces by means of his saints. But who does not know that amongst all the saints, Joseph is the most dear to God after the divine mother and most powerful to obtain graces from God for those who implore his intercession.—Hence, our discourse divides itself into two points. We shall consider in the first, how strongly the dignity of St. Joseph should engage us to revere him; and in the second, how greatly we should confide in the protection of St. Joseph, by reason of his sanctity.

FIRST POINT

Most assuredly we ought to honour St Joseph, since Jesus Christ himself has honoured him by calling him his Father. "Christ," says Origen, "paid to Joseph the honour due to a father."—Orig. hom. 17. in Luc. cap. 2. And he bore the name of father in the gospel. "And his father and mother were wondering at these things which were spoken concerning him."—Luke 2:23. He is so styled by the divine mother also: "Behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing."—Ibid. 2:48. If then, the King of Kings has raised him to such an honour, it is meet and just that we should honour him as much as in us lies. "Ab hominibus valde honorandus quern Rex Regum sic voluit extollere."—Card. Camer. tract. de S. Joseph. What angel, or what other saint has been thought worthy to be called the father of the Son of God? "Nomine patris neque angelus neque sanctus meruit appellari: hoc unus Joseph potuit nuncupari." Hence, we may well apply to St. Joseph the words of St. Paul: "being made so much better than the angels, as he has inherited a more excellent name than they."—Heb. 1:4. By this name of Father, God has conferred more honour upon Joseph than upon all the patriarchs and prophets and apostles and bishops; these he calls his servants, Joseph only did he style his father.

And now behold him as father, constituted head of that little family, small in point of numbers, but great, by the reason of the two great persons it contained, namely, the mother of God and the only Son of God, made man: " He made him master of his house."—Ps. 104, 21. In the house of that blessed family he was Lord and the Son of God was obedient to him; "and he was subject to him."—Luke 2:25. "This subjection," says Jerson, "denotes at once the great humility of Christ, and the great dignity of Joseph."—Serm. de nat. virg. "And what greater dignity can there be," pursues the same person, "than to command him who has it written upon his thigh, that he is the King of Kings and the Lord of Lords?"

Josue astonished the world when he commanded the sun to stop, that he might have time to defeat his enemies and was obeyed by him. "The Lord obeying the voice of a man."—Jos. 10:14. But, what comparison can there be between the obedience of the sun (which is an inanimate creature,) to Josue and the obedience of Jesus Christ, who is the Son of God to Joseph? Jesus Christ, as long as Joseph lived, respected and obeyed him as a father; his obedience lasted for thirty years.

"He was subject to them:" so that during so many years the Saviour was occupied solely in obeying Joseph. To Joseph, during all that time, fell the office of ordering all things as head of the family; and the part of Jesus was to obey, as being subject to Joseph, whom God placed over him with the authority of father. Hence, Jesus did nothing, never moved a step, or tasted food, or went to rest, but according to the directions of Joseph; and was, on the other hand, all attention and obedience to my commands. The Lord revealed this to St. Bridget in the following words: "My Son was so obedient, that when Joseph said, do this, or that, he at once did it."—Lib. 6. Revel. cap. 58. Hence, Jerson writes, "he often prepares their meals, cleanses the vessels, or draws water at the fountain."—In Joseph dest. 3. St. Bernard, speaking of Joseph, calls him "The faithful and prudent servant whom the Lord appointed the comfort of his mother, the foster-father of his humanity and his chief earthly coadjutor in his great design."—Hom. 2. sup. miss. Not only then was Joseph destined to be the consolation of the mother of God in her many tribulations and the nursing father of Jesus, but in a certain sense to co-operate with him in the redemption of the world, which was the design occupying the councils of the three divine persons. God having given him the place of father over his Son, entrusted to him the care of his support and defence: "Take the child," as if he were to say to him in the words of the psalmist, "to thee is the poor man left."—Ps. 10:14. Joseph I have committed to your charge my Son upon this earth; I have given him to you poor, humble, without riches, without splendour, or apparent greatness, he is called the Son of a carpenter ("Is not this the carpenter's Son?"—Matt. 13:55.) from your humble calling; because I have wished you to be poor as holding the place of father towards my Son, who is poor and who has come into the world, not to rule there, but to suffer and to die for man's salvation. You then shall be his guardian and his father in my place; "to thee is the poor man left." I resign him into your hands; he shall be persecuted and you shall share his persecution; take care of him, be faithful to me. "And therefore," says St. John Damascene, "did he give to Joseph the love, the vigilance and the authority of a father." He gave to him the affection of a father, in order that he might guard him with the tenderest love and the vigilance of a father, that he might guard him with all watchfulness, and the authority of a father to secure him obedience in all the arrangements he should make for our Lord.

Having, as St. Bernard says, made him a co-operator in the work of our redemption, he wishes him to be present at the birth of our Lord, in order that he might be the faithful witness of the glory which the angels gave to God at the birth of his Son, as had been revealed to the shepherds, who disclosed it to Mary and Joseph when they came to visit the Saviour who had been announced to them; he was moreover witness of the visit of the Magi, who, led by the star, came from the east to adore the heavenly infant, as they themselves declared; "for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to adore him."—Matt. 2:2. God wished that Joseph should, jointly with Mary, present to him the child; "they carried him to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord."—Luke 2:22. Yielding him up to death for the salvation of the world, according to the scriptures, the predictions contained in which, relative to the passion of Jesus Christ, were always , known to Joseph and Mary.

Next, the Lord seeing that Herod, through fear of losing his kingdom, sought to take the life of the divine infant, commanded Joseph by an angel, to take the child and his mother and fly into Egypt. "Arise and take the child and his mother and fly into Egypt and be there until I shall tell you, for it will come to pass that Herod will seek the child to destroy him."—Matt. 2:13. Behold, Joseph in obedience to the voice of God, on that very night (for so the commentators will have it,) takes the child and his Mother and sets off for Egypt. Joseph, without loss of time, gathers up what implements of trade he can bring along with him, on which his poor family depends for support; Mary, on the other hand, takes her infant, with his scanty. clothes and both set off without servant or companion, unprovided pilgrims, to cross the many dreary—deserts which lay between them and Egypt, where they had neither friend nor relative, and had to meet a barbarous and unknown race of people. Joseph upon his arrival, laboured night and day, as St. Bernard says, for the support of his holy spouse and the divine infant. After a time he leaves Egypt in obedience to the new command received from the angel, who says to him, "arise and take the child and his mother and go unto the land of Israel."—Matt. 2:20. Upon leaving Egypt, he directs his steps towards Judea, but being again warned by the angel not to live there, as Archelaus the son of Herod reigned then in his father's room, he withdrew to Nazareth in Galilee, where he dwelt till his death, in the company of his beloved Jesus, continuing to earn a poor subsistence by his humble trade.

It happened after some time, that going with Mary and Jesus then twelve years old, to visit the temple, he found upon his return when he met Mary, that Jesus whom he believed to be with her had been missing for three days, he did nothing else than weep, not having near him Jesus who was the love of his heart; but what afflicted him most, was the fear that Jesus had left him on account of some offence which he had received from him, and which he thought had rendered him unworthy of being any longer the guardian of such a treasure, as Laspergio writes. But he was consoled by hearing from Jesus himself, that he remained in the temple about his father's business. Joseph continued thenceforward, to govern our Lord until his death, which he had the happiness of meeting between Jesus and Mary, who assisted him at that moment; whence St. Francis of Sales says, we may hold for certain that Joseph died of love, as did Mary his spouse.

SECOND POINT

We ought to confide greatly in the protection of Joseph, for his sanctity makes him very dear to God. In order to conceive the sanctity of Joseph, we have only to remember that he was chosen by God to fill the place of father towards Jesus Christ. St. Paul has those words, "who hath also made us fit ministers of the new testament."—Cor. 3:6. Which implies, as St. Thomas explains it, that when God chooses any person for an office, he gives all the graces necessary for the discharge of his duty therein. "Quando Deus quosdam ad aliquid eligit ita disponit ut ad id inveniantur idonei."—3 Prop. quse 27. art 4. God then having intended Joseph to fill the place of father over the incarnate word, was most assuredly bound to endow him with all the wisdom and holiness necessary for such an office. Nor should we doubt of his having enriched him with all the graces and privileges granted to the other saints; Gerson and Suarez say, that St. Joseph had three special privileges, first, that of having been sanctified in his mother's womb, like Jeremias and John the Baptist; secondly, of having been confirmed in grace and thirdly, of never having felt the motions of concupiscence, a privilege which St. Joseph, by the merits of his purity, is entitled to share with his clients, by freeing them from these same motions.

St. Joseph in the gospel is called just, "Joseph her husband being a just man."—Matt. 1:19. What is the meaning of a just man? It means, says St. Peter Chrysologus, a perfect man, a man who possesses every virtue. Joseph was holy before his marriage, but still more so after his union with the divine mother; the bare example of his holy spouse would have been sufficient to sanctify him. But if Mary, as St. Bernardine of Sienna says, is the dispensatrix of all the graces which God bestows on man, how profusely must she not have enriched her spouse with them, whom she so much loved and who loved her so well. How immensely must not the sanctity of Joseph have been increased by the conversation and familiarity of Jesus during the many years they lived together. If the two disciples who were going to Emmaus, found themselves influenced with love, in the few moments during which the Saviour walked and conversed with them, so as to say, "was not our heart burning within us whilst he spoke in the way?"—Luke 24:32. What a fire of holy charity must we not believe to have been enkindled in the heart of Joseph by thirty years conversation with Jesus Christ, by hearing constantly from him the word of life, by observing his perfect humility, patience and obedience, by seeing him so ready to assist him in his labours in everything which required to be done about the house? What a conflagration of divine love must not those torches of charity have spread in the breast of Joseph, a breast which was free from every earthly affection. It is true that he had a great love for his spouse Mary; but his was not a divided love, although, as the apostle says, the heart of the husband is usually divided. "But he that has a wife is solicitous for the things of the world, how he may please his wife and he is divided."—1 Cor. 7:33. No, the love which he felt for his spouse, filled him still more with divine love and therefore, we cannot doubt that Joseph whilst he lived with Jesus Christ, increased so much in sanctity and merits, that we may say he excels all the other saints.

The apostle writes that Jesus Christ, in the other world, "will render to every man according to his works."—Rom. 2:6. With what glory, think you, must he not have adorned Joseph, who so faithfully loved and served him on this earth? On the last day, the Saviour will say to his elect, "For I was hungry and you gave me to eat; I was thirsty and you gave me to drink; I was a stranger and you took me in; naked and you covered me."—Matt. 25:35. Those have fed and lodged and clothed Jesus Christ, in the person of the poor; but St. Joseph procured food and raiment and lodging, for Jesus Christ in person. Moreover, the Lord has promised a reward to whosoever gives a poor man a drop of cold water in his name. "For whosoever shall give you to drink a cup of water in my name amen, I say to you, he shall not lose his reward."—Mark 9:40. Who can tell what ought to be the reward of Joseph—of him, who can say to Jesus Christ, Lord, I have not only furnished you with food and raiment and lodging, but have even saved you from death, by rescuing you from the sword of Herod. All this should serve to increase our confidence in Joseph, by bringing us to the conclusion, that on account of all these merits, God cannot deny him any favour which he solicits for his clients.

St. Bernardine of Sienna says, "We may be assured that the same filial reverence and respectful familiarity with which Jesus Christ treated Joseph while on this earth, he not only does not deny him in heaven, but has rather increased towards him."—Serm. de S. Jos. Recollect, "reverence," and "familiarity." That Lord who on the earth reverenced St. Joseph as father, certainly denies him nothing in heaven. Besides this, although St. Joseph had no authority over the humanity of Jesus Christ, as natural father, yet he had it in a certain degree, as husband of Mary; who, as natural mother of the Saviour, had true authority over him, for he who has a right to the tree, has a right also to the fruit. On this account Jesus Christ respected Joseph on the earth and looked upon him as his superior. And on the very same account, his prayers are looked upon by Jesus as commands. "Dum Pater orat natum, velut imperium reputatur."—Serm. de S. Jos.

Let us hear what St. Bernard says of the power which Joseph has of his dispensing graces to his clients: "To some saints," he says, "it is given to protect us upon certain occasions, but to Joseph it is allowed to help us in every necessity and to defend all who fly to him." And what St. Bernard writes as his belief, St. Theresa confirms by her experience. "It appears," she says, "that to the other saints it is given to succour us in some one necessity; but we know from experience, that Joseph can succour us in every need." Let us rest assured of this, that as Jesus Christ on earth was subject to Joseph upon the earth, he is subject to him still in heaven, in this sense, that he grants his every request. Let us then imagine we hear the Lord addressing to each of us the words which Pharaoh spoke to the people during the time of the famine in Egypt: "Go to Joseph."—Gen. 41:55. Go to Joseph, if you desire to be consoled. By the mercy of the Lord, there are few Christians at present, who are not, to some extent, devout to St. Joseph; but those do assuredly receive most graces who have recourse to him most frequently and with greatest confidence. Wherefore let us not fail to recommend ourselves every day and night to St. Joseph, who, next to divine Mary, is most powerful with God. Let us not fail to address to him, each day, some special prayer; and let us increase our prayers during his novena, and let us fast upon his eve and beg favours of him; all of which he will obtain for us, provided they be useful to our souls. I exhort you to apply to him more especially for the three following graces, namely, pardon of your sins, love of Jesus Christ, and a good death. With regard to the pardon of your sins, look at the matter thus : if, while Jesus lived on earth with Joseph, a sinner wanted to obtain pardon of his sins, could he do better to insure a pardon than apply to Joseph ? If, then, we wish to obtain pardon, let us apply to Joseph, who is now more beloved of Jesus Christ than he was on earth. Let us, moreover, beg of St. Joseph to procure for us the love of Jesus Christ; and I, for my part, hold, that tender love for the Word Incarnate is a grace, the obtaining of which for us, belongs most specially to Joseph, by reason of the tender love which the saint bore towards him in this world. Lastly, let us beg of him to procure us the grace of a happy death; it is known to all that Joseph is the protector of the death-bed, because he had the happiness of dying between Jesus and Mary. Whence his clients ought to hope that at their death they shall see Jesus and Joseph coming to assist them. Of this there are many examples.

Moverio tells that in the year 1541, brother Alessio of Vigevand, a Capuchin lay brother being about to die, begged of the brethren to light some candles. They asked him why? he said, that he expected a visit from Joseph and most holy Mary in a few moments; scarcely had he so spoken when he exclaimed, behold Joseph and the queen of heaven; kneel brethren, to receive them, and having said this he tranquilly expired, on the nineteenth of March, the very day consecrated to St. Joseph. It is related by Father Patrignam (and he takes the account from St. Vincent Ferrer and other authors,) that a certain merchant in the city of Valenza, was in the habit of inviting every year upon his birth day, an old man and a woman with a child at her breast to his table, in honour of Jesus, Mary and Joseph. This devout man appeared after his death, to a person who was praying for him, and told him that he had been met in his passage by Jesus, Mary and Joseph, who said to him, you were in the habit of receiving us every year into your house, in the person of those poor people whom you brought to your table, we are now come to receive you into our house, and having so spoken they led him to paradise. It is related also in the "Leggendario Francescano," that the venerable sister Prudentsiana, who was very devout to St. Joseph, had the happiness of seeing the saint approach her death bed with Jesus in his arms, she would now speak to St. Joseph, now to Jesus and in this heavenly company she breathed out her soul." In the history of the discalced Carmelites, it is related of sister Anna di Sant Agostino, that when she was dying, some of the religious saw her assisted by St. Joseph and St. Theresa, and transported with joy; another religious, belonging to another convent saw her ascending to heaven between St. Theresa and St. Joseph. A religious of the order of St. Austin, as we learn from Father John de Allora, in his book upon St. Joseph, appeared to a companion of his and told him that he had been saved from hell by means of a particular devotion to St. Joseph and then mentioned that the saint, as reputed father of our Lord, was all powerful with him.

SERMON THE ELEVENTH

FOR THE FEAST OF THE ANNUNCIATION

"Et verbum caro factum est."

"And the word was made flesh."—John 1:14.

THE angelic doctor St. Thomas, calls the mystery of the incarnation of the eternal word, the miracle of miracles, "miraculum miraculorum." And what greater miracle could be exhibited to the world, than that of a woman becoming mother of God and a God clothed with human flesh. Let us, to-day, consider the following great prodigies.

First, Mary by her humility made mother of God; secondly, the Creator transformed by his goodness, into a son of the creature.

FIRST POINT

God having resolved to manifest to the world his immense goodness, by humbling himself so far as to become man, in order to redeem lost man; and being to choose a virgin for his mother, looked out for the most humble. He found that the Virgin Mary excelled all others as much in humility, as in sanctity and her he made choice of for his mother. "Because he hath regarded the humility of his handmaid."—Luke 1:48. "He does not say," writes St. Laurence Justinian, "that he regarded the virginity, or the innocence, but the humility of his handmaid; and before him St. Jerome said: "Maluit Deus de virgine incarnari propter humilitatem quem propter aliam virtutem." God preferred the virgin for his mother, on account of her humility more than any other virtue.

Let us now consider how Mary was prefigured in the Canticles, by the spikenard there spoken of. The spikenard is a small and lowly plant, but of sweet odour and thus did the odour of Mary's humility draw the King of Heaven from the bosom of his eternal Father, where he was reposing and bring him down to her womb, there to put—on human flesh. "While the King was at his repose, my spikenard sent forth the odour thereof."—Cant. 1:77. Hear how St. Austin explains the passage: "The spikenard is a lowly but fragrant herb and signifies the blessed Virgin, who exhaled the odour of humility." And before him, St. Bernard: "Truly worthy was she of the divine regard; truly worthy to attract the King of Heaven by her beauty and by her sweet odour to draw him from his repose in the bosom of the Father."—Serm. 4. de Ass. Thus God induced by the humility of the holy Virgin, chose her for his mother when about to become man for the redemption of the world. Nevertheless, he did not wish to become her Son without first having obtained her consent and he acted thus for the greater glory and merit of that mother: "Noluit carnem sumere ex ipsa nolente ipsa," says William the Abbot.—In cant. 3. And behold, whilst the humble Virgin in her poor dwelling, sighs and prays for the coming of the Lord, (as was revealed to St. Elizabeth, a Benedictine virgin,) the Archangel Gabriel, entrusted with the great embassy of God, approaches and salutes her : "Hail, full of grace, the Lord is with thee, blessed art thou amongst women."—Luke 1:28. Hail Mary, full of grace, since thou art rich with grace, exceeding that of men and angels; the Lord is with you and shall ever remain with you by his grace; thou art blessed amongst all women, since all others have been born under the curse of original sin; but you have been kept free from every stain and have always been, and ever shall be blessed.

This salutation so full of praise, how is it met by the humility of Mary? She makes no reply, but astonished at so much praise, remains disturbed and confused; "Who, having heard, was troubled at his saying and thought within herself what manner of salutation this should be."—Luke 1:29. What should disturb her? perhaps the fear of illusion? That cannot be, she knows full well that her visitant is a heavenly messenger; perhaps through modesty, seeing that the angel had the form of man. No, for the text, says she, "was troubled at his saying or, as Eusebius Emissenus, expresses it: "non in vultu sed in sermone." This trouble then, all arose from her humility, which was confounded by those great praises which were so far from her thought. Hence, the more she is exalted by the angel, the more she humbles herself and sinks into her own nothingness. St. Bernardino of Sienna writes, that if the angel had told her she was the most guilty mortal in the world, she should not have been so much astonished; by that she was astonished and troubled at hearing so many encomiums, of which she deemed herself unworthy: "Si dixisset, O Maria tu es major ribalda quae est in mundo non ita mirata fuissit; unde turbata fuit de tantis laudibus."—Serm. 35. de An. inc. part 3.

But the holy Virgin who was already well versed in the sacred scriptures, knew that the time of the coming of the Messiah was at hand; she knew that the weeks of Daniel had been completed and that the sceptre of Juda, according to the prophecy of Jacob, had passed into the hands of a foreign king; she knew also that the mother of the Messiah was to be a virgin. Knowing all this, she heard herself saluted by the angel in a strain of praise, which could only be addressed to her who was to be the mother of God and then, perhaps the thought, or at least the suspicion, first struck her, that she was that chosen mother. No, her humility never could have suggested such a thought. No, these praises threw her into a state of fear, from which the angel was obliged to draw her by encouraging her not to fear, as St. Peter Chrysologus writes. "Christ was ministered to by an angel and so it was befitting that the Virgin should be encouraged by an angel likewise." The angel Gabriel encouraged her by saying, "fear not Mary, for thou hast found grace with God." As if he had said, why should you fear Mary? do you not know, that God exalts the humble? You look upon yourself as something low and base and therefore, God in his goodness, means to exalt you to the dignity of his mother. "Behold! thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and shalt bring forth a Son; and shalt call his name Jesus."

The angel now pauses to receive her answer and know from her whether she be willing to become mother of God. Here St. Bernard appeals to her in these words: "The angel awaits his answer and we also, O Lady, on whom the sentence of damnation weighs so grievously; we also await the word of pity."—Hom. 4. sup. missus. "Behold! the price of our salvation is offered to you, we shall be delivered at once if you consent." O holy Virgin, to thee is offered the price of our salvation, that is, the blood which the Son made man in thy womb will shed, to pay the forfeit of our sins and free us from death; if you consent we shall be delivered." The same who has desired to have you for his mother, desires equally to have your consent, by which he has resolved to save us." And, "why," says St. Austin, "why, O sacred Virgin, do you retard the salvation of the world?"—Serm. 21. de temp.

Mary gives answer to the angel: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord! be it done to me according to thy word."—Luke 1:38. O admirable answer, which rejoicest Heaven and pourest upon the earth a treasure of blessings! Answer, which hast drawn from the bosom of the father, his eternal Son, that he may become man! Scarcely had the Virgin spoken, when "the Word was made flesh!" and the Son of God became the Son of Mary. "O powerful fiat, exclaims St. Thomas of Villanova! O efficacious fiat! O most venerable fiat!" by that fiat heaven was lowered to earth and earth exalted to heaven.

But, let us look more narrowly into the reply of Mary: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord!" By this answer, the humble virgin meant to say, I am prepared to do all the Lord requires of me; if he see my nothingness and if all I have be his, who can say that he has chosen me by reason of my merit?

"Behold the handmaid of the Lord!" How can a servant deserve to be the mother of her Lord? Let not then, the handmaid receive praise, but only the goodness of God who has deigned to look upon a creature so lowly and exalt her so much. "O humility!" says the Abbot Guerico, "angusta sibi, ampla divinitati, insufficiens sibi, sufficiens ei quem non capit orbis." O the humility of Mary, which makes her little in her own eyes, but great in the eyes of God; unworthy in her own opinion, but in the esteem of God, worthy to bear in her womb, him whom the whole world cannot contain. Let us hear the expressions of admiration with which St. Bernard speaks of the humility of the blessed Virgin. "What exceeding humility, in union with such purity, such innocence, such fulness of grace." He then addresses himself to the divine Virgin and says: "Whence hast thou received this humility, O thou blessed one and such humility?" Lucifer, seeing himself endowed by God with great glory, would fain place his throne above the stars and make himself equal to God, saying: "I will exalt my throne above the stars of God, I will be like the Most High."—Isa. 14:13, 14. But, what would the proud angel have said, had his privileges been equal to those of Mary? He, when exalted by God, became proud and was cast into hell; but the humble Mary, the more she saw herself enriched with the gifts, of God, shrunk back the more into her own nothingness and God exalted her to such dignity, that except God, there is no being comparable to her; as has been said by St. Andrew Cretense: "Excepto Deo, omnibus est altior."—Orat. de dormit. Deip. Hence St. Anselm says, " nothing O Lady is equal to thee, for whatever is, must either be above or below thee, God alone is above thee, and all else below thee."—Pelbart. stellar. 2. par. 3. art. 2.

And to what greater dignity can a creature be exalted, than to that of mother of God? "To be mother of God," says St. Bonaventure, "is the most exalted dignity that can be conferred upon a pure creature; God might have made a greater earth, a greater heaven; but a greater creature than the mother of God he could not make."—Spec. B. 5. sec. 10. And this the Virgin herself meant to convey when she said, "he that is mighty hath done great things to me."—Luke 1. 49. Here the Abbot Cellense addresses her. "God," he says, made thee not for himself alone; "but for men, that through thee the ruin brought upon, them by sin might be repaired." Let us now come to the second point.

SECOND POINT

Adam our first father sinned and ungrateful to God for all the favours conferred upon him, rebelled by eating the forbidden fruit. God was therefore obliged to drive him out from his face and condemn him with all his posterity to eternal death. But having compassion upon him and the bowels of his mercy being moved, he resolved to come on earth and satisfy the divine justice, by paying with his own suffering person, the forfeit of our sins. "He came down from Heaven," as the holy church teaches us, "and was made man." O prodigy! O excess of the love of a God! A God to become man! If a prince of the earth seeing a worm die in its hole, wished to restore it to life and was told he could do so, on condition that he should humbly become a worm and enter that hole in which the worm lay dead and there giving up his life, make a bath of his blood, being immersed in which alone, the worm could be restored to life; what could the prince reply? would he not say, what should I care whether the worm live or die, that I should shed my blood to restore life to a worm?

How should it concern God if men be lost as they had deserved to be by their sins? He perhaps should have lost some of his happiness without man.

No, it was by reason of his excessive love for me that he came upon the earth and dwindled into the form of man, which he took in the womb of a virgin. He became man, that is to say, a worm like one of us: he "emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men and in habit found as a man."—Phil. 2:7. He, like the Father, is God, immense, sovereign, omnipotent and in all things equal to the Father, but having been made man in the womb of Mary, he became a creature, a servant, weak and less than the Father. Behold him humbled in the womb of Mary, taking upon him the duty of obedience to his Father, who would have him die as a criminal upon a cross, after thirty-three years of sufferings. "He humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, even unto the death of the cross." Let us with astonishment contemplate him in the womb of his mother; his will united to that of the Father and his heart inflamed with love for us: let us behold him offering himself voluntarily for us. "He was offered because it was his own will."—Isa. 43:8. He offers himself to suffer everything for our salvation. He foresees the scourge and offers his flesh, he foresees the thorns and offers his head, he foresees the nails and offers his hands and feet, he foresees the cross and offers his life. Why has he wished to suffer so much for us ungrateful and sinners as we are? Why has he so much loved us? he "hath loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood."—Apoc. 1:5. He beholds us in the filth of sin and prepares for us a bath of his own blood, in which to cleanse ourselves and make ourselves dear to God.—"Christ also hath loved us, and hath delivered himself for us."—Ephes. 5:2. He saw us condemned to death and he prepares to die that we may live; and seeing us accursed of God by reason of our sins, he loaded himself with all our iniquity that he might remove the curse from us. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us."—Gal. 3:13. St. Francis of Paul, contemplating a God made man and dying for our salvation had reason to exclaim often: O charity! O charity! O charity! If faith did not assure us of all that the Son of God had done and suffered for us, who could believe it? Ah, my brethren, the love which Jesus Christ had for us, constrains us to love him. "For the charity of Christ presseth us." How tender is not the sentiment of St Francis of Sales, with regard to the above mentioned words of St. Paul when he says: "Knowing as we do that Jesus the true God, loved us even unto death, the death of the cross, is not this knowledge a torch as it were, applied to our hearts? do we not find them, bound and strained and love pressed into them, by a violence which is as powerful as it is amiable?"

But here come the complaints of St. John: "He came unto his own, and his own received him not."—John 1:2. And why should the Only Begotten of God ever have come upon the earth to suffer and to die for us, if not in order that we should love him? "Deus factus est homo," writes Hugh of St. Victor, "ut familiarius ab homine diligeretur."—In lib. sent. "To this end, chiefly," says St. Austin, "has Jesus Christ come into the world, that he might make known to men how much he loved them."—C. 4. de Catech. And if God has so much loved us, he claims with justice a portion of love from us. "Notam facit dilectionem suam," says St. Bernard, "ut experiatur et tuam."—Serm. 43. in Cant. To this end has he manifested his great love for us, that he might experience ours for him, who has come from heaven to become man and die for men, that they might love him; how comes it then that so few amongst men love him? Infinite beauty!—infinite loveliness! worthy of all love, behold I am one of those ungrateful beings whom thou hast so much loved, without meeting a return; who, instead of loving, have offended you. But, O Lord, you have become man and died in order to obtain pardon for such sinners as should do penance, and detest their sins. Behold! I am a sinner, it is true, but I repent me of my sins and wish to love you; have pity on me. And you, O holy Virgin, whom your humility has rendered worthy of being the Mother of God, and who, as such, are the mother, the refuge, and the advocate of sinners! pray to Jesus for me; recommend me to that Son, who so much loves you, and denies you nothing. Tell him to pardon me; tell him to give me his holy love; tell him to save me, that face to face I may one day love him in Paradise. Amen.

SERMON THE TWELFTH

UPON THE SORROWS OF MARY

"Stabat autem juxta Crucem Jesu Mater ejus."

"Now, there stood by the Cross of Jesus, his Mother."—John 19:25.

WE are here, beloved brethren, to contemplate a new kind of martyrdom in the case of a mother, who must look on at the death of her innocent Son, executed like a felon upon an infamous gibbet. Mary is that mother, whom the holy church with too much reason calls the "Queen of Martyrs." Yes, because Mary in standing beside the cross of Jesus, suffered a more grievous martyrdom than did all the martyrs in their torments.

She was, in the first instance, a martyr without parallel; and in the second, a martyr without consolation.

FIRST POINT

The words of the prophet Jeremias suit me here: "To what shall I compare thee, or to what shall I liken thee, O daughter of Jerusalem for great as the sea is thy destruction: who shall heal thee?" —Lam. 2:13. No, the torments of all the martyrs can bear no comparison with the sufferings of Mary. "The martyrdom of Mary," says St. Bernard, "took place not by the sword of the torturer, but by grief of heart," according to the prophecy of Simeon, who said: "And thy own soul a sword shall pierce."—Luke 2:35.

Arnoldo Carnotense writes, that whoever was present upon Calvary when the Immaculate Lamb was yielding up his life for the salvation of the world, beheld there two altars of sacrifice; one in the body of Jesus Christ and the other in the heart of Mary; in which latter, Mary sacrificed her soul in compassion for her Son, when Jesus sacrificed his body in death.—Tract. de sept. verb. Dom. in cruc. St. Antoninus says, that the other martyrs sacrificed each his own life, but that Mary consummated her martyrdom by sacrificing the life of her Son, which she loved far more than her own ; and thus it was that her grief surpassed any other suffering which has been felt upon this earth.

It is well known that sufferings of children become the sufferings of the mothers who see them suffer. St. Austin, speaking of the mother of the Machabees, who was present during the martyrdom of her sons, says that love caused her to suffer all the sufferings of each one of her children: "Ilia videndo, in omnibus passa est, quia omnes amabat, ferebat in oculis quod in carne omnes."—Serm. 109. de div. cap. 6. Erasmus adds, that mothers feel greater pain on seeing their children suffer, than if they were sufferers themselves.—Libell. de Mach. With regard to ordinary mothers, that does not always happen; but with regard to Mary, it certainly did happen that she suffered more by seeing her Son upon the cross, than if she were to have suffered in her own person all the torments she saw inflicted upon him. "All the wounds which covered the entire body of Jesus," says St. Bonaventure, "were found together in the heart of Mary."—De plenet. Virg. in stim. amor. to afflict her during the passion of her Son; so that, as St. Laurence Justinian writes, her heart was, by affliction, converted into a mirror, in which were reflected all the outrages and insults suffered by Jesus Christ. "Passionis Christi speculum effectum erat cor Virginis; in illo agnoscebantur sputa, convicia, verbera, vulnera."—De agon. Christi, cap. 11. Thus, during the passion of her Son. Mary suffered in her heart, by reason of the love she bore him, the buffets, the scourges, the crowning with thorns and was actually nailed in spirit with him to the cross.

The same St. Laurence, contemplating Jesus carrying his cross to Calvary and seeing his afflicted mother following him, makes him turn to her and say: "Alas! mother, whither do you follow me? you shall be tortured in my torture and I in yours. But his loving mother desists not from following him, although she knows that being present during his passion, will cost her a torture more severe than any death. She sees her Son carrying the cross on which he is to be nailed and she takes up the cross of her grief and follows him—to be crucified along with him: "Tollebat et mater crucem suam et sequebatur eum, crucifigendaeum ipso."—Grulielm. in cantic. 7. Hence, St. Bonaventure contemplating Mary, as she stood near her dying Son, exclaims: "tell me, O sacred mother, where were you when Jesus was dying? were you near the cross? No, you were on the cross itself."—Loc. cit. de plane. virg. Upon these words foretold for the Redeemer, by the prophet Isaiah: "I have trodden the vine-press alone, and of the Gentiles there is not a man with me."—Isa. 63:3. Richard writes as follows: "Lord, it is true that you have not a man to accompany you, but there is a woman and that woman your mother, to follow you and receive all the wounds which are inflicted on your body, in her heart"—Richard. de laud. virg.

Other martyrs are painted with the instruments of their death in their hands, to signify by what death they suffered; thus St. Paul is represented with a sword in his hand, St. Andrew embracing a cross, St. Laurence having a gridiron; but Mary is represented with her dead Son in her arms, because the instrument of her martyrdom was no other than her Son and the compassion which she felt for her Son, has made her the Queen of Martyrs. Pinamonti has a noble and singular sentiment with reference to this compassion felt by the blessed mother. He says, that the compassion of Mary for Jesus was so great, that she alone could worthily compassionate the death of a God made man, through love of men. The blessed Amadeus writes, that Mary, when beholding the passion of her Son, experienced more grievous tortures than had she been suffering in person, because she loved her Son incomparably more than herself. Hence, St. Idelphonsus does not hesitate to assert, that you say little when you speak of Mary, as having suffered more than all the martyrs taken together.—Ap. Sinise. martirio di Maria cant. 36. And St. Anselm, addressing the blessed Virgin, says: "Whatever cruelty has been exercised upon the bodies of the martyrs was trivial, or rather nothing compared with all that you suffered during the passion of your Son."—St. Anselm de excell. virg. cap. 5. The same saint adds, "No, Lady, I could not believe that you should have been able to survive such sufferings, did not the spirit of thy Son support thee."—Loc. cit. And St. Bernardine of Sienna, went so far as to say: "The grief of the blessed Virgin was so great, that if it were to be divided amongst all creatures capable of grief, they should expire under it." Who then can doubt for a moment, that the martyrdom of Mary was without parallel, since it exceeded the sufferings of all the martyrs taken together; and since, as St. Antoninus says, other martyrs in dying, sacrifice only their own lives, but she sacrificed the life of her Son, which was infinitely dearer to her than her own.

SECOND POINT

The martyrs suffered torments inflicted on them by tyrants, but the Lord, who never abandons his servants, failed not to console them under their torments. The love of God which burned in their hearts, rendered all tortures sweet to them. AVincent w as torn while stretched on the rack, with iron hooks, and burned with heated plates; but St. Austin says, that the saint spoke so slightly of his torments, that the person who suffered appeared to be different from the person who spoke. A Boniface had his body torn with irons, and his nails and flesh pierced with thorns, and melted lead poured into his mouth, and all the while he ceased not to thank Jesus Christ, who thought him worthy to suffer for his love. Laurence suffered on his gridiron; but the love with which he was inflamed prevented him from feeling the fire which was under him, or death itself. "In ilia longa morte, illis tormentis, tormenta non sensit."—S. Aug. tract. 27. As the holy martyrs felt their pain diminished in proportion to their torments, so the bare thought of the passion of Jesus Christ was sufficient to console them. Exactly the reverse took place in Mary, since the passion of Jesus was her martyrdom and her love for him her only executioner. Here may the words of Jeremiah be applied: "for great as the sea is thy destruction; who shall heal thee?" As the sea is entirely salt, without one drop of fresh water, so the heart of Mary was all bitterness, without one drop of consolation. "Who shall heal thee?" Her Son was the only person who might console her; but, how should he, hanging upon the cross, console her, when the love she bore him was her sole tormentor?

In order, then, to understand the greatness of Mary's sorrow, we should know, according to Cornelius a Lapide, the greatness of the love which she bore to Jesus. But who can measure that love? The blessed Amadeo is of opinion, that in Mary's heart were found together the natural love which she bore to Jesus, as her Son, and the supernatural love which she bore to him as her God: "Duse dilectiones in unam connexerunt et ex duobus amoribus factus est unus."—Hom 5, de Laud. Virg. These two descriptions of love, were blent into one and that, the greatest a pure creature was capable of. "As, then, there never has been found in a creature love to equal that which Mary had for Jesus, so neither has sorrow ever been found to equal hers."—Rich. a St. Lauren.

"Now, there stood by the cross of Jesus, his Mother." Let us pause awhile to consider these words, before we finish and, having glanced at these, we shall have done; but let us here renew our attention. "There stood." When Jesus hung upon the cross, he was abandoned by his disciples; they had all left him from the moment he was taken in the garden. "Then the disciples all leaving him, fled."—Matt. 26:56. The disciples abandoned him, but his loving Mother did not abandon him; she wished to stay by him and see him expire—she "stood by the cross." Mothers, when they see their children suffer and that they cannot give them assistance, have not strength to endure it, and therefore fly the sight. But Mary contemplated her Son as he hung agonizing upon the cross; she saw that his sufferings were fast depriving him of life—she could have wished to succour him in that extremity—but it is not permitted her; still she does not avoid the sight, she does not fly, but stands near the cross where her Son is expiring. The cross was the hard bed which Jesus was stretched upon in death. Mary, who stood beside it, never withdrew her eyes from him, but gazed upon him torn with the scourges and the thorns and the nails. She sees that her dear Son can find no rest hanging from three nails; she could have wished, as I have said, to minister to him, or, at least, to expire in his arms; but all is denied her. Ah, cross! she said, give me back my Son—thou art the gibbet of malefactors, but my Son is innocent. Peace, sorrowing Mother! the cross shall not restore you your Son, until he shall have breathed his last.

St. Bonaventure, contemplating the grief which Mary felt in the death of her Son, says himself that no grief could equal hers, because no Son ever was so dear to a mother: "De compass. Virg." "If, then, there never was Son so amiable as Jesus, or Mother so loving as Mary, what grief can be compared to hers."—Richard. lib. 3. de Laud. Virg. Mary saw that her Son was about to die, when, looking piteously upon him, she appeared to say, Ah, my Son! you are about to leave me, and do you not say a word at parting? leave me some memorial of you. The memorial he left her was, "Woman, behold thy Son," meaning St. John who stood near and these were the words with which he took leave of his mother. He calls her woman, that he may not increase her sorrow by styling her mother. Woman, behold thy Son, he shall tend thee after my death.

"There stood by the cross his mother." Let us contemplate Mary for the last time standing at the foot of the cross and beholding her Son as he expires. But, O God, what a Son dies there! a Son who had chosen her from eternity for his mother, preferring her before all womankind: A Son so beautiful, so holy, so lovely; a Son who had ever been obedient, a Son who was her. only love, her Son and her God; and Mary has to see him die of pure pain before her eyes. But the last hour of Jesus now approaches, and the afflicted mother, has to see her Son yielding to the last assault of death; his body now relaxes, his head falls upon his breast, he opens his mouth and expires. The people around exclaim he is dead and Mary too says, thou art indeed dead, my Jesus.

After Jesus had hung dead upon the cross for some time, his body was taken down. Mary goes to receive it and having strained it to her bosom, gazes now upon that head wounded with thorns, those hands pierced with nails, that body torn with scourges; ah, my Son, she says, to what has the love thou didst bear to man reduced thee? But the disciples fearing lest she die while embracing her Son, approach and with reverential violence take him from her arms and rolling him in his shroud, carry him away to bury him. They are accompanied by the other mourning women and with them still goes the sorrowful mother, following her Son to the tomb. St. Bernard says, that her grief was such as to cause all who met her to weep: "Omnes plorabant qui obviabant ei;" and he adds, that those who accompanied her were in tears for her, rather than for the Lord.

My brethren, let us be devout to the sorrowful Mary. Albertus Magnus writes, that "as we are indebted to Jesus Christ for his death, so we are indebted to Mary for the sorrow which she felt at the death of that Son, for the salvation of the world."—Sup. miss. cap. 20. This an angel revealed to St. Bridget: the holy virgin, he said, sacrificed to God for our salvation, the life of her Son; a sacrifice which, as we have said, cost her more pain than all the sufferings of the martyrs cost them. But the divine mother complained to St. Bridget, that very few compassionate her in her sufferings, whilst the greater number of men live forgetful of them; whence, she said, to the saint, "if others forget me, you at least, daughter, must not forget me." To such an end the blessed Virgin appeared in the year 1229, to the founder of the order of servants of Mary, that he might establish a devotion in memory of her dolours, which was afterwards done ; and Jesus himself one day, said to the blessed Veronica da Benasco: "Daughter, the tears which one sheds in contemplating my passion, are dear to me, but loving with immense love, as I do my mother Mary, I greatly value meditation upon the sorrow which she experienced during my passion." It may be well to mention also, what is said by Pelliarto, (stellar. 3. par. 3. art. 3.) to have been revealed to St. Elizabeth, a Benedictine virgin, which was, that the Lord has four graces for those who are devout to the sorrows of Mary. First, that, whoever invokes her by her dolours, shall have the grace of doing penance for his sins before death; secondly, that she shall console such in all their tribulations and especially at the hour of death; thirdly, that the Lord shall imprint on their minds the recollection of his passion and inspire them with a devotion to it; fourthly, that he has empowered Mary to obtain what graces she pleases for those who are devout to her dolours.

FAMILIAR DISCOURSE

AT THE RECEPTION OF A NUN

DEVOUT sister, you should have constantly in mind this day on which you have the happiness of being espoused to Jesus Christ, that you may continually thank him for so great a favour. Do not imagine that you place Jesus Christ under an obligation to you by leaving the world for his sake; you ought on the contrary to feel yourself under an everlasting obligation to him for the grace which he has given you, in calling you to leave the world.

Today you leave the world; you think perhaps you make a great sacrifice. What is this world? A land of thorns, of tears, of sorrow. The world promises great things to its votaries, pleasure, peace, contentment; but all turn into deceit, bitterness and vanity. Even when the world bestows its riches, honours and pleasures, they end in suffering and grief: "Extrema gaudii luctus occupat." And God grant that for the many blind creatures who love the world, this grief may not become eternal, since in the world the dangers are many and great, and end, all but inevitably, in the ruin of the soul, in the loss of Paradise and God.

Those poor maidens, who, deceived by the false promises of the world, leave Jesus Christ for the secular life, hope to find therein pleasure and contentment, but what the poor creatures experience shews that they find in it nought but thorns and gall. Their subordination to their husbands, the care of children and servants, the wants of the family and the other duties to which a woman living in the world is subjected, render her life so full of straits, and fear, and disgust, that it is if one may so speak, a continual martyrdom.

Enquire of married women whether they enjoy contentment. For my own part I know that as many as I have asked, I have found to be discontented and full of trouble. On the other hand, ask those nuns who have left everything for God, whether they are satisfied with their condition and they will answer you that they shall ever have to thank the Lord for having called them from the world. It is but too true what Cardinal Petrucio says, of the delights of those who love the world: "they have the semblance of joy and are actually torments." But of the troubles of those who love God, he says, that "they have the semblance of torments, while they are actually joys." And, if that be the case in this life, how shall those maidens fare who have left the world and how those who have remained in it? Those who love the world will say, we shall be able to be holy in the world. To be holy? Hear me, daughter, lest the devil should think to disturb you afterwards upon this point: in order to be holy, it is not sufficient to desire holiness, you must employ the means conducive to it. You must every day spend some time in mental prayer, because salvation is very difficult for the soul that does not often think of God. You must frequent the sacraments by which God communicates himself to the soul; you must be totally detached from all earthly affections and vanities. But, speaking practically, how much time can be devoted to mental prayer by the mother of a family, who has her head filled with anxiety for children, servants, and all the occasions of the house? She shall scarce have time to say the rosary. How can she frequent the sacraments, if she can scarce afford to hear Mass upon a festival? How can she live detached from the world, while she lives in the midst of it? How then? some persons will say, is it impossible for a married person to be saved? We read of many married persons who became holy. Yes, even in the world a married person can become holy, provided she take care to practise as much as she possibly can, the devout exercises before mentioned and above all to fortify herself with great patience, because she cannot become holy without great labour and fatigue; I say that all holy married women, even princesses and queens, are martyrs of patience.

On the other hand, a religious who has abandoned the world to give herself wholly to God, how many helps and opportunities has she not of leading a wellregulated life and becoming holy? If she do nothing more than the little which the rule prescribes and the community practices; if she meditate every morning, communicate often in the week, hear mass every day, hear frequently the word of God, together with going through the spiritual exercises which are annually made during eight days and the various other devotions which are practised in the convent ; this alone would suffice to make her a saint. Remember, daughter, when the devil shall tempt you with regard to your vocation to the religious state, that in the world few are saved, and that in religion, few, very few, are lost.

In a word, if you were to leave the convent, what spouse could you hope for beyond a gentleman, a nobleman, or a monarch; but now you are espoused to the King of Heaven, and of all the kingdoms of the earth. How many holy virgins have renounced the most exalted earthly nuptials for Jesus Christ? St. Agnes was sought by many noble Romans, but she was content to have her head cut off rather than have any other spouse than Jesus Christ. The blessed Agnes refused the hand of the Emperor Frederick the Second, and shut herself up in a convent. St. Domatilla refused to marry a great lord the Count Aurelian and therefore died a martyr, having been burned alive. St. Susanna was offered the hand of the Emperor Maximin; but she, in order to retain Jesus Christ, chose rather to lose her head by the axe of the executioner, and died a martyr.

Leave, O daughter, leave to those maidens who love the world, all these pleasures and vanities, their dresses, their balls and their plays; enjoy you your Jesus. He, in your cell, will give you more content than all the pleasures, pomp and riches, which are at the command of the princes of the earth. Here, in your lonely cell, you shall enjoy a Paradise and a continual peace. If you love Jesus Christ, you will love the solitude which you will find in your cell. In it your crucified spouse will speak familiarly to your heart; from that cross he will send rays of light into your soul and darts of love into your bosom. Alone with him in your cell, you shall manifest to him the love you bear him and continually make to him the offering of yourself and all that you have; you shall seek from him the graces which you stand in need of; you shall make him acquainted with the difficulties and fears which afflict you and he will console you. Do not doubt that the divine spouse will console you during life and more especially at the hour of your death. Then it will not be matter of regret to you, that you do not die in the world, surrounded by children, relations and servants, not one of whom will say a word to you for your soul's good; but you will have the happiness of dying in the house of God, surrounded by your holy sisters in religion, who will all comfort you by pious conversation and animate you to appear full of confidence before your loving spouse, who shall come to meet you with a crown in his hand to make you queen of his blessed kingdom, in recompense for the love which you have borne him.

I have said that the religious who are given entirely to God enjoy continual peace. I mean thereby, such peace as can be tasted in this vale of tears. God has prepared for us in Heaven, a full and perfect peace, free from every labour. This earth, on the contrary, is a place of merit and therefore of suffering, where by crosses we become entitled to the joys of Paradise.

The spouse whom you have chosen this morning, my daughter, although the most noble, the greatest and the richest whom you could choose, is called, and is, a bloody spouse: "A bloody spouse art thou to me." A bloody spouse, whose blood has been drained by dint of scourges, thorns and nails, for the salvation of your soul and of all mankind. Behold him then advancing, not crowned with flowers but with thorns, not adorned with gold and gems, but with blood and with wounds; mark well his royal throne and see if it be not a hard cross, on which he agonizes and dies, in a sea of ignominies and grief, through love of you. Hear how he invites you to follow him and what you have to do if you follow him. "If any one wish to come after me, let him deny himself, take up his cross, and follow me." The first thing he asks of you is, that you deny yourself. He wishes that you detach your heart from all creatures. He, your spouse, will never be satisfied with you, unless he see you all his own; and you, in order to be all his, must divest yourself of every earthly affection, for parents, friends, vanity, dress, self-esteem, and self-will. Above all, you must guard your heart from any personal affection. When any creature wishes to deprive Jesus Christ of any portion of your love, all which he claims from you, answer it in the words of St. Agnes: "Depart from me, food of worms! I belong to another lover." Depart from me, food of death! Jesus Christ is my spouse; he has been the first to love me—he has gained my entire heart; go away, because there is no room for you in that heart. And, beyond all things, my daughter, remember my warning when taking the sacred veil that shall be given you, which signifies that you are to hide yourself from the eyes of the world, and love no other lover on this earth than Jesus Christ and when you shall say, "posuit signum in faciem meam ut nullum praeter eum amatorem admittam."

For the following reason, do you on this morning change your dress and name: first, you change your dress, you put off the dress of the world and take that of religion, in order that you may totally forget the world and all its vanities; and secondly, you change your name, that the world may forget you and that you being dead to the world, may be so wholly separated from it, that every person may look upon you as if you had ceased to live.

The second thing which Jesus requires of you, is, that you carry with resignation the cross which has been assigned you. Your cross shall be the observance of the rules of the convent and obedience to the will of your superioress; it is impossible for a nun who does not perfectly obey the rule of the community and the commands of her superiors, to be a good religious. Your cross shall be to suffer patiently, all the contradicti ons and mortifications and humiliations which you shall meet with. Whoever cannot endure humiliations, shews that she is not humble and whoever is not humble cannot become holy and is in great danger of being lost. In a word, there is no other way to Paradise than the way of the cross, which must be borne with patience. And God finds in every place for those souls whom he loves, a cross to afflict them and render them his real spouses.

I next conjure you, after you shall have taken the holy habit, to renew every day the promise which you shall have made to Jesus Christ, of being ever faithful to him. Love and fidelity are the chief qualities of a spouse. It is to this end that the ring shall afterwards be given you, in token of the fidelity with which you are to preserve the love which you have promised to Jesus Christ, But in order to be faithful to him, you must not rely solely on your promise, you must pray to Jesus Christ and to his holy mother, for the gift of perseverance; and you must endeavour to acquire a great confidence in Mary, who is the mother of perseverance. And should you feel the divine love growing cold within you and your heart drawn to earthly objects, bethink you of this my other advice and in order that you may not abandon yourself to tepidity, enquire of yourself, wherefore have I left the world, my home and my kinsfolk? is it to damn myself? This thought was wont to renew St. Bernard in fervour and cause him to tread more steadily the path of perfection: "Bernarde ad quid venisti?" Bernard, said he to himself, why have you left the world, and entered the monastery? to become a saint. Why, then, do you not set about sanctifying yourself? And thus he succeeded in dying a saint. You, my daughter, by acting thus, may hope to become a saint a nd see yourself amongst the many other virgins who reign in heaven a queen in that blessed kingdom. But I must have done speaking, since I am so commanded by him, who is eager to see you enter at once into his house. Behold him from this spot; see with what joy he expects you, with what affection he calls you to enter at once his royal palace, which is no other than this convent. Come on, then, and enter joyfully; for the reception which your spouse shall give you this morning in his house, is a foretaste of the reception which you shall meet from him after death in his heavenly kingdom.

DISCOURSE

TO THE BRETHREN OF A CONFRATERNITY

IN the great deluge, in the days of Noah, nearly all mankind perished, eight persons only being saved in the ark. In our days a deluge, not of water, but of sins, continually inundates the earth and from this deluge very few escape; speaking more especially of lay persons, amongst whom scarcely any one is saved, with the exception of those who take refuge in some ark of salvation, in some confraternity of our Lady. You see innumerable laymen in a country amongst them how many are to be found in the state of grace? Scarcely shall you find any unless belonging to a confraternity. My brethren, you have already been at the exercises of the mission, and I hope that while there God has enlightened your minds, so as that you know there is no other fortune or advantage to be sought for in this * The word made use of by the Saint, is secular; but as the word secular in this country is understood, almost universally, to apply to the Parochial Clergy, I have ventured to substitute a word conveying the meaning of the Saint. I could not, however, take it upon me to make anything like an alteration, without admonishing the reader of the circumstance. [TRANSLATOR.] life, except the salvation of one's soul. The world calls him happy who is rich and honoured and him unhappy who is poor and despised; but the truth is, that he only who lives in the grace of God and is attaining to salvation, is happy and that he who lives at a distance from God, and damns himself, is miserable and unhappy. In a few days death shall come upon him, and all will be over with him. And what will it avail a man in death to have gained the whole world, if he lose his own soul and has to deplore its loss for ever in hell. Now, my brethren, I wish to show you how much hope of salvation there is for him who belongs to the confraternity of our blessed Lady.

When a lay person enquires of me, what he has to do in order to be saved, I do not recommend to him any more efficient or safer means than to join the confraternity. The confraternity is a means which embraces all that is most conducive to salvation; whence a member of the confraternity may, with reason, say, "Now all good things come to me together with her." First, the frequent hearing of the word of God contributes most powerfully to the salvation of a lay person. On the other hand, the holy fathers look upon him as already lost, who despises the word of God, because the sheep of Jesus Christ willingly hear his word announced to them by his priests: "My sheep hear ray word."—John 10:27. The reason is, because those lay persons who are entirely occupied about earthly concerns and do not hear the word of God, easily forget the good and evil things of the world to come and thus abandon themselves to the pleasures of this life and live and die in sin. But he who attends to the exercises of the confraternity, hearing frequently of death, judgment, hell and eternity, easily resists the temptations by which he may be assailed, for which reason the Holy Ghost says, "remember thy last things, and thou shalt never sin."—Eccl. 7:40.

Secondly, in order that a lay person should preserve himself in the grace of God, it is necessary for him to frequent the sacraments. These are the food of the soul, keeping it alive, more especially the holy communion, which is called bread; because, as the earthly bread sustains our bodily life, so this heavenly bread preserves the life of the soul. This the holy Council of Trent teaches, when it says that the Blessed Eucharist frees us from venial, and preserves us from mortal sin.

Thirdly, he who frequents the sodality is enriched with graces by Mary, through whom her Son wishes every grace to flow. "With me are riches," she says, "that I may enrich those who love me." St. Bonaventure writes, that he who has acquired favour with Mary, is acknowledged by the citizens of Heaven and that whoever bear her badges, will be written in the book of life. That is to be understood more particularly of the brethren of her confraternity, whose name, when written in the book of the confraternity, they may look upon as written in the book of life, provided they persevere in attending the exercises of the confraternity and observing all its rules, for of what use is it to a man to have his name enrolled amongst the brethren, if he do not attend the confraternity, or if he attend it without frequenting the sacraments, the performance of which latter duty is the most important of all its rules? Some attend the confraternity not with a view to the honour of Mary, or the salvation of their own souls, but through a desire to rule there and control all things; for which reason, they often dispute and brawl at the meetings of the confraternity, as if they were in some place of amusement. He who does this, had better stay away.

Beyond all things, I recommend everyone to attend the confraternity and not to leave it on trifling occasions, as some do, who in order to amuse themselves, for some pleasure, or some little business, drop off and when asked why? Father, they will say, business obliged me to leave the confraternity. But, my child, would I say to them, you know you have no business on this earth so important as that of saving your soul. Tell me, would you forfeit the sum of a thousand pounds for sake of a few pence? When Sunday comes, my brethren, leave everything else and attend the confraternity. Know that our Lady will not suffer you to be at a loss by it: "for all her domestics are clothed with double garments."—Prov. 31:21. It is said that the servants of Mary are clothed with double garments, because they are enriched with both spiritual and temporal blessings. I once again recommend to you, when attending the devotions of the confraternity, not to abstain from confession and communion, which the rule prescribes; for if you attend the devotions in sin and go out from them in sin, of what use shall the confraternity be to you? In the last place, I recommend to you to attend the meetings of the confraternity, solely with a view to the performance of the devotions it prescribes. Each one will take his own place, be obedient, perform whatever duty is assigned him and have no other view in attending the exercises than the salvation of his own soul. Act thus and you shall see how the Mother of God will protect you in matters both spiritual and temporal. And she will be a mother to you, more especially at the hour of death. O what a consolation on the death-bed, to have served Mary! Father Binetti relates.

(Perfez. di N. 5, cap. 31.) that being present at the death of a client of Mary, he, before dying, addressed to him these words, "O father, if you but knew how delighted I am at having served Mary—I could not make you conceive the joy which I feel upon this point:" and thus he died in a heavenly peace. And I think that those brethren who belong to the confraternity of Mary, shall die a consoling death. The Duke of Papuli, who said that he attributed whatever graces he had received, to the circumstance of his having attended the meetings of the confraternity of Mary, when on the point of death, called his son to him and said: "My son, attend the devotions of the confraternity of our Lady; that is the greatest inheritance I can bequeath to you; I leave it to you.

Let us all, my brethren, throw ourselves at the feet of our Lady and promise her never to leave her congregation more. Let everyone say with me, Ah, my Queen and my Mother! I should be now in hell if you had not preserved me from it. I thank you this morning, and ask pardon of you for having so often left your confraternity without cause. How many sins should I not have avoided by going thither? Pardon me, O Mother! and pray your Son to pardon all the offences which I have committed against him. Yes, my Jesus, by the blood which you have shed for me and by the love you bear to Mary, pardon me my sins, because I repent of them. But let us now make promise and say, O Mother of God, I promise you never more to leave your confraternity without particular necessity; I make this promise, punish me if I fail in it. And you, O Queen! assist me in all my occasions, but especially when I am in danger of offending God. Call upon her then, my brethren, and she will most assuredly assist you. And at the hour of my death, O Mother, do not abandon me; assist me then and make me die under your mantle. Courage, my brethren, let us be faithful to the promises which we have made to Mary this morning. You come to honour her in this chapel, but she shall one day bring you to reign with her forever in the kingdom of Paradise. And I shall now bless you on her part, that you may be able to keep the promises you have made her.

DISCOURSE

TO PIOUS MAIDENS

MY sisters, I do not intend to explain the privileges and blessings acquired by those maidens who consecrate their virginity to Jesus Christ; I shall only glance at them. First, they become in the eyes of God as beautiful as the angels of heaven. Baronius relates, (Ann. 480, num. 23, in Compend.) that upon the death of a holy virgin, named Georgia, an immense multitude of doves was seen to fly around her; and when the body was carried to the church, they ranged themselves along that part of the roof which corresponded to the situation of the corpse and did not leave until she was buried. Those doves were thought to be angels who accompanied that virginal body.

Moreover, a maiden who leaves the world and dedicates herself to Jesus Christ, becomes his spouse. In the gospel our Redeemer is called Father, or Master, or Shepherd of our souls; but, with regard to those virgins, he calls himself their spouse; they "went out to meet the bridegroom." When a young woman wishes to establish herself in the world, she will examine (if she be prudent,) which of all her suiters is the most noble and the richest. Let us then learn from the spouse in the sacred canticles, who well knows—let us learn from her what manner of spouse is he whom consecrated virgins aspire to. Tell me, O sacred spouse, what manner of spouse is he who makes you the most fortunate of women. "My beloved is white," she says, "and ruddy, chosen among thousands."—Cant. 5:10. He is all white, by reason of his purity; and ruddy, by reason of the love with which he burns. He is in fine, so noble and so kind as to be the most amiable of spouses.—With reason, then, did the glorious virgin, St. Agnes, (as we learn from St. Ambrose,) when it was proposed to her to marry the son of the Prefect of Rome, reply, that she had a much more advantageous match in view: "Sponsum offertis meliorem reperi." Some ladies endeavouring to persuade St. Domitilla to marry Count Aurelian, nephew of the Emperor Domitian, saying there was no obstacle, as he was willing that she should remain a Christian, tell me, replied the saint, if a monarch and a clown both pretended to a maiden, which would she choose? Now I, should I marry with Aurelian, would have to leave the King of Heaven; it would be a folly—I will not do it. And thus, in order to remain faithful to Jesus Christ, to whom she had already consecrated her virginity, she was willing to be burned alive, a death which her barbarous suitor caused her to suffer.—Ap. Croiset. exerc. del. ai. 12. di. maggio.

Those spouses of Jesus Christ who leave the world for his sake, become his beloved; they are called the first fruits of the lamb: "The first fruits to God and to the lamb."—Apoc. 4:4. Why the first fruits? Because, says Cardinal Ugone, as the first fruits are more grateful than any other to man, so virgins are dearer to God than any others. The divine spouse feeds amongst the lilies: "Who feeds amongst the lilies?"—Cant. 2:16. And what is meant by lilies, if not those devout maidens who consecrate their virginity to Jesus Christ? The venerable Bede writes, that the song of the virgins, that is, the glory which they give to God by preserving untouched the lily of their purity, is far more pleasing to him than the song of all the other saints. Wherefore the Holy Ghost says, that there is nothing comparable to virginity: "Non est digna ponderatio continentis animae." And hence, Cardinal Ugone remarks, that dispensation are often granted from other vows, but never from the vow of chastity; and the reason is, because no other treasure can compensate for the loss of that. And it is, for the same reason, that Theologians say, the Blessed Mother would have consented to forego the dignity of Mother of God, could it have been had only at the expense of her virginity.

Who on this earth can conceive the glory which God has prepared for his virgin spouses in Paradise? Theologians says, that virgins have in Heaven their own "aureola," or special crown of glory, which the other saints, who are not virgins, are refused. But let us come at once to the most important point in our discourse. This young woman will say, cannot I become holy in the married state? I do not wish to give you the reply in my own words; hear those of St. Paul, and you shall see the difference between the married woman and the virgin: "And the unmarried woman and the virgin, thinketh on the things of the Lord, that she may be holy, both in body and in spirit; but she that is married, thinketh on the things of the world, how she may please her husband."—1 Cor. 7:34. And the Apostle adds: "And I speak this for your profit, not for a snare, but for that which is decent and which may give you power to attend upon the Lord without impediment."—Ibid. 35. In the first place, I say that married persons can be holy in the spirit, but not in the flesh; on the contrary, virgins who have consecrated their virginity to Jesus Christ, are holy both in soul and body. "Sancto corpore et spiritu;" and mark those other words, "to attend upon the Lord without impediment." Oh, how many obstacles have not married women to encounter in serving the Lord? and the more noble they are, the greater the obstacles. A woman to become holy, must adopt the necessary means, which are, much mental prayer, constant use of the sacraments and continual thought of God. But what time has a married woman for thinking upon God? "She that is married thinketh on the things of the world," says St. Paul. The married woman has to think of providing her family with food and raiment. She has to think of rearing her children, of pleasing her husband and her husband's relatives; whence, as the apostle says, her heart is divided between God and her husband and children. Her husband must be attended to; the children cry and scream and are continually asking for a thousand things. What time can she have to attend to mental prayer, who can scarce attend to all the business of the house? how can she pray amid so many distracting thoughts and disturbances? Scarcely can she go to church, to recollect herself and communicate upon the Sunday. She may have the good desire, but it will be difficult for her to attend to the things of God as she ought. It is true, that in this want of opportunities, she may gain merit, by resignation to the will of God, who requires of her in that state, chiefly patience and resignation; but in the midst of so many distractions and annoyances, without prayer, without meditation, without frequenting the sacraments, it will be morally impossible for her to have that holy patience and resignation. But, would to God, that married women had no other evil to contend with besides that of not always being able to attend to their sanctification as much as they should; the greater evil is the danger to which they are continually exposed of losing the grace of God, by reason of the intercourse which they must continually have with the relations and friends of their husband, as well in their own houses, as in the houses of others. Unmarried women do not understand this, but married women and those who have to hear their confessions know it well. Let us, however, now have done with the unhappy life which is led by married women, the ill treatment they receive from their husband, the disobedience of children, the wants of the family, the annoyance of mothers-in-law and relatives, the throes of childbirth, always accompanied by danger of death, not to mention the afflictions of jealousy and scruples of conscience, with regard to the rearing up of their children, all which breed a tempest under which poor married women have continually to groan and God grant that in this tempest they may not lose themselves, so as to meet with hell in the other world, after having suffered a hell in this. Such is the enviable lot of those maidens who chose the world! But what! such a maiden replies, are there no married women holy? Yes, I answer there are; but who are they? Such only as become holy through their sufferings, by suffering all from God without finding fault and with continual patience. And how many married women are to be found in such a state of perfection. They are very rare; and if you find any, they are always in sorrow, that when they could have done so they did not consecrate themselves to Jesus Christ. Amongst all the devout married women I have known, I never knew one to be satisfied with her condition.

The greatest happiness then falls to the lot of those maidens, who consecrate themselves to Jesus Christ. Those have to encounter none of the dangers which married women must necessarily be placed in. They are not bound to earth, by love of children, or men, or dress, or gallantry, whilst married women are obliged to dress with pomp and ornaments, in order to appear with their equals, and please their husbands. A maiden who has given herself to Jesus Christ, requires only what dress will cover her; nay, she should give scandal if she were to wear any other, or make use of any ornaments. Moreover, virgins have no anxiety about house or children or relatives; their whole care is centred in pleasing Jesus Christ, to whom they have consecrated their soul, their body and all their love; whence it is that they have more time and a mind more disengaged, for frequent prayer and communion.

But let us now come to the excuses sometimes brought forward, by those who are cold in the love of Jesus Christ. Such an one will say, I should leave the world if I had some convent to go to, or at least, if I could always spend my time in devotion at the church when I should please; but I could not remain at home, where I have bad brothers who ill treat me and on the other hand, my parents are unwilling to have me frequent the church. But, I ask you, is it in order to save yourself, or lead an easy life you leave the world? Is it to do your own will, or the will of Jesus Christ? If you wish to become holy and serve Jesus Christ, I ask you another question; in what does holiness consist? Holiness does not consist in living in a convent, or spending the entire day in the church, but in being at confession and communion as often as you can, in obedience, in doing anything assigned you at home, in being retired, in bearing labour and contempt. And if you were to be in a convent how should you be employed? Do you imagine you should always be either in church or in your cell, or in the refectory, or at recreation? In the convent, although the sisters have a time marked out for prayer, for mass and for communion, they have also their hours appointed for the business of the house, and more especially the lay sisters, who as they do not attend in the choir, have nearly all the labour of the house, and consequently least time for prayer. All exclaim, let us be in a convent, let us have a convent. How much more easy is it not for devout girls to become holy in their own houses than in a convent? How many such have I known to regret their having entered the convent, especially when the community was large? the poor lay sister in certain offices, having scarce time to say the rosary. But father, such a girl will answer, I have at home a peevish father and mother, I have bad brothers, all of them use me ill, I cannot stand it. Well I say, and if you marry, shall you not have to deal with mothers and sisters-in-law, and perhaps undutiful children, and perhaps a harsh husband? O how many cruel husbands are there not, who when first married promised great things, but shortly afterwards cease to be husbands, and became the tyrants of their wives, treating them not as companions but as slaves? Enquire of many married women whether this be not the fact. But, without going beyond your own home, you all know how your mothers fared. One thing, at least, is certain, that all you should have to suffer at home, after having given yourself to God, you should suffer for the love of Jesus Christ, and he should make your cross sweet and light to you. But how dreadful is it not to suffer for the world's sake? to suffer without merit? Courage then! if Jesus Christ has called you to his love, and wishes to have you for his spouse, go on joyfully, it will be his care to afford you consolation even in the midst of sufferings.

This, of course, will be only in case you truly love him and live as his spouse. Hear, then, for the last time, the means you are to adopt, in order to become holy, and live a true spouse of Jesus Christ; and these are, to practise the virtues becoming his spouse. It is read in the gospel that the kingdom of Heaven is likened unto virgins. But to what virgins? Not to the foolish, but to the wise. The wise were admitted to the nuptials, but the door was shut in the face of the foolish; to whom the spouse said, I know you not—you are indeed virgins, but I do not acknowledge you for my spouses. The true spouses of Jesus Christ follow the spouse whithersoever he goeth. "These follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." What is the meaning of following the Lamb? St. Austin explains it, of imitating him, both in body and mind. After you shall have consecrated your body to him, you must consecrate to him your whole heart, so that your heart may be entirely devoted to his love; and, therefore, you must adopt all the means which are necessary for making you belong entirely to Jesus Christ.

The first of those means is mental prayer, to which you must be most attentive. But do not imagine that in order to pray thus, it is necessary for you to be in a convent, or remain all day in the church. It is true, that at home there is much disturbance created by the persons there ; nevertheless, those who wish can find time and place for prayer, this is in the morning before the others rise, and at night after the others shall have gone to bed. Neither, to pray, is it necessary to be always on bended knees; you can pray whilst labouring, and even when walking upon business (should you have no other opportunity,) by raising your soul to God, and thinking on the passion of Jesus Christ, or any other pious subject.

The second means is, the frequentation of the sacraments of confession and communion. With regard to confession, each one has to make choice of a confessor, whom she is to obey in everything, otherwise she will never walk steadily in the way of perfection. As to communion, she must not depend solely upon obedience; she must desire it and ask for it. This divine food must be hungered after; Jesus Christ must be desired. It is frequent communion that renders his spouses faithful to Jesus Christ, especially in the preservation of holy purity. The most holy sacrament preserves the soul in every virtue; and it appears that its most special effect is to preserve untouched the chastity of virgins, according to that of the prophet, who calls this sacrament, "the corn of the elect and wine springing forth virgins."—Zach. 9:17.

The third means is, retirement and caution: "As the lily amongst the thorns, so is my beloved amongst the daughters."—Cant. 2:2. For a virgin to think of remaining faithful to Jesus Christ amid the conversations, the jests and other amusements of the world, is useless; it is necessary that she preserve herself amid the thorns of abstinence and mortification, by using not only the greatest modesty and reserve in speaking with men, but even all austerity and penitential exercises, when necessary. Such are the thorns which preserve the lilies, I mean young maidens, who otherwise should soon be lost. The Lord calls the cheeks of his spouse as beautiful as those of the turtle: "Thy cheeks are beautiful as the turtle dove's."—Cant. 1:9. And why so? Because the turtle, by instinct, avoids the company of other birds and always remains alone. That virgin, then, shall appear beautiful in the eyes of Jesus Christ, who shall do all that she can to hide herself from the eyes of others. St. Jerome says, that Jesus is a jealous spouse: "Zelotypus est Jesus." Hence he is much displeased when he sees a virgin dedicated to him, endeavouring to appear before and please men. Pious maidens endeavour to appear repulsive, that they may not attract men. The venerable sister Catherine of Jesus, afterwards a Teresian nun, washed her face with the filthy water of tar, and then designedly exposed her face to the sun, that she might lose her complexion. St. Andregesina, having, as we are told by Bollandus, been promised in marriage, prayed the Lord to deform her, and was heard, for she immediately was covered with a leprosy, which caused everyone to fly her; and as soon as her suitor had ceased his offers, her former beauty was restored. It is related by James di Viatrico, (In spec. exemp. 20. v. Virg.) that there was a certain virgin in a convent, whose eyes had inflamed a prince, who threatened to set fire to the monastery if she would not yield to him; but she plucked out her eyes and sent them to him in a basin, the bearer of which was instructed to say, "here are the darts which have wounded your heart—take them and leave me my soul untouched." The same author (Exemp. 19.) tells of St. Euphemia, that having been promised by her father to a certain count, who left no means untried to obtain her; she, in order to free herself from his addresses, cut off her nose and lips, saying to herself, "vain beauty, you shall never be to me an occasion of sin!" St. Antoninus tells something similar (and his account is confirmed by Baronius,) of the Abbess Ebba, who fearing an invasion of the barbarians, cut off her nose and upper lip to the teeth; and that all the other nuns, to the number of thirty, following her example, did the same. The barbarians came and seeing them so deformed, set fire to the monastery through rage and burned them alive; and hence the Church, as Baronius tells us, has enrolled them amongst her martyrs. This is not allowable for others to do; those saints did it by the especial impulse of the Holy Ghost. But it sufficiently well answers the purpose of shewing you what virgins who loved Jesus Christ have done, to prevent their being sought by men. Devout virgins at present should at least move as modestly and be seen as little as possible by men. Should it happen that a virgin should, by chance, and without any fault of hers, receive by violence any insult from men, be it known to you, that after it she will remain as pure as before. St. Lueia made an answer of this kind to the tyrant who threatened to dishonour her: "If you do," she said, "and I be so treated against my will, my crown shall be double." It is the consent only that is hurtful; and know, moreover, that if a virgin be modest and reserved, men will have no inclination to interfere with her.

The fourth means of preserving purity, is the mortification of the senses. St. Basil says, "a virgin should not be immodest in any respect, in tongue, ears, eyes, touch and still less in mind."—S. Bas. de vir. Virg. A virgin, in order to keep herself pure, must be modest in her speech, conversing seldom with men and that only through necessity, and in few words. Her ears must be pure, by not listening to worldly conversations. Her eyes must be pure, by being either closed, or fixed upon the earth in the presence of men. She must be pure in touch, using therein all possible caution, both as regards herself and others. She must be pure in spirit, by resisting all immodest thoughts, through the help of Jesus and Mary. And to this end, she must mortify herself with fasting, abstinence and other penitential exercises; which things she must not practice without the consent of her confessor, otherwise they should injure her soul by making her proud. Those acts of penance must not be made without the confessor's permission, but they must be desired and sought for; for the confessor, if he do not see the penitent wishing for them, will not give them. Jesus is a spouse of blood, who espoused our souls upon the cross, whereon he shed all his blood for us. "A bloody spouse art thou to me."—Exod. 4:25. Therefore those spouses who love him, love tribulation, infirmity, sorrows, ill-treatment and injuries; and receive them not only with patience, but with joy. Thus may we understand that passage which says that, "Virgins follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." They follow their spouse Jesus, with joy and gladness whithersoever he goeth, even through sorrow and disgrace, as has been done by so many holy virgins, who have followed him to torments and to death, smiling and rejoicing.

Finally, sisters, in order that you may obtain perseverance in this holy life, you must recommend yourselves often and much to most holy Mary, the Queen of Virgins. She is the mediatrix who negotiates those espousals and brings virgins to espouse her Son. "After her shall virgins be brought to the King."—Ps. 44:15. It is she, in fine, who obtains fidelity for those chosen spouses; for, without her assistance, they should be all unfaithful.

Come on, then, you who intend to live no longer for the world, but for Jesus Christ alone. (I address myself to those who feel themselves called by that divine spouse to consecrate themselves to his love.) I do not wish that you should make any vow this morning, or oblige yourselves at once to perpetual chastity. You shall do that when God shall inspire you and your confessor shall be willing. I only desire you by a simple act, and without any obligation, to thank Jesus Christ for having called you to his love; and to offer yourselves to him henceforward for your entire lives. Say then to him, ah, my Jesus! my God, and my Redeemer ! who have died for me, compassionate me who burn to call myself your spouse. I burn, because I see that you have called me to that honour; nor do I know how to thank you for that grace. I should now have been in hell; and you, instead of chastising me, have called me to be your spouse. Yes, my spouse, I leave the world, I leave all through love of you, and give myself entirely to you. What world?—what world do I speak of? My Jesus, henceforward you are to be my only good—my only love. I see that you wish to have my entire heart and I wish to resign it entirely to you. Receive me in your mercy, and do not reject me as I have deserved you should. Forget all the offences that I have given you, of which I repent with my whole soul; would that I had died before offending you. Pardon me—inflame me with your holy love—and give me your aid, in order that I may be faithful to you and never leave you more. You, my spouse, have given yourself all to me. Behold! I give myself entirely to you. Mary, my Queen and my Mother, chain my heart to that of Jesus Christ; and fasten both hearts so that they be never sundered more.

I leave you now my blessing, in order that you may be so bound to Jesus Christ, as never again to depart from him. Give your hearts now to Jesus Christ; say, Jesus, my spouse, henceforward I wish to love you alone, and nothing else.

THE END.

PREFACE

THIS little work of St. Alphonsus was translated and published, together with a series entitled Reflections on the Passion of our Lord, in 1849. The edition is now exhausted, and the work out of print. The Devout Reflections on Spiritual Subjects have been re-translated and are here published separately in a convenient form. The Reflections on the Passion will also be brought out in the same style.

Both works both composed and published together by the Saint when he was in the seventy-eighth year of his age. He was still governing the Episcopal See of St. Agatha, in the Kingdom of Naples, but he was so broken down in health and so crippled by most painful infirmities that it seemed a miracle that he should still be able not only to watch over the affairs of his diocese but even to apply himself to the composition of several important and learned works.

Referring to these labors, the Saint's learned and pious biographer, Cardinal Villecourt, remarks: "In the midst of all his sufferings of body and mind, St. Alphonsus profited by every moment of leisure to contribute by his writings to the glory of God. Thus in 1773 he published Reflections on the Passion of Jesus Christ, and in the same volume a number of Devout Reflections on Spiritual Subjects. Everyone saw in this little work a loadstone, as it were, to attract the hearts of men and unite them to that of Jesus Christ."

On the occasion of its first publication in Naples, Canon Simioli was charged by Cardinal Sersale, the Archbishop, with the examination of the work. He gave his opinion of it in these terms: "I cannot express how great is my esteem for this little book, which is so well calculated to stir up piety and banish tepidity and negligence, especially in these unhappy times, in which charity has grown cold and scandals are multiplied. It is to this pious author that we shall owe the consolation of seeing the fire of divine love enkindled in hearts that are cold, and burning with greater ardor in souls that are fervent." St. Alphonsus himself, in a letter written in the same year, 1773, to one of his penitents, says: "I send you two little works, the first of which may assist you in meditating on the Passion of Jesus Christ; I myself make use of it every day. I read likewise, every day, something from the second book, entitled Devout Reflections. I should wish you to do the same, for I have composed it especially for those who desire to give themselves entirely to God."

To such recommendations nothing could be added. And we can only hope and pray that this little work, one of the last written by St. Alphonsus, may be as fruitful of grace now, and in this our country, as it was in his native land, when first it came forth from the pen of the holy Doctor.

Reflection 1

ON THE THOUGHT OF ETERNITY

SAINT AUGUSTINE used to call the thought of eternity "The Great Thought." This thought made the Saints count all the treasures and grandeurs of this life as nothing more than straw, mire, smoke and dung. This thought has driven so many anchorites [hermits] to hide themselves in deserts and caves, and so many noble youths, and even kings and emperors, to shut themselves up in cloisters. This thought has given courage to so many martyrs to endure racks and iron nails and red-hot gridirons and even being burned alive.

No, we are not created for this earth. The end for which God has placed us in the world is this, that by our good works we may merit eternal life. "The end [is] life everlasting." (Romans 6:22). And therefore St. Eucherius used to say that the only affair that we should attend to in this life is eternity, that is, to gain for ourselves a happy eternity and escape a miserable one. "The business for which we work is eternity." If we make sure of success in this business, we shall be happy forever; if we fail in it, we shall be forever miserable.

Happy is he who lives with eternity always in view, with a lively faith that he must shortly die and enter into eternity. "The just man liveth by faith," says the Apostle. (Galatians 3:11). It is faith that makes the just live in the grace of God and that gives life to their souls by detaching them from earthly affections and reminding them of the eternal goods which God holds out to those who love Him.

St. Teresa used to say that all sins had their origin in an absence of faith. Therefore, in order to overcome our passions and temptations, we must frequently revive our faith by saying: "I believe in the life everlasting." I believe that after this life, which for me will quickly finish, there is an eternal life, either full of delights or full of torments, which will be my lot according to my merits or demerits.

St. Augustine also was accustomed to say that a man who believes in eternity and yet is not converted to God has lost either his reason or his faith. "O eternity!" these are his words, "he that meditates upon thee and repents not, either has no faith, or if he has faith, he has no heart." In reference to this, St. John Chrysostom relates that the Gentiles, when they saw Christians committing sin, called them either liars or fools. If you believe not (they said) what you say you believe, you are liars; if you believe in eternity and sin, you are fools. "Woe to sinners who enter into an eternity which is to them unknown because they would not reflect upon it," exclaims St. Cæsarius; and then he adds: "But alas, O double woe, they enter it and they never come forth!" Wretched beings! For them the gates of Hell open only to admit them, not to release them.

St. Teresa used to repeat to her spiritual daughters: "My children, one soul, one eternity!" She meant to say: My children, we have but one soul, and if that is lost, all is lost; and once lost, it is lost forever. In a word, upon that last breath which we draw in dying depends our being either happy forever, or forever in despair. If the eternity of the next life—if Paradise, if Hell–were mere opinions of literary men and things of doubtful reality, even then we ought to take every care to live well and not run the risk of losing our soul forever. But no, for these things are not doubtful; they are certainties; they are truths of faith, much more certain than the things which we see with the eyes of the body.

Let us, then, pray to Our Lord to give us more faith, saying with the Apostles: "Lord, increase our faith!" For, if we are not strong in faith, we may become worse than Luther or Calvin. On the contrary, one thought of lively faith in the eternity that awaits us may make us saints.

St. Gregory says that they who meditate on eternity are neither puffed up by prosperity, nor cast down by adversity because, as they desire nothing in the world, so they fear nothing from the world.

When it happens to us to suffer any infirmities or persecutions, let us remember the Hell which we have deserved by our sins. When we do this, every cross will seem to us light, and we shall thank the Lord and say: It is "the mercies of the Lord that we are not consumed." (Lamentations 3:22). Let us say with David, "Unless the Lord had been my helper, my soul had almost dwelt in hell." (Psalms 93:17). If God had not shown me mercy, I should already have been in Hell, even from the time in which I first offended Him by a grievous sin. Through my own fault I was already lost; it is Thou, O God of mercy, that hast stretched out Thy hand and hast drawn me forth from Hell, "Thou hast delivered my soul, that it should not perish." (Isaias 38:17).

O my God, Thou knowest well how often I have deserved Hell; but notwithstanding this, Thou dost command me to hope, and I will hope. My sins terrify me, but Thy death and Thy promise of pardon to him that repents encourage me. "A contrite and humbled heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise." (Psalms 50:19). I have despised Thee in times past, but now I love Thee above all things, and I grieve more than for any other evil that I have offended Thee. O my Jesus, have pity on me.

Mary, Mother of God, intercede for me.

Reflection 2

WE ARE PILGRIMS ON EARTH

AS LONG as we are in this life, we are so many pilgrims wandering upon the earth, far from our true country, which is Heaven, where God awaits us, that we may rejoice forever in beholding His beautiful countenance. "While we are in the body," writes the Apostle, "we are absent from the Lord." (2 Corinthians 5:6). If then we love God, we ought to have a continual desire to leave this place of exile by being separated from the body, that we may go and behold Him. It was for this that St. Paul ever sighed, as he goes on to say: "We are confident, and have a good will to be absent rather from the body, and to be present with the Lord." (2 Corinthians 5:8).

Before the Redemption, the way to God was closed for us miserable sons of Adam; but Jesus Christ, by His death, has obtained for us the grace of having it in our power to become the sons of God. ["But as many as received Him, He gave them power to be made the sons of God." (John 1:12)]. And thus He has opened to us the gates by which we can have access, as children, to God our Father.

On this account St. Paul says: "Now, therefore, you are no more strangers and foreigners, but you are fellow-citizens with the Saints and the domestics of God," (Ephesians 2:19), so that, while we are in the grace of God, we enjoy the citizenship of Paradise and belong to the household of God. St. Augustine says: "Nature corrupted by sin produces citizens of an earthly city and vessels of wrath; but grace, which frees our nature from sin, makes us citizens of a heavenly country and vessels of mercy."

This made David say: "I am a sojourner on the earth; hide not Thy commandments from me." (Psalms 118:19). O Lord, I am a pilgrim upon this earth; teach me to keep Thy precepts, which are the road by which I may reach my country in Heaven. It is not surprising that the wicked should wish to live forever in this world, for they justly fear that they will pass from the pains of this life to the eternal and far more terrible pains of Hell; but how can he who loves God, and has a moral certainty that he is in the state of grace, desire to go on living in this vale of tears—in continual bitterness, in anxieties of conscience, in peril of being condemned? How can he help sighing to depart speedily to unite himself to God in a blessed eternity, where there is no longer any danger of losing Him? Oh how the souls who love God continually, as long as they live, groan and cry out with David: "Woe is me, that my sojourning is prolonged!" (Psalms 119:5). Unhappy is he who must continue to live a long time in this world, in the midst of so many perils to his salvation! Therefore it is that the Saints have continually had this prayer upon their lips: "Thy kingdom come"; quickly, O Lord, quickly take us to Thy kingdom. Let us make speed, then, as the Apostle exhorts us, to enter that country where we shall find perfect peace and contentment: "Let us hasten therefore to enter into that rest." (Hebrews 4:11). Let us hasten, I say, with desire, and not cease to press onwards, till we are safe in that blessed harbor of rest which God prepares for them that love Him.

He that runs in a race, says St. John Chrysostom, pays no heed to the spectators, but only to the crown of victory; he stops not, but the nearer he approaches the goal, the quicker he runs. Therefore, the Saint concludes that the longer we have lived, the more we should hasten by good works to secure the prize, so that our only prayer for relief in the troubles and trials which we endure in this life ought to be this: "Thy kingdom come." Lord, may Thy kingdom speedily come, where, united eternally to Thee and loving Thee face to face with all our powers, we shall no longer have fear or danger of losing Thee.

And when we find ourselves afflicted by trials or despised by the world, let us comfort ourselves with the great reward which God prepares for those who suffer for the love of Him: "Be glad in that day and rejoice, for behold, your reward is great in heaven." (Luke 6:23). St. Cyprian says that with good reason our Lord wills that we should rejoice in labors and persecutions, because then the true soldiers of God are tried and crowns are distributed to those who are faithful.

Behold, O my God, my heart is ready; behold me prepared for every cross which Thou shalt send me. No, I desire not delights or pleasures in this life; he who has offended Thee and deserves Hell merits not pleasures. I am ready to suffer all the infirmities and adversities which Thou dost send me; I am ready to embrace all the contempt of men. I am content, if so it please Thee, to be deprived of all bodily and spiritual consolations; it is enough if Thou dost not deprive me of Thyself and of loving Thee forever. I deserve not this, but I hope for it, through the blood that Thou hast shed for me. I love Thee, O my God, my Love, my All. I shall live forever, and I hope I shall love Thee forever; and my paradise will ever be to rejoice in Thine infinite bliss, for Thou dost truly merit it because of Thine infinite goodness.

GOD DESERVES TO BE LOVED ABOVE EVERYTHING

SAINT TERESA says that it is a great favor that God bestows upon a soul when He calls it to love Him. Let us then love Him, since we are called to this love, and let us love Him as He desires to be loved. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart." (Matthew 22:37). The Venerable Luis de Puente felt ashamed at saying to God: "O Lord, I love Thee above everything; I love Thee more than all creatures, more than all riches, than all honors, than all earthly pleasures," for it seemed to him that it was like saying: "My God, I love Thee more than straw and smoke and mire."

But God is satisfied when we love Him above all things. Therefore, at least let us say to Him: "Yes, O Lord, I love Thee more than all the honors of the world, more than all its riches, more than all my relations and friends; I love Thee more than health, more than my good name, more than knowledge, more than all my comforts; in a word, I love Thee more than everything I possess—more than myself."

And let us still further say: "O Lord, I value Thy graces and Thy gifts; but more than all Thy gifts, I love Thyself, who alone art Infinite Goodness and a Good infinitely amiable and surpassing every other good. And, therefore, O my God, whatever Thou mayest give me besides Thyself, which is not Thyself, is not sufficient for me; if Thou givest me Thyself, Thou alone art sufficient for me. Let others seek what they will, I will seek nothing but Thee alone, my love, my all. In Thee alone I find all that I can seek or desire."

The sacred Spouse said that among all things, she had chosen to love her beloved: "My beloved is white and ruddy, chosen out of thousands." (Canticle of Canticles 5:10). And whom, then, shall we choose to love? Among all our friends of this world, where can we find a friend more worthy of love and more faithful than God; and who has loved us more than God? Let us pray, then, and let us pray constantly: "O Lord, draw me after Thee," for if Thou dost not draw me after Thee, I cannot come to Thee.

O Jesus, my Saviour, when will it be that, stripped of every other affection, I shall desire and seek for nothing but Thee! I would gladly detach myself from everything, but certain importunate affections often enter my heart and draw me away from Thee. Do Thou then, by Thy powerful hand, detach me from them and make Thyself the only object of all my affections and all my thoughts.

St. Augustine says that he who has God has everything, and he who has not God has nothing. What does it profit a rich man to possess many treasures of gold and jewels, if he has not God? What does it profit a monarch to have many kingdoms, if he has not the grace of God? What does it profit a man of letters to understand many sciences and languages, if he knows not how to love his God? What does it profit a general to command an entire army, if he lives the slave of the devil and far from God? When David was already king, but in a state of sin, he walked in his gardens, he went to his sports and to other pleasures, but all creatures seemed to say to him: "Where is thy God? Wouldst thou seek in us thy happiness? Go, find God, whom thou hast left, for He alone can give thee contentment." And therefore David confessed that in the midst of all his pleasures he found no peace and wept night and day, with the thought that he was without God. "My tears have been my bread day and night, whilst it is said to me daily: Where is thy God?" (Psalms 41:4).

In the midst of the miseries and troubles of this world, who can console us better than Jesus Christ? Therefore He says to us: "Come to Me, all you that labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you." (Matthew 11:28). Oh the folly of worldlings! One single tear shed through sorrow for our sins gives more consolation, one aspiration, "My God!" uttered with love by a soul in the state of grace, is worth more than a thousand festivals, a thousand plays, a thousand banquets, in giving contentment to a heart that loves the world. I say again, Oh, folly—and a folly which will be past remedy—when there comes that death in which it is night, as the Gospel says: "The night cometh, when no man can work." (John 9:4). Wherefore, Our Lord warns us to walk while the light favors us; for if the night overtakes us, we shall not be able to do anything. Therefore, let God alone be all our treasure, all our love; and let all our desire be to please God, who will not suffer us to conquer Him in love. He rewards a hundredfold everything that is done to give Him pleasure.

Then silence, wicked world! depart;
Seek not esteem or love of mine;
Another Lover owns my heart;
His charms are greater far than thine.

O my God, and my only Good, be Thou the ruling power in my soul; and as in love I prefer Thee before all things, so do Thou make me in all things prefer Thy pleasure to any satisfaction of my own. O my Jesus, I trust in Thy blood, that during the rest of my life I shall love nothing but Thee upon this earth, so that I may come one day to possess Thee forever in the kingdom of the Blessed.

O holy Virgin, succor me with thy powerful prayers, and take me to kiss thy feet in Paradise.

Reflection 4

TO BECOME HOLY, A SOUL MUST GIVE ITSELF TO GOD WITHOUT RESERVE

SAINT PHILIP NERI used to say that so much of our love as we fix upon creatures we take away from God, and therefore our Saviour, as St. Jerome writes, is jealous of our hearts. As He Himself loves us exceedingly, He desires to reign alone in our hearts and to have no companions there to rob Him of a portion of that love which He wills to have entirely for Himself; hence, it displeases Him to see us attached to any affection which is not for Him. And does our Saviour then demand too much, after having given us all His blood and His life, dying upon a cross? Does He not deserve to be loved by us with all our hearts and without reserve?

St. John of the Cross says that every attachment to creatures hinders us from belonging wholly to God. "Who will give me wings like a dove, and I will fly and be at rest?" said the Psalmist. (Psalms 54:7). There are some souls called by God to become saints, but because they come to Him with reserve and do not give Him their whole love, but retain some affection for earthly things, they do not become, and never will become, saints. They gladly would fly to God, but being held down by some attachment, they do not fly, but remain always on earth. We must, therefore, detach ourselves from everything. Every thread, says the same St. John, whether thick or slender, hinders the soul from flying to God.

St. Gertrude one day asked Our Lord to make known to her what He desired of her. Jesus answered: "I desire nothing from thee but a heart that is empty." And it was this which David sought from God: "Create a clean heart in me, O God." (Psalms 50:12). O my God, give me a pure heart that is emptied and stripped of every earthly affection.

"All for all," wrote Thomas à Kempis. To gain all, we must give all. To possess God, we must leave all that is not God. Then indeed the soul can say to Him: "My Jesus, I have left all for Thee; now give Thyself all to me." To attain to this state, we must not cease to beg of God that He would fill us with His holy love. Love is that mighty fire which consumes every affection in our hearts that is not for God. St. Francis de Sales used to say that, when a house is in flames, we throw all the furniture out of the windows, by which he meant that when a soul is inflamed and divine love takes possession of it, it has no need of sermons or spiritual directors to detach it from the world; the love of God itself will burn and strip the heart of every impure affection.

Divine love is represented in the Sacred Canticles under the symbol of a wine-cellar: "He brought me into the cellar of wine; he set in order charity in me." (Canticle of Canticles 2:4). In this blessed cell, souls which are the spouses of Christ, inebriated with the wine of holy love, lose all relish for the things of the world, see God alone, seek God alone in all things, speak only of God and desire not to hear anything but of God alone; and when they hear others speak of riches, dignities and pleasures, they turn to God and say to Him with a burning sigh: "My God, and my all! My God, what is the world to me? What are pleasures, what are honors to me? Thou art all my treasure, all my contentment." St. Teresa, speaking of the prayer of union, says that this union consists in dying to all worldly objects in order to possess nothing but God.

That a soul may give itself wholly to God, three principal means are to be employed: The first is to flee from all defects, even the least, and also to repress every little inordinate desire, such as curiosity in seeing or hearing, and to refrain from certain little pleasures of sense, from certain witty but useless remarks, and such like; secondly, among things which are good, always to choose that which is the best and the most pleasing to God; and thirdly, to receive from the hands of God, with peace of mind and thanksgiving, the things which are displeasing to our self-love.

O my Jesus, my Love, my All, how can I see Thee dying upon a shameful gibbet, despised by all and consumed with anguish, and yet seek for myself earthly pleasures and glory? I will be wholly Thine. Forget the offenses I have committed against Thee, and receive me. Teach me to know from what things I ought to detach myself and what I must do to please Thee, for I resolve to do all. Give me strength to keep my resolution and to be faithful to Thee. O my beloved Redeemer, Thou dost desire that I should give myself all to Thee without reserve in order to unite myself wholly to Thy heart. Behold, this day I give myself all to Thee, all without reserve, all—all! From Thee I hope for grace to be faithful to Thee till death.

O Mother of God, and my own Mother Mary, obtain for me holy perseverance.

Reflection 5

THE TWO GREAT MEANS FOR BECOMING HOLY: DESIRE AND RESOLUTION

ALL holiness consists in loving God. Divine love, says Holy Scripture, "is an infinite treasure to men! which they that use, become the friends of God." (Wisdom 7:14). God is ready to give us this treasure of His holy love, but He requires that we should greatly desire it. He that little desires any good thing, takes little trouble to obtain it. On the other hand, St. Lawrence Justinian says that a great desire lightens the labor and gives strength.

And thus, he who has little ambition to advance in divine love, instead of becoming more ardent in the pursuit of perfection, will go on becoming always more lukewarm; and continuing thus tepid, he will be in great peril of falling at last down some precipice [i.e., into some mortal sin]. On the other hand, whoever aspires with fervent desires after perfection, and makes efforts daily to advance, will little by little in time attain it. St. Teresa says: "God does not bestow many favors, except on those who earnestly desire His love." And again: "God leaves no good desire without its reward." Therefore, the Saint exhorted everyone not to suffer his desires to slacken, because, "trusting in God and striving our best, little by little, we shall reach that point which the Saints reached."

It is a deceit of the devil (according to the opinion of the same Saint) which makes some think that it is pride to desire to become saints. It would be pride and presumption if we trusted in our own efforts or resolutions, but not if we hope for all from God. For if we do so, He will give us that strength which we have not. Let us, then, desire with a very great desire to attain to a sublime degree of divine love, and let us say with courage: "I can do all things in Him who strengtheneth me." (Philippians 4:13). And if we do not find that we possess this great desire, at least let us seek it urgently from Jesus Christ, for He will give it to us.

We will now pass on to the second means—resolution. Good desires must be accompanied by a determined will to make great efforts for the attainment of the good desired. Many desire perfection, but never take the means to gain it; they wish to go and live in a desert, to do great penances and practice great prayer and endure martyrdom; but all such desires are nothing better than mere fancies, which, instead of benefitting them, do them great harm. These are the desires which "kill the slothful," as the Scripture says. (Proverbs 21:25). For, such a person, feeding himself upon these fruitless desires, pays no heed meantime to the correction of his defects, the mortification of his appetites, and patience in suffering contempt and contradictions. He wishes to do great things, but such as are incompatible with his present condition; and thus his imperfections increase. In every adversity he is disturbed, every infirmity makes him impatient; and thus he lives always imperfect, and imperfect he dies.

If then we truly desire to become saints, let us resolve first to avoid every venial sin, however slight; secondly, to detach ourselves from every affection to earthly things; thirdly, let us never omit our accustomed exercises of prayer and mortification, however great may be the weariness and disgust we feel in them; fourthly, let us meditate daily on the Passion of Jesus Christ, which inflames with divine love every heart that meditates upon it; fifthly, let us resign ourselves in peace to the will of God in all things that annoy us. Father Balthasar Alvarez used to say: "He that in troubles resigns himself to the Divine Will runs to God posthaste." And, sixthly, let us continually beg of God the gift of His holy love.

Resolution, resolution! St. Teresa often said: "The devil has no dread of irresolute souls." On the contrary, he who really resolves to give himself to God will overcome even what seemed to him insuperable. A resolute will conquers everything. Let us endeavor to repair lost time. The time that remains, let us give it all to God. All time that is not spent for God is lost. Why do we delay? Is it that God should abandon us in our luke-warmness, which may lead us at last to utter ruin? No, let us take courage, and from this day forth act upon this holy maxim: "We have only to please God and die." Souls thus resolute are made by God to fly in the way of perfection.

He that would belong wholly to God must therefore put into practice these resolutions: first, never to commit even the least venial sin; secondly, to give himself to God without reserve, and therefore to neglect nothing which is pleasing to God, provided he has the approval of his director; thirdly, among all good works, to choose what is most pleasing to God; fourthly, not to wait for the morrow, but whatever can be done today, to do it; fifthly, to pray daily to God for an increase in His love. With love, everything will be done; without love, nothing will be done. To gain all, we must give all. Jesus has given Himself entirely to us, that we may be entirely His.

Oh, miserable being that I am! O God of my soul, so many years have I lived upon earth, and what progress have I made in Thy love? My progress has been in my defects, in my self-love, in my sins. And must I live this kind of life even until death? No! Jesus, my Saviour, help me; I will no longer be so ungrateful to Thee as I have been till now. I am resolved truly to love Thee, and I will leave all to please Thee. Stretch out to me Thy hand, O Jesus, Thou who hast shed all Thy blood that Thou might make me Thine. Yes, such I will be, by Thy grace. Death is near; aid me to free myself from everything which hinders me from belonging wholly to Thee, who hast loved me so much. Do this, by Thy merits; from Thee I hope for it.

And I hope it also from thee, O my Mother Mary. By thy prayers, which are all-powerful with God, obtain for me the grace to belong wholly to Him.

Reflection 6

ON THE SCIENCE OF THE SAINTS

THERE are two kinds of knowledge upon earth, one heavenly, the other worldly. The heavenly is that which teaches us to please God and to become great in Heaven. The worldly is that which moves us to please ourselves and to become great in this world. But this worldly knowledge is folly and real madness in the sight of God. "For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God." (1 Corinthians 3:19). It is folly, for such wisdom makes fools of those who cultivate it. It makes them fools and like the brutes, for it teaches them to gratify their sensual appetites like the brute beasts.

St. John Chrysostom writes: "We call him a man who preserves unimpaired the likeness of man," namely, that which distinguishes him from a brute. "What is that likeness? The gift of reason." From this it follows that as we should say of a brute which always acted according to reason, that it behaved like a man, so on the contrary, we ought to say of a man who acts according to his sensual appetites and in opposition to reason, that he behaves like a brute beast.

But even speaking of human and natural knowledge of earthly things, what do men know of them, however much they have studied? What are we but so many blind moles, who besides the truths which we know by faith, know all the rest only by means of our senses, or by conjecture, so that everything is for us uncertain and liable to error? What writer on such subjects, however applauded by many, has escaped the criticism of others? But the evil is that, as St. Paul says, "Knowledge" (that is to say, worldly science) "puffs up," and makes men proud and prone to despise others. (Cf. 1 Corinthians 8:1). And this is a defect most injurious to the soul, for as St. James says, "God resisteth the proud and giveth grace to the humble." (James 4:6).

"Oh that they would be wise and would understand and would provide for their last end!" (Deuteronomy 32:29). Oh if men would act by reason and the Divine Law—and thus would learn to provide, not so much for a temporal life, which speedily ends, as for eternity—they would certainly not occupy themselves in the attainment of any other knowledge, except such as aids them in obtaining eternal happiness and avoiding eternal torments!

St. John Chrysostom advises us to go to the tombs of the dead in order to learn the science of salvation. Oh what admirable schools of truth are the sepulchers to make us know the vanity of the world! "Let us go to the tombs; there," said the Saint, "there I see nothing but corruption, bones and worms." Among all these skeletons which I see, I cannot tell which belong to the ignorant and which to the learned; I only see that, with death, all the glories of the world were ended for them. What has remained of a Cicero, a Demosthenes, an Ulpian? "They have slept their sleep, and . . . have found nothing in their hands." (Psalms 75:6).

Blessed is he who has received from God the science of the Saints. The science of the Saints is to know how to love God. How many in the world are well-versed in literature, in mathematics, in foreign and ancient languages! But what will all this profit them if they know not how to love God? "Blessed is he," said St. Augustine, "who knows God, even if he knows nothing else." He that knows God and loves Him, though he be ignorant of what others know, is more learned than all the learned who know not how to love God.

"The unlearned arise and seize upon Heaven!" cried out the same Saint. How learned were a St. Francis of Assisi, a St. Pascal, a St. John of God! Ignorant in worldly science, but well-skilled in that which is divine. "Thou hast hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them to little ones." (Matthew 11:25). By the wise, we are here to understand the worldly-wise, who labor for the possessions and glories of the world and make little account of eternal goods. And by little ones, we are to understand simple souls (like children), who know little of worldly wisdom, but devote all their care to pleasing God.

Oh, let us not then envy those who know many things; let us only envy those who know how to love Jesus Christ; and let us imitate St. Paul, who desired to know nothing but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified; for he says: "I judged not myself to know anything among you, but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." (1 Corinthians 2:2). Happy are we if we attain to the knowledge of the love which Jesus crucified has borne us and from this book of divine love learn to love Him!

O my True and Perfect Lover, where shall I find one who has loved me as much as Thou hast loved me? In the past I have lost my time in learning many things which have profited my soul nothing; and I have thought little of knowing how to love Thee. I see that my life has been lost. I hear Thee calling me to Thy love; behold me here; I leave all; from this day forth, my one, only thought shall be to please Thee, my Supreme Good. I give myself wholly to Thee; do Thou accept me; give me help to be faithful to Thee; I resolve to be no longer my own, but all, all Thine.

O Mother of God, do thou also succor me by thy prayers.

Reflection 7

OUR ETERNAL SALVATION IS IN PRAYER

PRAYER is not only useful to us, but necessary for salvation. Hence it is that God, because He desires that we should all be saved, has enjoined it on us by a precept. "Ask, and it shall be given you." (Matthew 7:7). It was an error of Wickliff, condemned by the Council of Constance, to say that prayer was a matter of counsel to us, and not of precept. Jesus Christ says, that men "ought always to pray." (Luke 18:1). He does not say it is useful or benefitting, but that men "ought always to pray." Wherefore, the Doctors of the Church justly say that a man cannot be excused from grievous [i.e., mortal] sin who neglects to recommend himself to God at least once in a month and whenever he finds himself assaulted by any strong temptation.

The reason for this necessity of recommending ourselves often to God arises from our inability to do any good work or to have any good thoughts of ourselves. "Without Me you can do nothing," says Jesus Christ. (John 15:5). And St. Paul teaches the same: "Not that we are sufficient to think anything of ourselves, as of ourselves." (2 Corinthians 3:5). Therefore, St. Philip Neri used to say that he despaired of himself. On the other hand, St. Augustine writes that God desires to give us His graces, but does not bestow them, except on those who ask for them. And especially, says the Saint, He only gives the grace of perseverance to those who seek it.

And as the devil never ceases to go about in order to devour us, we ought necessarily to defend ourselves unceasingly by prayer. "Continual prayer is necessary for man," says St. Thomas. And Jesus Christ Himself was the first to teach us: "We ought always to pray and not to faint." (Luke 18:1). Otherwise, how shall we be able to resist the incessant temptations of the world and the devil? It was an error of Jansenius, condemned by the Church, to say that the observance of certain precepts was impossible to us and that sometimes the grace which would render it possible is wanting to us. But "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that which you are able," as St. Paul assures us. (1 Corinthians 10:13). Yet He requires that when we are tempted, we should have recourse to Him for help to resist. St. Augustine writes: "The law is given that grace may be sought; grace is given that the law may be fulfilled." Seeing that the law cannot be obeyed by us without grace, God has yet given us the law in order that we may seek the grace to fulfill it. And this was well expressed by the Council of Trent in these words: "God does not command impossibilities, but in commanding, He admonishes thee both to do what thou canst, and seek aid for what thou canst not do, and He helps thee, that thou mayest be able to do it." (Council of Trent, Session 6, Chapter 11).

Thus, God is very ready to give us His help in order that we may not be overcome by temptation, but this help He gives to those only who have recourse to Him in the time of temptation, and especially in temptations against chastity. For as the Wise Man wrote: "As I knew that I could not otherwise be continent except God gave it . . . I went to the Lord and besought Him." (Wisdom 8:21). Let us rest assured that we would not have strength to overcome our carnal appetites if God did not give us help to do so, and this help we shall not have without prayer; but if we pray, we shall assuredly have it in order to resist all the devils of Hell by the power of God, who strengthens us. As St. Paul says: "I can do all things in Him who strengtheneth me." (Philippians 4:13).

It also helps us very much to obtain divine grace if we have recourse to the intercession of the Saints, for they have great power with God, especially for the benefit of those who are their special clients. And this is not a mere optional devotion, but is a duty, as St. Thomas writes. For he says that the order established by God requires, that we mortals should receive the helps which are necessary for our salvation through the prayers of the Saints.

With greater force must this apply to the intercession of the Most Holy Virgin Mary, whose prayers are of greater efficacy than those of all the Saints, the more so because, as St. Bernard says, it is through Mary that we have access to Jesus Christ, our Mediator and Saviour. "Through thee," says the holy Doctor, "we have access to the Son, O thou finder of grace, mother of salvation, that through thee He may receive us, who through thee was given to us."*

Let us then pray, and pray with confidence, says the Apostle. "Let us go therefore with confidence to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace in seasonable aid." (Hebrews 4:16). Jesus Christ now sits on the throne of grace, to console all who have recourse to Him, and says: "Ask, and it shall be given to you." (Matthew 7:7). On the day of Judgment also, He will be seated on a throne, but it will be a throne of Justice. What madness, then, will not be theirs who, having it in their power to be relieved of their miseries by going to Jesus now that He sits on a throne of grace, yet wait till He will be their Judge and will no more show mercy. Now He says to us that whatever we ask of Him, if we have confidence, shall all be given to us. "All things whatsoever you ask when you pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come to you." (Mark 11:24).

And what more can one friend do to another to show his love than to say, "Ask me for what you wish, and I will give it to you?" St. James, moreover, says: "If any of you want wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men abundantly, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given [to] him." (James 1:5). By "wisdom" is here meant the knowledge how to save one's soul; to have this wisdom, we must therefore seek of God the graces necessary to obtain salvation. And will God give them? Assuredly He will give them, and He will give them superabundantly, and more than we ask for. Let us observe also the words, He "upbraideth not." (James 1:5). If the sinner repents of his sins and asks salvation from God, God will not act as men do, who reproach the ungrateful with their ingratitude and refuse them what they ask; but He gives to them willingly, as much as and even more than He is asked for. If then we would be saved, we must, even till death, have our lips ever opened to pray and say: "My God, help me; my God, have mercy; Mary, have mercy." If we cease to pray, we shall be lost. Let us pray for ourselves and let us pray for sinners, for this is so pleasing to God. Let us pray also every day for the Holy Souls in Purgatory; those holy prisoners are most grateful to all who pray for them. Moreover, whenever we pray, let us seek graces from God through the merits of Jesus Christ, for He Himself assures us that whatever we ask in His Name, He will give it all to us.

O my God, this is the grace which, above all others, this day I ask of Thee, through the merits of Jesus Christ: grant that throughout my life, and especially in time of temptation, I may recommend myself to Thee and hope for Thy help, for the love of Jesus and Mary.

O holy Virgin, obtain for me this grace, on which depends my salvation.

[* St. Alphonsus adds here: I think I have sufficiently proved, both in my book called The Glories of Mary (Ch. V. § 1, 2) and also in my work On Prayer (Ch. 1) the opinion held by many Saints, especially St. Bernard—and by many theologians, as for example, F. Natalis Alexander and F. Contensonius—that all the graces which we receive from God are received by means of Mary. Hence also, St. Bernard says: "Let us seek grace, and let us seek it through Mary; for he that seeks, finds, and cannot be disappointed." The same was said by St. Peter Damian, St. Bonaventure, St. Bernardine, St. Antoninus and others.]

Reflection 8

I MUST ONE DAY DIE

IT IS a practice very profitable for our eternal salvation to say often to ourselves: "I must one day die." The Church every year, on Ash Wednesday, gives this reminder to the faithful: "Remember, Man, that thou art dust, and into dust thou shalt return." (Cf. Genesis 3:19). And this certainty of death is brought to our recollection very often during the year, sometimes by the burial-grounds which we pass upon the road, sometimes by the tombs which we see in churches, sometimes by the dead who are carried to burial.

The most precious furniture which was carried by the anchorites to their caves was a cross and a skull to remind them of the day of their own death. And thus they persevered in penitential works till the end of their days, and dying in poverty in the deserts, they died more happy than kings who die in their palaces.

"The end is come, the end is come!" cries the Prophet Ezechiel. (Ezechiel 7:2). In this world, one man lives a longer, another a shorter time; but for everyone, sooner or later, the end must come; and when that end has come, nothing else will comfort us at the point of death but to have loved Jesus Christ and to have endured with patience the trials of this life for the love of Him. No, at that moment, neither the riches we have acquired, nor the honors we have gained, nor the pleasures we have enjoyed will console us. All the greatness of this world cannot comfort a dying man; it only afflicts him; and the more he has gained of it, the more does he suffer. Sister Margaret of St. Anne, a barefooted Carmelite and daughter of the Emperor Rudolph II, used to say: "What benefit are kingdoms at the hour of death?"

Alas, to how many men of the world does it not happen that, at the very time when they are most engrossed in securing riches, land and honors, they receive the summons of death and have to hear the warning: "Take order with thy house, for thou shalt die, and not live!" (Isaias 38:1). "Friend, it is time you should think of making your will, for you are very sick." O God! how great will be the anguish of a man who is about to gain some lawsuit, or come into possession of a mansion or an estate when he hears the priest who has come to recommend his soul to God address to him the words: "Go forth, Christian soul, from this world. Depart from this world, and go to render thy account to Jesus Christ." "But now," he cries, "I am not well prepared." "What matter? Thou must now depart."

O my God, give me light, give me strength, to spend the rest of my life in serving and loving Thee. If now I should have to die, I should not die happy, I should die disturbed. What then do I wait for? Do I wait for death to seize me unprepared, with great danger to my eternal salvation? O Lord, if I have been foolish in the past, I will not be foolish any longer. Now I give myself wholly to Thee; do Thou receive me and help me with Thy grace.

In a word, to everyone that end must come, and with the end will come that moment decisive of a happy or a wretched eternity. O moment on which eternity depends! Oh, that all would think upon that great moment and on the account of their whole life which they must give at that moment to their Judge! "Oh that they would be wise and would understand and would provide for their last end!" (Deuteronomy 32:29). They certainly would not then devote themselves to amassing riches, or labor to become great in this life, which must end; but they would think how to become Saints and to be great in that life which never ends.

If then we have faith, let us believe that there is a death, a Judgment, an eternity and endeavor, during the days that yet remain for us, to live only for God. And therefore let us take care to live as pilgrims on this earth, remembering that we must speedily leave it. Let us live with death ever before our eyes, and in all the affairs of this present life, let us take care to act as we should act at the point of death. All things upon earth either leave us, or we have to leave them. Let us listen to Jesus Christ, who says: "Lay up to yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither the rust nor moth doth consume." (Matthew 6:20). Let us despise the treasures of earth, which cannot satisfy us and which speedily end; and let us gain for ourselves the treasures of Heaven, which will make us happy and will never end.

Miserable am I, O Lord, in that I have so often, for the sake of the goods of earth, turned my back upon Thee, who art the Infinite Good! I see my folly in having in the past sought to acquire a great name and make my fortune in the world. From this day forward, my only ambition shall be to love Thee and in everything to fulfill Thy will. O my Jesus, do Thou take from me the desire to be seen; make me love contempt and a hidden life. Give me strength to deny myself in everything which displeases Thee. Make me embrace with peace, infirmities, persecutions, desolation and all the crosses Thou shalt send me. Oh, that I could die for the love of Thee, abandoned by all, as Thou didst die for me!

Holy Virgin, thy prayers can enable me to find my true happiness, which is to love earnestly thy Son. Oh, pray to Him for me; in thee I trust.

Reflection 9

PREPARATION FOR DEATH

DEATH is certain: "It is appointed unto men once to die." (Hebrews 9:27). On the contrary, the time and manner of our death is uncertain. Therefore, Jesus Christ exhorts us: "Be you then also ready, for at what hour you think not, the Son of man will come." (Luke 12:40). He says: "Be you ready." Therefore, to save our souls, it is not sufficient to prepare ourselves to die when death comes, but we must then be already prepared to embrace it in whatever manner and with whatever circumstances it may come to us. It is accordingly useful for everyone to repeat, at least once a month, the following acts.

Behold me, O my God, ready to embrace that death which Thou dost destine for me. From this moment I accept it, and I sacrifice to Thee my life in honor of Thy Divine Majesty, and also in penance for my sins, rejoicing that this my flesh, to please which I have offended Thee so much, should be devoured by worms and be reduced to dust. O my Jesus I unite the pains and the agony which I must then suffer to the pains and agony which Thou, my Saviour, didst suffer in Thy death. I accept death with all the circumstances Thou mayest appoint; I accept the time, whether it be after many years, or in a short time; I accept the manner, whether in bed or out of it, whether with warning or suddenly, and from that sickness, more or less painful, as it may please Thee. In everything I resign myself to Thy holy Will. Give me strength to suffer all with patience.

"What shall I render to the Lord for all the things that He hath rendered to me?" (Psalms 115:12). I thank Thee, O my God, first, for the gift of faith, protesting that I intend to die a child of the Holy Catholic Church. I thank Thee for not having caused me to die when I was in sin, and for having so often pardoned me, with so much mercy. I thank Thee for so many lights and graces with which Thou hast sought to draw me to Thy love. I pray Thee to let me die after receiving Thee in the holy Viaticum, so that, united to Thee, I may go to present myself at Thy tribunal. I do not deserve to hear from Thy mouth the words: "Well done, good and faithful servant: because thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will place thee over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." (Matthew 25:21). I do not deserve it, for in nothing have I been perfectly faithful to Thee; but Thy death gives me hope that I shall be admitted to Heaven, to love Thee there eternally and with all my powers.

O my crucified Love, have mercy upon me! Look upon me with that love with which Thou didst look upon me from the Cross when dying for me. "The sins of my youth and my ignorances do not remember." (Psalms 24:7) My sins terrify me, but I am comforted by that Cross on which I see Thee dead for the love of me. "Behold the wood of the cross, on which hung the salvation of the world." (From the Good Friday traditional liturgy). I desire to end my life, that I may cease from offending Thee. Oh, by the blood that was shed for me, do Thou pardon me all my sins before death comes upon me. O blood of the Innocent One, wash away the stains of the guilty!

My Jesus, I embrace Thy Cross and kiss the wounds of Thy sacred feet, before which I desire to breathe out my soul. Ah, do not abandon me at the last moment. "We beseech Thee therefore, save Thy servants, whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy precious blood." I love Thee with all my heart, I love Thee more than myself, and I repent with all my soul that I have despised Thee in the past. O Lord, I was lost, but Thou in Thy goodness hast delivered me from the world; receive then my soul from this moment, for the hour when it shall leave the earth. Therefore, I pray to Thee with St. Agatha: "O Lord, Thou who hast taken from me the love of this world, receive my soul." "In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever. . . . Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, the God of Truth." (Psalms 30:1, 6).*

O holy Virgin, succor me at the moment of my death. Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for me, a sinner, now and at the hour of my death. In thee, O Lady, have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever. St. Joseph, my protector, obtain for me a holy death. My Guardian Angel, St. Michael the Archangel, defend me in that last conflict with Hell. My holy patrons and all ye Saints of Paradise, succor me in that last moment.

Jesus, Mary and Joseph, be with me at the hour of my death. Amen.

[* Psalms 30:1 has two versions in the Latin Vulgate.]

Reflection 10

HE THAT LOVES GOD MUST LOVE AND NOT ABHOR DEATH

HOW can he ever abhor death who is in the grace of God? "He that abideth in charity abideth in God, and God in him." (1 John 4:16). He, therefore, that loves God is secure of His grace, and dying thus, he is sure of going to enjoy Him forever in the kingdom of the Blessed. And shall such a one fear death? David well said: "Enter not into judgment with Thy servant, for in Thy sight no man living shall be justified." (Psalms 142:2). This means that no man may presume to be saved by his own merits, for no one but Jesus and Mary can say that he has been without sin throughout his whole life. But he ought not to fear death if, with true repentance for his sins, he trusts in the merits of Jesus Christ, who came on earth to save sinners. "The Son of Man is come to save that which was lost." (Matthew 18:11). And in fact He died and poured forth all His blood to save sinners. The blood of Jesus Christ, says the Apostle, speaks more in favor of sinners than the blood of Abel spoke against Cain, who murdered him.

It is true that, without a divine revelation, no man can possess an infallible certainty of his own salvation; but he that has given himself with a sincere heart to God and is ready to lose everything, even life itself, rather than lose the divine grace, has a moral certainty that he will be saved. The certainty is founded on the divine promises. "No one," says the Scripture, "hath hoped in the Lord and hath been confounded." (Ecclesiasticus 2:11). Almighty God declares in so many passages, that He does not desire the death of the sinner, but that he be converted and saved. "Is it My Will that a sinner should die, saith the Lord God, and not that he should be converted from his ways and live?" (Ezechiel 18:23). In another place, He makes the same declaration, and adds an oath: "As I live, saith the Lord God, I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live." (Ezechiel 33:11). And in the same chapter, God laments over those obstinate sinners who choose to perish because they will not leave their sins, and says: "Why will you die, O House of Israel?" (Ezechiel 33:11). And to those who repent of the evil done, He promises to forget all their transgressions. "If the wicked do penance for all his sins which he hath committed . . . living, he shall live and shall not die. I will not remember all his iniquities that he hath done." (Ezechiel 18:21–22).

Moreover, when a sinner hates the sin he has committed, it is a certain sign that he has been already pardoned. A holy Father says that who ever can truly say with David, "I have hated and abhorred iniquity," (Psalms 118:163), may be certain of having been forgiven. Another certain sign of having recovered grace is to have persevered in a good life for a long time after having sinned. It is also a great sign of being in the state of grace to have a firm resolution to lose one's life rather than lose the friendship of God; as also to have an earnest desire to love Him and to see Him loved by others, and to feel distress at seeing Him offended.

How is it, then, that certain great Saints, after having given themselves wholly to God, and after a life of mortification and detachment from all earthly goods, have felt at the hour of death great terrors at the thought of appearing before Christ their Judge? I reply that those Saints who have suffered these fears at the moment of death have been very few and that it was the Will of God that they should thus purge away some remains of their sins before entering into a blessed eternity, but that, ordinarily speaking, all the Saints have died in great peace and with an ardent desire to die in order to go and see God. And for the rest, there is this difference between sinners and Saints at the hour of death: that sinners from fear pass to despair, and Saints from fear pass to confidence, and thus die in peace.

Therefore, everyone who has signs that he is in the grace of God ought to desire death, repeating the prayer which Jesus Christ has taught us, "Thy kingdom come," and he ought to embrace death with joy when it comes, both in order that he may be freed from sin by leaving this world, where no one lives without imperfections, and that he may go to behold God face to face and love Him with all his strength in the Kingdom of Love.

O my beloved Jesus and my Judge, when Thou shalt judge me, for Thy mercy's sake, condemn me not to Hell. In Hell I could not love Thee, but should have to hate Thee forever; and how could I hate Thee who art so worthy of love and who hast so loved me? If Thou wilt send me to Hell, at least grant me grace to be able to love Thee there with all my heart. On account of my sins, I do not deserve this grace, but if I do not deserve it, Thou hast merited it for me with the blood which Thou didst shed in such agony for me upon the Cross. O my Judge, inflict on me every pain, but deprive me not of the power of loving Thee.

O Mother of God, behold the peril in which I stand of being condemned to be unable to love thy Son, who deserves an infinite love; help me; have pity on me!

Reflection 11

OUR SALVATION IS IN THE CROSS

"BEHOLD the wood of the Cross, on which hung the Salvation of the world!" So sings Holy Church on Good Friday [in her Sacred Liturgy]. In the Cross is our salvation, our strength against temptations, our detachment from earthly pleasures; in the Cross is found true love of God. We must, therefore, resolve to bear with patience that cross which Jesus Christ sends us, and to die upon it for the love of Him, as He died upon His Cross for the love of us. There is no other way to enter Heaven but by resigning ourselves to tribulations until death. And this is the means to find peace, even in suffering. When the cross comes, what means is there, I ask, for not losing peace, except uniting ourselves to the divine will? If we do not take this means, go where we will, do what we may, we shall never escape from the weight of the cross. On the contrary, if we carry it with good will, it will bear us to Heaven and give us peace on earth.

What does he do who refuses the Cross? He increases its weight. But he who embraces it and bears it with patience, lightens its weight, and the weight itself becomes a consolation; for God abounds with graces for all those who carry the cross with a good will in order to please Him. Naturally, there is no pleasure in suffering; but divine love, when it reigns in a heart, makes it take delight in sufferings.

Oh, if only we would consider the state of happiness which we shall enjoy in Paradise if we are faithful to God in enduring trials without complaining! We should not murmur against God, who commands us to suffer, but we should say with Job: "And that this may be my comfort, that afflicting me with sorrow, He spare not, nor I contradict the words of the Holy One." (Job 6:10). And if we are sinners and have deserved Hell, this should be our comfort in the tribulations which befall us, to see that we are chastised in this life, because this is the sure sign that God wishes to deliver us from eternal chastisement. Unfortunate is that sinner who prospers in this world! Whoever suffers any grievous trial, let him cast a glance at the Hell which he has deserved, and thus every pain he endures will seem light. If, then, we have committed sins, this ought to be our continual prayer to God: O Lord, spare not pains, but give me, I pray Thee, strength to endure them with patience, that I may not oppose myself to Thy holy Will, "nor I contradict the words of the Holy One," (Job 6:10), but in everything conform myself with whatever Thou shalt appoint for me, saying always with Jesus Christ, "Yea, Father, for so hath it seemed good in Thy sight." (Matthew 11:26).

The soul which is governed by divine love seeks only God. "If a man should give all the substance of his house for love, he shall despise it as nothing," says Holy Scripture. (Canticle of Canticles 8:7). He that loves God despises everything and renounces everything which does not help him to love God; and in all the good works which he does, in his penitential acts and his labors for the glory of God, he does not go seeking his consolations and spiritual sweetness; it is enough for him to know that he pleases God. In a word, he is attentive, ever and in all things, to deny himself, renouncing every pleasure of his own; and having done so, he boasts of nothing and is puffed up with nothing, but calls himself an unprofitable servant, and setting himself in the lowest place, he abandons himself to the divine will and mercy.

We must change our tastes in order to become saints. If we do not arrive at a state in which bitter appears sweet and sweet bitter, we shall never attain to a perfect union with God. In this consists all our security and perfection, in enduring with resignation all things that are contrary to our inclinations, as they happen to us, day by day, whether they are small or great. And we must suffer them for those wise ends for which the Lord desires that we should endure them: first, to purify ourselves from the sins we have committed; secondly, to merit eternal life; thirdly, to give pleasure to God, which is the chief and most noble end which we can aim at in all our actions.

Let us then always offer ourselves to God, to suffer every cross which He may send us; and let us take care to be ever ready to endure every hardship for the love of Him, in order that, when it comes, we may be ready to embrace it, saying, as Jesus Christ said to St. Peter when He was taken in the garden by the Jews to be led to death: "The chalice which My Father hath given Me, shall I not drink it?" (John 18:11). God has given me this cross for my good, and shall I say to Him that I will not accept it?

And whenever the weight of any cross seems very great, let us immediately have recourse to prayer, and God will give us strength to carry it meritoriously. And let us then recollect what St. Paul says, that: "The sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory to come, that shall be revealed in us." (Romans 8:18). Let us, therefore, reanimate our faith whenever tribulations afflict us. Let us first cast a glance upon our crucified Lord, who suffered agonies upon the Cross for our love; and let us then cast a glance up to Paradise, and on the good things which God prepares for those who suffer for His love. And thus we shall not complain, but thank Him for the pains He gives us to endure and ask Him to give us more to suffer. Oh, how the Saints rejoice in Heaven, not that they have possessed honors and pleasures upon earth, but that they have suffered for Jesus Christ! Everything that passes away is trifling; that only is great which is eternal and never passes away.

O my Jesus, how consoling is that which Thou sayest to me: "Turn ye to Me . . . and I will turn to you." (Zacharias 1:3). For the sake of creatures and of my own miserable pleasures, I have left Thee; now I leave all and return to Thee; and I am confident that Thou wilt not reject me, if I desire to love Thee, for Thou hast told me that Thou art ready to embrace me, saying: "I will turn to you." Receive me, then, into Thy grace; make me know the great Good which Thou art and the love which Thou hast borne to me, so that I may no more leave Thee. O my Jesus, pardon me; my Beloved, pardon me; my Love, pardon me all the displeasures I have caused Thee. Give me the love of Thee, and then do with me what Thou wilt. Chastise me as much as Thou wilt; deprive me of everything, but deprive me not of Thyself. Let the whole world come and offer me all its goods; I protest that I desire Thee alone and nothing more.

O my Mother, recommend me to thy Son; He gives thee whatever thou askest; in thee I trust.

Reflection 12

HOW MUCH IT PLEASES JESUS CHRIST THAT WE SUFFER FOR THE LOVE OF HIM

IF ANY MAN will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me." (Luke 9:23). It will be useful here to make some reflections on these words of Jesus Christ. He says: "If any man will come after me." He does not say: "to me," but "after me." Our Lord desires that we should come after Him; we must therefore walk on the same road of thorns and sufferings in which He walked. He goes before, and does not stop until He reaches Calvary, where He dies. Therefore, if we love Him, we must follow Him, even till death. And thus it is necessary that every one of us should deny himself; that is, that he should deprive himself of everything which self-love demands, but is not pleasing to Jesus Christ.

Our Lord says further: "Let him . . . take up his cross daily, and follow Me." (Luke 9:23). Let us consider these last words, one by one. "Let him take up;" it avails little to carry the cross by compulsion; all sinners bear it, but without merit; to bear it with merit, we must embrace it willingly. "His cross"—under this word is implied every kind of tribulation, which is called a "cross" by Jesus Christ, in order that this name may render it sweet, from the thought that He died on a cross for love of us.

He says, moreover, "his cross." Some persons, when they receive some spiritual consolation, offer themselves to suffer as much as was endured by the martyrs—racks, nails and red-hot iron plates; but then they cannot endure a headache, the neglect of a friend, the ill temper of a relation. My brother, my sister, God does not ask you to endure racks, nor hot irons, nor piercing nails; but He desires that you should suffer patiently this pain, this contempt, this annoyance. A certain nun would willingly go to suffer in a desert; she would perform great acts of penance; but yet she cannot endure such a one for her superior, or such a one for her companion in her office; but God desires that she should bear that cross which He gives her to suffer, and not that which she would herself choose.

He says "daily." Some persons embrace the cross at first when it comes; but when it lasts long, they say, "Now I can bear it no more." Yet God wills that you should go on enduring it with patience, even if you should have to bear it continually till death. Behold, then, wherein salvation and perfection consist. It is in these few words: "Deny thyself." We must deny our self-love in whatever is wrong. "Take up thy cross," that is, we must embrace the cross which God sends us. "And follow Me": we must follow the footsteps of Jesus Christ, even till death.

We must be persuaded that for this end God keeps us in the world, that we may bear the crosses He sends us, and in this consists the merit of our life. Therefore, our Saviour, because He loves us, came into this world, not for enjoyment, but to suffer, in order that we might follow in His steps. "For unto this are you called, because Christ also suffered for us, leaving you an example, that you should follow His steps." (1 Peter 2:21). Let us look at Him, as He goes before with His cross, to trace for us the road by which we must follow Him if we would be saved. Oh what a remedy it is for every trouble that befalls us to say to Jesus Christ: "Lord, is it Thy will that I should endure this cross? I accept it, and will endure it as long as it pleases Thee!"

Many persons are delighted to hear others speak of prayer, of peace, of love for Jesus Christ; but they find little pleasure in hearing anyone speak of crosses and of sufferings. Such persons love Him only so long as they enjoy spiritual sweetness, but if this ceases and there comes some adversity or desolation, in which God hides Himself in order to try them, and deprives them of their accustomed consolations, they leave off prayer, Communions and mortifications and abandon themselves to sadness and lukewarmness and seek comfort in worldly amusements. But these souls love themselves more than Jesus Christ; on the contrary, they who do not love Him with an interested love for the sake of consolations, but with a pure love, and solely because He is worthy of love, do not leave their usual devout exercises for any dryness or weariness which they experience, being content with pleasing God; and they offer themselves to suffer any desolation, even till death and through all eternity, if God should so will it. Jesus Christ, says St. Francis de Sales, is as worthy of love in desolation as in consolation. Souls enamored of God can find their comfort and sweetness in suffering, in re collecting that they suffer for His love, and they say: "How sweet it is, O my Lord, to those who love Thee to suffer for Thee! Oh, that I might die for the love of Thee, my Jesus, who hast died for me!" All this and still more is deserved from us by Jesus Christ, who chose a life of sufferings and a death of pain—without the slightest relief—for love of us, in order to teach us that, if we want to love Him, we must love Him as He loved us. Oh how dear to Jesus Christ is a soul which suffers and loves Him! O divine gift, gift above every other gift, to love in suffering, and to suffer in loving!

O my Jesus, Thou alone hast been able to teach us these maxims of salvation, all contrary to the maxims of the world; and Thou alone canst give us strength to suffer crosses with patience. I do not pray Thee to exempt me from suffering; I only ask Thee to give me strength to suffer with patience and resignation. O Eternal Father, Thy Son has promised that whatever we ask Thee in His name, Thou wilt give it to us. Behold, we ask this of Thee: give us grace to endure with patience the pains of this life; hear us for the love of Jesus Christ. And Thou, O my Jesus, pardon me all the offenses I have committed against Thee by not being willing to have patience in the trials Thou hast sent me. Give me Thy love, for that will give me strength to suffer all for love of Thee. Deprive me of everything, of every earthly good, of relations, friends, health of body, of every consolation; deprive me even of life, but not of Thy love. Give me Thyself, and I ask Thee no more.

O most holy Virgin, obtain for me love for Jesus Christ, constant, even till death.

Reflection 13

DIVINE LOVE CONQUERS ALL

LOVE is strong as death," says the Holy Scripture. (Canticle of Canticles 8:6). As death separates us from all the goods of earth, from riches, from honors, from relations, from friends and from all worldly pleasures, so the love of God, when it reigns in a heart, strips it of all affection for these perishable goods. Therefore, the Saints have been seen to strip themselves of everything the world offered them, renounce their possessions, the highest dignities and all they had and fly into deserts or cloisters, to think only on loving God.

The soul cannot exist without loving either the Creator or creatures. Find a soul detached from every earthly love, and you will find it all filled with divine love. Would we know whether we have given ourselves wholly to God? Let us examine ourselves, whether we are weaned from every earthly thing.

Some persons lament that in all their devotions, prayers, Communions, visits to the Blessed Sacrament, they do not find God. To such, St. Teresa says: "Detach your heart from creatures, then seek God, and you will find Him." You will not always find spiritual sweetness, which God does not give without interruption in this life to those who love Him, but only from time to time, to excite in them a longing for those boundless delights which He prepares for them in Paradise; but yet He lets them taste that inward peace which excels all sensual delights, that "peace of God, which," says the Apostle, "surpasseth all understanding." (Philippians 4:7). And what greater delight can be enjoyed by a soul which ardently loves God than to be able to say with true affection: "My God and my all"? St. Francis of Assisi continued a whole night in an ecstasy of Paradise, continually repeating these words: "My God and my all."

"Love is as strong as death." (Canticle of Canticles 8:6). If a dying man were seen moving towards anything, he would give a sign that he was not dead. Death deprives us of everything. He that would give himself altogether to God must leave everything. If he reserves anything, he gives a sign that his love for God is not perfect, but weak.

Divine love strips us of everything. Father Segneri, an eminent servant of God, used to say: "Love for God is a beloved thief, who robs us of every earthly thing." Another servant of God, when he had given to the poor all his possessions and was asked what had reduced him to such poverty, took the book of the Gospels out of his pocket and said: "See, this is what has robbed me of everything." In a word, Jesus Christ will possess our whole heart, and He will have no companion there. St. Augustine writes, that the Roman Senate refused to allow adoration to be paid to Jesus Christ because He was a proud God, who claimed to be honored alone. And so it is, for as He alone is Our Lord, He has every right to be adored and loved by us with an individual love.

St. Francis de Sales says that the pure love of God consumes everything which is not of God. When, therefore, there arises in our heart any affection for something which is not of God, or not loved for the sake of God, we must instantly banish it, saying: "Depart, there is no room here for thee." In this consists that complete renunciation which Our Lord so much recommends, if we would be wholly His; it must be total, that is, of everything, and especially of our relations and friends. How many, by trying to please men, have failed to become saints! David has said: "They . . . that please men . . . have been confounded, because God hath despised them." (Psalm 52:6).

But above all, we must renounce ourselves, by conquering self-love—cursed self-love, which wants to introduce itself into everything, even our holiest actions, by placing before us our own glory or our own pleasure! How many preachers, how many writers, thus lose all their labors! Frequently, even in prayer, in spiritual reading, or in Holy Communion, there enters some motive which is not pure, either the desire of being noticed, or of enjoying spiritual consolations. We must, therefore, be attentive to beat down this enemy who makes us lose our best actions. Hence, we must deprive ourselves, as far as possible, of whatever most pleases us, deprive ourselves of this diversion, for the very reason that it is agreeable; do a service to this disagreeable person, because he is disagreeable; take this bitter medicine, just because it is bitter. Self-love makes it appear to us that nothing is good in which we do not find our own satisfaction; but he that would wholly belong to God must do violence to himself whenever it is a question of anything pleasing to him and say always: "Let me lose everything, provided that I please God."

For the rest, no one is more contented in the world than he who despises all the goods of the world. Whoever strips himself the most of such goods becomes richest in divine graces. Thus does God know how to reward those who love Him faithfully.

But, O my Jesus, Thou knowest my weakness; Thou hast promised to help him who trusts in Thee. O Lord, I love Thee; in Thee I trust; give me strength, and make me entirely Thine own.

In Thee also I trust, O my sweet advocate, Mary.

Reflection 14

ON THE NECESSITY OF MENTAL PRAYER

MENTAL prayer is necessary, in the first place, in order that we may have light on the journey we are making to eternity. The eternal truths are spiritual things, which are not seen with the eyes of the body, but only in the mind, by consideration. He that does not meditate, does not see them; therefore, he walks with difficulty on the way of salvation. And further, he who does not meditate, does not know his defects, and therefore, says St. Bernard, he does not detest them. So also, he does not see the dangers to salvation in which he is, and therefore does not think of avoiding them. But when anyone meditates, his defects and the dangers of losing his soul at once come before him; and seeing them, he will seek to remedy them. St. Bernard says that meditation regulates our affections, directs our actions and corrects our defects.

In the second place, without mental prayer we have not strength to resist temptations and practice virtues. St. Teresa used to say that when a man leaves off mental prayer, the devil has no need of carrying him to Hell, for he throws himself into it of his own accord. And the reason is that, without meditation, there is no prayer. God is most willing to give us His graces, but St. Gregory says that, before giving them, He desires to be asked, and as it were, compelled to give them through our prayers. "God wants to be asked; He wants to be urged; He wants to be overcome by a certain importunity." But without prayer we shall not have strength to resist our enemies, and so we shall not obtain perseverance in virtue. Bishop Palafox, in his note upon the tenth letter of St. Teresa, writes thus: "How will God give us perseverance if we do not ask for it? And how shall we ask it without practicing mental prayer?" But he who practices meditation is "like a tree which is planted near the running waters, which shall bring forth its fruit in due season." (Psalms 1:3).

And further, meditation is the blessed furnace in which souls are inflamed with divine love: "In my meditation," says the Psalmist, "a fire shall flame out." (Psalms 38:4). St. Catherine of Bologna said: "Meditation is that bond which binds the soul to God." In the Sacred Canticles it is written: The King "brought me into the cellar of wine; he set in order charity in me." (Canticle of Canticles 2:4). This wine cellar is meditation, in which the soul becomes so inebriated with divine love that it loses, as it were, its feeling for the things of the world; it sees only that which pleases its Beloved; it speaks only of its Beloved; it would hear others speak only of its Beloved; every other discourse wearies and troubles it. In meditation, the soul retiring to converse alone with God is raised above itself. "He shall sit solitary and hold his peace," says the prophet. (Lamentations 3:28). When the soul sits solitary, that is, remains alone in meditation to consider how worthy God is of love and how great is the love He bears to it, it will there relish the sweetness of God and fill its mind with holy thoughts. There it will detach itself from earthly affections; there it will conceive great desires to become holy and finally resolve to give itself wholly to God.

And where have the Saints made those generous resolutions which have lifted them up to a sublime degree of perfection, if not in mental prayer?

Let us hear what St. John of the Cross said, speaking of mental prayer:

He made me there upon His breast recline;
There science sweet He did to me impart;
There too I gave without reserve my heart,
And pledged myself the spouse of Love Divine.

And St. Aloysius Gonzaga used to say that no one will ever attain a high degree of perfection who is not given to much mental prayer. Let us, then, attach ourselves to it and not leave it on account of any weariness that we may experience: this weariness which we endure for God will be abundantly recompensed by Him.

Pardon me, O my God, my slothfulness. What treasures of grace have I not lost by so often having given up mental prayer! For the future give me grace to be faithful in continuing to converse here on earth with Thee, with whom I hope to converse forever in Heaven. I do not ask Thee to favor me with Thy consolations in prayer; I do not deserve them; it is enough that Thou dost suffer me to remain at Thy feet to recommend to Thee my poor soul, which is poor indeed because it has wandered away from Thee. Here, O my crucified Jesus, the sole memory of Thy Passion shall keep me detached from earth and united with Thee.

O holy Virgin Mary, do thou assist me in prayer.

Reflection 15

THE ENDS OF MENTAL PRAYER

TO MAKE mental prayer well and derive from it great profit to the soul, we must determine the ends for which we intend to make it. First, we must meditate in order to unite ourselves more with God. It is not so much good thoughts in the mind as good acts of the will, or holy affections, which unite us with God; and such are the acts which we make in meditation—of humility, of confidence, of detachment, of resignation, and above all, of love and of repentance for our sins. The acts of love, says St. Teresa, are those which keep the heart inflamed with holy love.

Secondly, we must make mental prayer in order to obtain from God, by petitions, the graces which are necessary in order to enable us to advance in the way of salvation, and especially to obtain the divine light, in order to avoid sin and take the means which will lead us to perfection. The best fruit, therefore, of meditation is the exercise of the prayer of petition. Almighty God, ordinarily speaking, does not give graces to any but to those who pray. St. Gregory writes: "God desires to be entreated, He desires to be constrained, He desires to be conquered by a certain importunity." Observe His words, "to be conquered by importunity." At times, in order to obtain certain graces of special value, it will not suffice simply to pray, but it will be necessary to insist and, as it were, compel God by our prayers to give them to us. It is true that at all times He is ready to hear us, but at the time of meditation, when we are more recollected with God, He is more liberal in giving us His aid.

Above all, during meditation we must be careful to ask Him for perseverance and His holy love. Final perseverance is not one single grace, but a chain of graces, to which must correspond the chain of our prayers; if we cease to pray, God will cease to give us His help, and so we shall be lost. He who does not practice mental prayer will with difficulty persevere in God's grace till death. Bishop Palafox, in his note on St. Teresa's letters, writes thus: "How will the Lord give us perseverance if we do not ask Him for it? And how shall we ask for it without meditation? Without mental prayer, there is no communion with God."

Thus, likewise, must we be urgent with petitions to obtain from God His holy love. St. Francis de Sales used to say that with holy love all virtues come united. "All good things came to me together with her." (Wisdom 7:11). Let our prayer for perseverance and love, therefore, be continual; and in order to make it with greater confidence, let us ever bear in mind the promise made to us by Jesus Christ, that whatever we seek from God through the merits of His Son, He will give it to us. "Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it [to] you." (John 16:23). Let us then pray, and pray always, if we desire that God should make us abound in every blessing. Let us pray for ourselves; and if we have zeal for the glory of God, let us pray also for others. It is a thing most pleasing to God that we should pray to Him for unbelievers and heretics and all sinners. "Let people confess to Thee, O God; let all people give praise to Thee." (Psalms 66:4). Let us say: "O Lord, make them know Thee, make them love Thee." We read in the lives of St. Teresa and St. Mary Magdalen de Pazzi how much God re commended these Saints to pray for sinners. And to our prayers for sinners, let us also add prayers for the Holy Souls in Purgatory.

Thirdly, we must go to meditation, not for the sake of spiritual consolations, but chiefly in order to learn in it what God requires of us. "Speak, Lord," let us say with Samuel, "for Thy servant heareth." (1 Kings 3:10). Lord, make me know what Thou wilt of me, and I will do it. Some persons continue meditation as long as consolations last, but when these cease, they leave off mental prayer. It is true that God is accustomed to console His beloved souls at the time of meditation and to give them some foretaste of the delights He prepares in Heaven for those who love Him. These are things which the lovers of the world do not comprehend; they who are accustomed to have no relish except for earthly delights despise those which are heavenly. Oh, if they had but experienced them, how surely would they leave all their pleasures to shut themselves in a cell to converse alone with God! Mental prayer is nothing else but a conversation between the soul and God: the soul pours forth to Him its affections, its desires, its fears, its petitions; and God speaks to the heart, causing it to know His goodness and the love which He bears it and what it has to do to please Him. "I . . . will lead her into the wilderness, and I will speak to her heart." (Osee 2:14).

But these delights are not always experienced; for the most part, holy souls suffer dryness in meditation. "By dryness and temptations," says St. Teresa, "the Lord makes trial of those who love Him." And she adds: "Even if this dryness lasts through life, let not the soul leave off mental prayer; the time will come when it will be very well paid for all." The time of dryness is the time of greatest pain. "Let us humble ourselves then and be resigned, seeing ourselves without fervor, without good desires, and as it were, unable to make a good act; let us humble ourselves, I say, and resign ourselves, for this very meditation will be more fruitful than others. It is enough then to say, if we can say nothing more, "O Lord, help me, have pity on me, abandon me not!" Let us also have recourse to our com-fortress, the most holy Virgin Mary. Happy is he who does not leave off meditation when in desolation. God will make him abound in graces. Then let him say, "O my God, how can I expect to be consoled by Thee, I who at this hour should deserve to be in Hell, forever separated from Thee and deprived of all hope of being able to love Thee anymore!

I do not therefore complain, O my Lord, that Thou dost deprive me of Thy consolations; I do not deserve them, nor claim them. It is enough for me to know that Thou canst never reject a soul that loves Thee. Deprive me not of the power of loving Thee, and then treat me as Thou wilt. If it is Thy Will that I continue thus afflicted and desolate even till death, and through all eternity, I am content; it is enough if I can say with truth, "My God, I love Thee, I love Thee!"

Mary, Mother of God, have pity on me!

Reflection 16

ON THE MERCY OF GOD

SO GREAT is the desire which God has to dispense to us His graces that, as St. Augustine says, He is more anxious to give them to us than we are desirous to receive them from Him. And the reason is that goodness, as philosophers say, is of its own nature diffusive; it is moved by its nature to diffuse itself in benefits to others. God, therefore, being infinite goodness, has an infinite desire to communicate Himself to us His creatures and make us share His goods.

Hence arises the great compassion which He has for our miseries. David says that the earth is full of the Divine Mercy. It is not full of the Divine Justice because God does not exercise His Justice in punishing evildoers, except when necessary and when He is, as it were, constrained to do so. On the contrary, He is bountiful and liberal in exercising His Mercy upon all, and at all times; whence St. James says: "Mercy exalteth itself above judgment." (James 2:13). Mercy frequently snatches from the Hand of Justice the scourges which are prepared for sinners and obtains their pardon. Therefore the prophet calls God by the very name of Mercy: "My God, my Mercy." (Psalms 58:18). And for the same reason he says, "For Thy name's sake, O Lord, Thou wilt pardon my sin." (Psalms 24:11). Lord, pardon me for Thy name's sake, for Thou art mercy itself.

Isaias said that chastisement is a work which is not according to the heart of God, but alien and foreign to it, as if he would say that it was far from His inclination. "The Lord . . . shall be angry . . . that He may do His work, His strange work; that He may perform His work, His work is strange to Him." (Isaias 28:21). In a word, His mercy it was that induced Him to send His own Son on earth to be made man and to die upon a cross to deliver us from eternal death. Therefore, Zachary exclaimed: "Through the bowels of the mercy of our God, in which the Orient from on high hath visited us." (Luke 1:78). The expression, "the bowels of the mercy of God," implies a mercy which proceeds from the depth of the heart of God, since He was content that His own Son-made-man should die, rather than that we should perish.

In order to see how great is the compassion of God for us and the desire He has to do us good, it is enough to read these few words which He says to us in the Gospel: "Ask, and it shall be given you." (Luke 11:9). What more could one friend say to another to show his affection? Ask me what you will, and I will give it to you. This is what God says to everyone of us. Seeing our misery, He invites us to come to Him and promises to relieve us: "Come to Me, all you that labor and are burdened, and I will refresh you." (Matthew 11:28). The Jews on one occasion complained of God and said they would no longer go to ask favors of Him; wherefore, He said to Jeremias: "Am I become a wilderness to Israel, or a lateward springing land? Why then have My people said: 'We are revolted; we will come to Thee no more?'" (Jeremias 2:31). At the same time, God was willing to prove the wrong which the Jews did to Him, since He always and immediately consoles everyone who has recourse to Him, as He said by Isaias: "As soon as He shall hear, He will answer Thee." (Isaias 30:19).

Art thou a sinner, and wilt thou have pardon? "Doubt not," says St. John Chrysostom, "for God has more desire to pardon thee than thou hast to be pardoned." If then God sees anyone obstinate in his sin, He waits in order to show him mercy, as Isaias says: "Therefore the Lord waiteth, that He may have mercy on you." (Isaias 30:18). And meantime He points out the chastisement that awaits him, in order that he may repent. "Thou hast given a warning to them that fear Thee, that they may flee from before the bow; that thy beloved may be delivered." (Psalms 59:6). At one time He stands and knocks at the door of our hearts, that we may open to Him: "Behold, I stand at the gate, and knock." (Apocalypse 3:20). At another, He entreats His people, saying, "Why will you die, O house of Israel?" (Ezechiel 18:31). As if He were saying, in compassion, "O my son, why wilt thou perish?" St. Dionysius the Areopagite writes, "God follows like a lover, even those who turn from Him, and entreats them not to perish." And this same thing was written before by the Apostle, when he implored sinners, on the part of Jesus Christ, to be reconciled with God, on which Chrysostom remarks: "Christ Himself is beseeching you, and what does He beseech you? That you would be reconciled to God."

If then some determine to continue obstinate, what more can God do? He makes all understand that whosoever comes to Him penitent, He will not drive him away: "Him that cometh to Me, I will not cast out." (John 6:37). He says that He is ready to embrace everyone who turns to Him: "Turn ye to Me . . . and I will turn to you." (Zacharias 1:3). He promises every wicked man that if he repents, He will pardon him and forget his sins. "If the wicked do penance, he shall live; I will not remember all his iniquities that he hath done." He even says: "Come, and accuse Me; . . . if your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow" (Isaias 1:18)—as though He would say: "Come unto Me, repentant sinners, and if I embrace you not, reproach Me as one who had broken his word."

But no, the Lord knoweth not how to despise a contrite heart. "A contrite and humbled heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise." (Psalms 50:19). We read in St. Luke with what joy He embraced the lost sheep and with what love He welcomed the Prodigal Son when he returned to His feet. And Our Lord Himself adds: "I say to you that even so, there shall be joy in Heaven upon one sinner that doth penance, more than upon ninety-nine just who need not penance." (Luke 15:7). St. Gregory explains the reason for this by saying that, for the most part, penitent sinners are more fervent in loving God than those who, being innocent, have grown lukewarm in their security.

O my Jesus, since Thou hast had so great patience with me in waiting for me and so great love in pardoning me, as I trust, I resolve to love Thee very much; but it is Thou who must give me this love. Give it to me, O my Lord; little honor were it to Thee that I, a sinner so favored by Thee, should love Thee but little. O my Jesus, when shall I begin to be as grateful to Thee as Thou hast been gracious to me? In the past, instead of being grateful to Thee, I have offended and despised Thee. Shall I then hereafter always behave thus towards Thee, who hast spared nothing to gain my love? No, my Saviour, I will love Thee with all my heart, I resolve never to displease Thee. Thou dost command me to love Thee, and I desire nothing else but to love Thee. Thou dost seek me, and I seek nothing but Thee. Give me Thy help, without which I can do nothing.

O Mary, O Mother of mercy, draw me entirely to God.

Reflection 17

ON CONFIDENCE IN JESUS CHRIST

WONDERFULLY great, as has been said, is the mercy of Jesus Christ to us; but for our greater good, He desires that we should hope in His mercy with a lively confidence, trusting in His merits and His promises. Therefore, St. Paul recommends to us this confidence, saying, "Do not therefore lose your confidence, which hath a great reward." (Hebrews 10:35). And therefore, when a fear of the Divine judgments seems to diminish this confidence in us, we ought to drive it away, and say to ourselves with the Psalmist: "Why art thou sad, O my soul, and why dost thou trouble me? Hope in God, for I will still give praise to Him, the salvation of my countenance and my God." (Psalms 41:6–7).

Our Lord revealed to St. Gertrude that our confidence offers such violence to Him that He cannot possibly refuse to hear us in everything we ask of Him. The same thing was said by St. John Climacus: "Prayer exercises a holy violence upon God." Every prayer offered with confidence, as it were, forces God, but this force is acceptable and pleasing to Him. Therefore, St. Bernard writes that the Divine Mercy is like an inexhaustible fountain, from which whosoever brings the larger vessel of confidence, carries away the greater abundance of graces. And this is according to what the Psalmist wrote: "Let Thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us, as we have hoped in Thee." (Psalms 32:22).

God has declared that He protects and saves all who trust in Him. Let all, then, rejoice, says David, who hope in Thee, my God; they shall be blessed forever, and Thou wilt ever dwell in them. (Cf. Psalms 5:12). The same prophet said: "Mercy shall encompass him that hopeth in the Lord." (Psalms 31:10). He that trusts in God shall be ever so encircled and guarded around that he will be safe from danger of perishing. Oh, what great promises the Holy Scriptures make to those who trust in God! Do we seem to be lost through the sins we have committed? Behold, the remedy at hand! "Let us go therefore with confidence," says the Apostle, "to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace in seasonable aid." (Hebrews 4:16). Let us not defer going to Jesus Christ until He is seated as Judge on His throne of Judgment; let us hasten at once, while He sits on His throne of grace. St. John Chrysostom says that our Saviour has a greater desire to pardon us than we have to be pardoned.

But, says some sinner, I do not deserve to be heard if I beg for pardon. I reply that though he has not deserved it, his confidence in the Divine Mercy will obtain grace for him, because this pardon is not dependent upon his merits, but upon the Divine promise to pardon those who repent; and this is what Jesus Christ says: "Everyone that asketh, receiveth." (Matthew 7:8). A learned author, commenting on the word "everyone," says that it means "everyone," whether just or sinner; it is sufficient that he pray with confidence. Let us, then, hear from the lips of Jesus Christ Himself what great things are done by confidence: "All things whatsoever you ask when you pray, believe that you shall receive, and they shall come unto you." (Mark 11:24).

Whosoever, then, fears that through weakness he will fall again into his old sins, let him trust in God, and he shall not fall, as the Psalmist assures us: "None of them that trust in Him shall offend." (Psalms 33:23). Isaias says that they who hope in the Lord renew their strength (Isaias 40:31); he means that they acquire a new strength. Let us, then, be firm in not wavering in our confidence, because God has promised, as St. Paul says, to protect all who hope in Him; and therefore, when anything seems especially difficult to overcome, let us say: "I can do all things in Him who strengtheneth me." (Philippians 4:13). And who that ever trusted in God was lost? "Know ye," says the Wise Man, "that no one hath hoped in the Lord, and hath been confounded." (Ecclesiasticus 2:11). Yet, let us not go about seeking always that sensible confide nce we should wish to feel; it is enough if we have the will to trust. This is true confidence, the will to trust in God because He is good and desires to help us, and is powerful and can help us, and is faithful and has promised to help us. Above all, let us avail ourselves of the promise made by Jesus Christ: "Amen, amen, I say to you: if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it [to] you." (John 16:23). Thus, let us seek graces from God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, and we shall obtain whatever we will.

O Eternal God, I well know that I am poor in all things; I can do nothing, I have nothing, save what has come to me from Thy hands; therefore, all I say to Thee is, "Lord, have mercy upon me." The worst of it is that to my poverty I have added the sin of having abused Thy graces by the offenses I have committed against Thee. But notwithstanding all this, I will hope from Thy goodness this twofold mercy: first, that Thou wouldst give me holy perseverance, together with Thy love and with the grace to pray to Thee always to help me, even till death. All this I ask of Thee, and I hope for it, through the merits of Thy Son Jesus and of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

O my Great Advocate, succor me with thy prayers.

Reflection 18

SALVATION ALONE IS NECESSARY

"ONE THING is necessary." It is not necessary that in this world we should be honored with dignities, that we should be provided with riches, with good health and with earthly pleasures; but it is necessary that we should be saved; for there is no middle course; if we are not saved, we must be damned. After this short life, we shall be either always happy in Heaven, or always miserable in Hell.

O my God, what will be my lot? Shall I be saved or lost? One lord or the other must necessarily be mine. I hope to be saved, but who assures me of it? I know that I have so many times deserved Hell. Jesus, my Saviour, Thy death is my hope.

How many persons are there in the world who were once upon a time loaded with riches and honors and lifted up to high positions, and even to thrones, and now find themselves in Hell, where all the fortune they enjoyed in this world serves only to increase their torments and despair! Behold the warning which Our Lord gives us: "Lay not up to yourselves treasures on earth . . . but lay up to yourselves treasures in Heaven, where neither the rust nor moth doth consume." (Matthew 6:19–20). Every gain of earthly goods is lost at death, but the gain of spiritual goods is an incomparable treasure and is eternal.

God has taught us that He "will have all men to be saved." (1 Timothy 2:4). And to all He gives the help needed for salvation. Miserable is he who is lost; it is entirely his own fault: "Destruction is thy own, O Israel; thy help is only in me." (Osee 13:9). And this will be the greatest torment of the poor reprobate, the thought that they are lost through their own fault. "The vengeance on the flesh of the ungodly," says the Scriptures, "is fire and worms." (Ecclesiasticus 7:19). Fire and worms, that is, the remorse of conscience, will be the torturers of the damned in punishment for their sins; but the worm will forever torment them, more terribly than the fire. How much regret we suffer in this world from the loss of any object of value—a diamond, a watch, a purse of money—when it happens through our own carelessness. We cannot eat or sleep for thinking of our loss, even though there is a hope of our repairing it in some other way. What then will be the torment of one who is lost, in thinking that, through his own fault he has lost God and Paradise, without a hope of ever being able to recover them!

"Therefore we have erred from the way of truth." (Wisdom 5:6). This will be the eternal lamentation of the miserable damned ones. "Therefore we have erred," losing our souls of our own accord, and there is no longer a remedy for our error! In all the misfortunes which occur to many in this life, a remedy is found in time either from a change of circumstances, or at least through a holy resignation to the will of God. But none of these remedies will be for us when we have reached eternity, if we have wandered from the way to Heaven.

Therefore, the Apostle St. Paul exhorts us to labor for eternal salvation with a continual fear of losing it: "With fear and trembling, work out your salvation." (Philippians 2:12). This fear will cause us always to walk with caution and fly from dangerous occasions; it will make us continually recommend ourselves to God, and thus we shall be saved. Let us pray to Him, that he would make us fix firmly in our minds the thought that upon our last gasp of breath before death depends the question whether we shall be eternally happy or eternally miserable without hope of remedy.

My God, many times have I despised Thy grace; I should deserve no mercy; but Thy prophet tells me that "The Lord is good to . . . the soul that seeketh Him." (Lamentations 3:25). In the past I have fled from Thee; but now I seek nothing, I ask nothing, I love nothing but Thee. In pity, despise me not; remember the blood Thou hast shed for me.

This blood and thy intercession, O Mary, Mother of God, are all my hope.

Reflection 19

ON PERFECT RESIGNATION TO THE DIVINE WILL

"MY MEAT is to do the will of Him that sent Me." (John 4:34). So said Jesus Christ, speaking of Himself. In this mortal life, meat is that which preserves our life, and therefore Our Lord said that it was His meat to do the will of the Father. This also ought to be the meat of our souls: "Life is in His good will." (Psalms 29:6). Our life consists in doing the Divine Will; he that does not fulfill it is dead.

The Wise Man says: "They that are faithful in love shall rest in Him," (Wisdom 3:9), that is to say, "shall acquiesce and submit to His will." They who are little faithful in loving God will desire that He should acquiesce with them, that He should conform Himself to their pleasure and do whatever they desire; but they who love God unite themselves with His Will and acquiesce in everything that God does with them and with all that concerns them. In every adversity which afflicts them, whether sickness, dishonor, annoyances, loss of property or of relations, they have ever on their lips and in their hearts: "Thy will be done," which is the usual aspiration of the Saints.

God desires only that which is best for us, namely, our sanctification. "This is the will of God," says the Apostle, "your sanctification." (1 Thessalonians 4:3). Let us take care, therefore, to subdue our own wills, uniting them always to the will of God; and thus also let us endeavor to control our minds, reflecting that everything that God does is best for us. Whoever does not act thus will never find true peace. All the perfection which can be attained in this world, which is a place of purifications and consequently a place of troubles and afflictions, consists in suffering patiently those things which are opposed to our self-love; and in order to suffer them with patience, there is no means more efficacious than a willingness to suffer them in order to do the will of God. "Submit thyself then to Him, and be at peace." (Job 22:21). He that acquiesces to the Divine Will in everything is always at peace, and nothing of all that happens to him can make him unhappy. "Whatsoever shall befall the just man, it shall not make him sad." (Proverbs 12:21). But why is the just man never miserable in any circumstances? Because he knows well that whatever happens in the world happens through the will of God.

The Divine Will (so to say) blunts the point of the thorns and takes away the bitterness of the tribulations which come upon us in this world.

In the hymn on the Will of God, we say:

Thou makest crosses soft and light,
And death itself seem sweet and bright;
No cross nor fear that soul dismays
Whose will to Thee united stays.
O Will of God! O Will Divine!
All, all our love be ever Thine!

Behold the excellent counsel which St. Peter gives, that we may find perfect peace in the midst of the many trials of this present life: "Casting all your care upon Him, for He has care of you." (1 Peter 5:7). But if it is God who thus takes on Himself all thought for our welfare, why should we fret ourselves with so many anxieties, as if our welfare depended on our own efforts, and not rather abandon ourselves into the hands of God, upon whom all depends? "Cast thy care upon the Lord," says David, "and He shall sustain thee." (Psalms 54:23). Let us be attentive to obey God in everything He commands and counsels us, and then let us leave to Him the care of our salvation, and He will remember to give us all the means which are necessary, in order that we may be saved. Whosoever places his whole confidence in God is sure of eternal salvation.

In a word, whoever does the Will of God enters into Paradise; and he that does it not, enters not. Some people trust their eternal salvation to certain devotions, or to certain outward works of piety, and yet will not do the Will of God. But Jesus Christ says: "Not everyone that saith to Me, 'Lord, Lord,' shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doth the will of My father who is in heaven, he shall enter into the kingdom of heaven." (Matthew 7:21).

Thus, if we desire to be saved and to acquire a perfect union with God, we should endeavor always to address to Him the prayer of David: "Teach me to do Thy will, for Thou art my God." (Psalms 142:10). And meanwhile, let us strip ourselves of our own will and give it wholly to God without reserve. When we give to God our goods by alms, our food by fasting, our blood by scourging, we give Him what we possess; but when we give Him our will, we give Him ourselves altogether. Wherefore he that gives to God his entire will is able to say: "Lord, having given Thee all my will, I have nothing more to give Thee." The sacrifice of our own will is the most acceptable sacrifice we can make to God; and God pours His graces abundantly upon him who makes it.

This sacrifice, however, in order to be perfect, must have two conditions: it must be without reserve, and it must be constant. Some persons give to God their will, but with a certain reserve; and this gift pleases God but little. Others give Him their will, but they afterwards take it back again; and such persons place themselves in great peril of being abandoned by God. Therefore, it is necessary that all our efforts and desires and prayers should be directed to obtain from God perseverance in not willing anything but what He wills. Let us then, day by day, renew the total renunciation of our own will to God and constantly take care to seek and wish for nothing which is not according to the Will of God. And thus will cease within us our passions, desires and fears, and all our disordered affections. Sister Margaret of the Cross, a daughter of the Emperor Maximilian and a barefooted Poor Clare, when she became quite blind, was accustomed to say: "How can I desire to see, when God wills it not?"

Receive, O God of my soul, receive the sacrifice of my entire will and of all my liberty. I see that I deserve that Thou shouldst turn Thy back upon me and refuse this gift of mine, so often have I been unfaithful to Thee; but I hear Thee once more command me to love Thee with all my heart, and therefore I am sure that Thou dost accept it. I resign myself, then, wholly to Thy will; make me know what Thou dost will of me, for I resolve to accomplish it all. Make me love Thee, and then dispose of me and all that is mine as it pleases Thee. I am in Thy hands; do what Thou knowest to be most expedient for my eternal salvation; meanwhile, I declare that I desire Thee alone and nothing more.

O Mother of God, do thou obtain for me holy perseverance.

O Jesus, my beloved Lord,
I seek for nought but Thee!
My God, to Thee I give myself,
Do what Thou wilt with me.

Reflection 20

BLESSED IS HE WHO IS FAITHFUL TO GOD IN ADVERSITY

THE fidelity of soldiers is proved, not indeed in repose, but in action. This earth is for us a battlefield where everyone has to fight and conquer in order to be saved; if he does not conquer, he is lost forever. Therefore said holy Job: "All the days in which I am now in warfare, I expect until my change come." (Job 14:14). Job suffered in struggling with ever so many enemies, but he comforted himself with the hope that, conquering and rising again after death, he would change his state. Of this change St. Paul spoke and rejoiced, saying: "The dead shall rise again incorruptible, and we shall be changed." (1 Corinthians 15:52). Our state is changed in Heaven, which is a place of no more toil, but of rest; not of fear, but of security; not of sadness or weariness, but of gladness and joy eternal. With the hope then of such great joy, let us animate ourselves to fight until death and never give ourselves up conquered to our enemies, "until our change come," until our struggle is ended and we possess a blessed eternity.

"The patient man shall bear for a time, and afterwards joy shall be restored to him." (Ecclesiasticus 1:29). Blessed is he who suffers for God in this life; he suffers "for a time," but his joy will be eternal in the country of the Blessed. Thus will end the persecutions; the temptations will end; the infirmities, the annoyances and all the miseries of this life will end; and God will give us a life of complete happiness, which shall never end. Now is the time for pruning the vine and for cutting off everything which hinders us on our way towards the promised land of Heaven. "The time of pruning is come." (Canticle of Canticles 2:12). But cutting off causes pain, so that we have need of patience; and then "afterwards joy shall be restored," when the more we have suffered, the more shall we be filled with consolations. God is faithful! And to him who suffers with resignation on earth for His love's sake, He promises that He Himself will be his reward, a reward infinitely greater than all our suffering: "I am thy protector and thy reward exceeding great." (Genesis 15:1)

Meanwhile, before we receive the crown of eternal life, the Lord wills that we should be tried by temptations. "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he hath been proved, he shall receive the crown of life, which God hath promised to them that love Him." (James 1:12). Blessed then is he who is faithful to God when suffering adversity. Some people think they are beloved of God when all their temporal affairs go prosperously and they have no troubles; but they are mistaken, because God does not try the patience and faithfulness of His servants by prosperity, but by adversity, in order to give them that crown which fades not away, as all the crowns of this earth do fade away. This shall be a crown of eternal glory, as St. Peter writes: "You shall receive a never-fading crown of glory." (1 Peter 5:4). To whom, then, is this crown promised? St. James says: "God has promised it to them that love Him." (James 1:12). God has promised it again and again to those who love Him, because divine love will make us fight with courage and win the victory.

To love of God we must also join humility. The Word of God says, "Gold and silver are tried in the fire, but acceptable men in the furnace of humiliation. (Ecclesiasticus 2:5). It is in humiliations that Saints are discovered, for there is made known whether they are gold or lead. Such a one is considered a saint; but when he receives an injury from another, he is entirely disturbed; he complains of it to everyone; he says he will make him repent of it. What does this show? It is a sign that he is not gold, but lead. The Lord says, "In thy humiliation keep patience." (Ecclesiasticus 2:4). The proud man, whatever humiliation he receives, considers it a great injustice, and therefore cannot endure it; the humble man, on the contrary, accounting himself deserving of every evil treatment, suffers all with patience. Let him who has committed one mortal sin cast a glance upon the Hell which he has deserved, and thus will he suffer with patience every contempt and every pain.

Let us then love God; let us be humble; and whatever we do, let us do it, not to please ourselves, but only to please God. O accursed self-love, which intrudes itself into all our works! Even in our spiritual exercises, in meditation, in works of penance, and in all our pious works, it goes seeking its own interests. Few are the devout souls who do not fall into this defect: "Who shall find a valiant woman? Far and from the uttermost coasts is the price of her." (Proverbs 31:10). Where shall we find a soul so valiant that, despoiled of every passion and of all self-interest, it continues to love Jesus Christ in the midst of slights, pains, desolations of spirit and the annoyances of life? Solomon says that such souls are gems of great price; they come from the farthest ends of the world and therefore are most rare. (Proverbs 31:10 ff.).

O my crucified Jesus, I am one of those who, even in my devotions, have been seeking my own pleasure and my own satisfaction; entirely unlike to Thee, who through love of me, hast led a life of tribulations, deprived of every alleviation. Give me Thy help, since from this day forward I will seek only Thy pleasure and Thy glory. I wish to love Thee without any interested motive; but I am weak, Thou must give me the strength to accomplish it. Behold me, I am Thine; dispose of me as it pleases Thee; make me love Thee, and I ask for nothing more.

O Mary, my Mother, obtain for me faithfulness to God through thy intercession.

Reflection 21

HE THAT LOVES JESUS CHRIST OUGHT TO HATE THE WORLD

WHOSOEVER loves Jesus with a true love rejoices sincerely when he sees himself treated by the world as Jesus Christ was treated, who was hated, reviled and persecuted by the world, even to make Him die of anguish upon a gibbet of infamy.

The world is completely against Jesus Christ, and therefore, hating Jesus Christ, it hates all His servants. Therefore, Our Lord encouraged His disciples to suffer in peace the persecutions of the world, saying to them that, having given up the world, they could not but be hated by the world. "You are not of the world . . . therefore the world hateth you." (John 15:19).

Now, as the lovers of God are hateful to the world, so the world ought to be hateful to him who loves God. St. Paul says, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified to me." (Galatians 6:14). The Apostle was an object of horror to the world, as is a man condemned and dead upon a cross; and thus in return, the world was an object of horror to St. Paul: "the world is crucified to me." (Galatians 6:14).

Jesus Christ chose to die crucified for our sins for this end, that He might deliver us from the love of this wicked world. Our Saviour, having called us to His love, desires that we should become superior to all the promises and threats of the world. He desires that we should no longer take account of its censures or of its praises. We must beg of God to make us utterly forget the world and to make us rejoice when we see the world reject us.

However, it is not enough, in order to belong wholly to God, that we should abandon the world; we must desire that the world should abandon us and utterly forget us. Some people leave the world, but they do not cease to wish to be praised by it, at least for having abandoned it; in such persons the desire of the esteem of the world is yet living and causes the world still to live in them.

So then, as the world hates the servants of God and therefore hates their good example and holy maxim, so also it is necessary that we should hate all the maxims of the world. "The wisdom of the flesh is an enemy to God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither can it be." (Romans 8:7). The Apostle says, "Neither can it be." Yes, because the world has no other object but its own interest or pleasure, and thus it cannot agree with those who seek only to please God.

Yes, my Jesus, crucified and dead for me! Thee alone I desire to please. What is the world to me? What are riches, what are honors? Thou, my Redeemer, Thou shalt be all my treasure; to love Thee is my riches. If Thou wilt have me poor, I desire to be poor; if Thou wilt have me humbled and despised by all, I embrace everything and receive it from Thy hands; Thy will shall ever be my consolation. This is the grace that I seek of Thee, that in every event I may not depart in the least thing from Thy holy Will.

THE WORDS OF A DYING MAN TO JESUS CRUCIFIED

O JESUS, my Redeemer, who in a few moments wilt be my Judge, have mercy upon me before the moment comes when Thou wilt judge me. No, my sins do not terrify me, nor the rigors of Thy judgment, while I see Thee dead upon this cross to save me.

Yet, cease not to comfort me in the agony to which I am come: my enemies would terrify me by saying that there is no salvation for me; "Many say to my soul, there is no salvation for him in his God." (Psalms 3:3). But I will never cease to trust in Thy goodness and say, "Thou, O Lord, art . . . the lifter up of my head." (Psalms 3:3). Do Thou comfort me; do Thou make me feel that Thou art my salvation; "Say to my soul, I am thy salvation." (Psalms 34:3). Oh, let not so many pains, so many insults endured, so much blood shed by Thee, be lost to me; "Thou hast redeemed me, dying upon the cross; let not so great labor be in vain." Especially, I pray Thee—through that bitterness Thou didst feel when Thy blessed soul was separated from Thy most holy body—to have mercy upon my soul when it shall depart from my body.

It is true that by my sins I have so often despised Thee, but now I love Thee above everything; I love Thee more than myself, and I grieve with all my heart for all the outrages I have offered Thee; I detest them, I hate them above all evil. I see that by the offenses I have committed, I have deserved a thousand Hells; but the bitter death which Thou hast been willing to endure for me and the great mercies Thou hast already shown me make me confidently hope that, when I appear before Thee, Thou wilt give me the holy kiss of peace.

Trusting entirely in Thy goodness, O my God, I abandon myself into Thy loving arms. "In Thee, O Lord, I have hoped: I shall not be confounded forever." (Psalms 30:1). By the sins I have committed I have again and again deserved Hell but I hope in Thy blood that Thou hast already pardoned me; and I hope that I shall come to Heaven to praise Thy mercies forever; "The mercies of the Lord I will sing forever."

I willingly accept all the pains Thou dost destine for me in Purgatory; it is just that the fire should punish in me all the injuries I have done to Thee. O holy prison, when shall I find myself shut up in thee, secure from being able ever to lose my God! O holy fire, when wilt thou purge away my many filthy stains and make me worthy to enter the country of the blessed!

O Eternal Father, through the merits of the death of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, make me die in Thy grace and in Thy love, that I may come to love Thee eternally. I thank Thee for all the graces Thou hast given me throughout my life and especially for the great favor of having bestowed on me the Holy Faith and for having caused me to receive, in these my last days, all the holy Sacraments. Thou willest that I should die, and I desire to die to please Thee. It is little, O Jesus, my Saviour, that I should die for Thee, who hast died for me. Joyfully I say to Thee with St. Francis: "May I die for love of Thy love, who hast vouchsafed to die for love of my love."

I receive death with peace, as also the pains which I shall have to endure as long as I breathe; give me strength to suffer with a perfect uniformity to Thy Will. I offer them all for Thy glory, uniting them to the pains which Thou didst suffer in Thy Passion. O Eternal Father, I sacrifice to Thee my life and my entire being; and I pray Thee to accept this my sacrifice, through the merits of that great sacrifice which Jesus, Thy Son, offered of Himself to Thee upon the Cross.

O Mother of God and my mother, Mary, thou hast obtained so many graces from God for me during my life; I thank thee for them with all my heart. Oh, abandon me not in this hour of my death, in which I have yet greater need of thy prayers! Pray to Jesus for me; increase thy prayers and obtain for me more sorrow for my sins and more love for God, that I may come to love Him forever in thy company and with all my powers in Heaven.

"In thee, O Lady, I have hoped; I shall not be confounded forever." Mary, my hope, I trust in thee.

Reflection 23

ACTS TO BE MADE AT DEATH

IT WAS revealed to St. Lydwina [of Schiedam, 1380–1433] by an angel that the crown of merits and glory which awaited her in Heaven would not be completed without the sufferings which she was to endure in the days immediately preceding her death. The same thing happens to all devout souls when they depart from this world. It is certain that all good acts, and especially those of resignation in accepting death, performed with the view of pleasing God, are of great merit to everyone who dies in the grace of God. Here are the acts of devotion which may be very acceptable to Almighty God at the time of death.

O my God, I offer Thee my life, and I am prepared to die at any hour which may be pleasing to Thy holy will. "Thy will be done." Always, always, "Thy will be done!"

O Lord, if Thou willest to leave me in life for some time longer, be Thou blessed; but I desire not life, unless I have to spend it all in loving Thee and in giving Thee pleasure. If Thou willest that I should die of this sickness, mayest Thou still be blessed. I embrace death that I may do Thy will, and I repeat: "Thy will be done, Thy will be done." I only beg of Thee to help me all through this time. "Have mercy on me, O God, according to Thy great mercy." If, then, Thou willest that I should leave this earth, I protest that I desire to die, because such is Thy will.

And I desire to die, in order that, by the anguish and bitterness of my death, I may satisfy Thy Divine Justice for so many sins by which I have offended Thee and deserved Hell.

I also desire to die that I may never more offend Thee, or cause Thee displeasure in this life.

Moreover, I desire to die in acknowledgment of the gratitude which I owe Thee for so many benefits and kindnesses that Thou hast bestowed on me, contrary to my deserts.

I desire to die that I may prove that I love Thy will more than my life.

I desire, if it pleases Thee, to die now, when I trust I am in Thy grace, in order to be assured that I shall praise and bless Thee forever.

I desire above all to die in order that I may come to love Thee eternally and with all my powers in Heaven, where through Thy blood, O my Redeemer, I hope to come and to be safe from ever ceasing to love Thee through all eternity. O my Jesus, Thou didst accept the death of the cross through love of me; I accept death and all the pains which await me through love of Thee. Meanwhile, I say with St. Francis: "May I die, O Lord, for the love of Thy love, who didst deign to die for the love of my love."

I pray Thee, O my Saviour, my Love, and my only Good, by Thy holy wounds and Thy bitter death, make me die in Thy grace and in Thy love. Thou hast purchased me with Thy blood; suffer me not to perish. O sweetest Jesus, suffer me not to be separated from Thee; suffer me not to be separated from Thee!

O Lord, cast me not away from Thy face. I confess that by my sins I have deserved Hell, but I grieve for them more than for any other evil; and I hope to come to Heaven to praise forever these great mercies Thou hast shown me. "The mercies of the Lord I will sing forever."

I adore Thee, O my God, who hast created me. I believe in Thee, O Eternal Truth. I hope in Thee, O Infinite Mercy. I love Thee, O Supreme Goodness; I love Thee above everything; I love Thee more than myself, for Thou art worthy of being loved. And because I love Thee, I repent with all my heart for having despised Thy grace. I promise Thee to suffer every kind of death, and a thousand deaths, rather than displease Thee again.

O Jesus, Son of God, who didst die for me, have pity upon me! My Saviour, save me; and let it be my salvation to love Thee eternally.

O Mary, Mother of God, pray to Jesus for me; now is the time in which thou hast most to help me. Mary, Mother of grace, Mother of mercy, defend us from the enemy and receive us in the hour of death. "We fly to thy patronage, O holy Mother of God! Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners!"

St. Joseph, my patron and my father, help me at this time. St. Michael the Archangel, deliver me from the devils who lie in wait for my soul. O my holy advocates, and all ye Saints of Paradise, pray to God for me.

And Thou, my Crucified Jesus, at the moment when I must breathe my last, receive my soul into Thy arms; to Thee I recommend it; remember that Thou hast redeemed me with Thy blood. "We therefore pray Thee, help Thy servants whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy precious blood." O my Crucified Jesus, my love, and my hope, whether I live or die, I protest that I desire Thee alone and nothing more. Thou art my God and my all, and what else can I desire but Thee! "What have I in Heaven? And besides Thee, what do I desire upon earth? . . . Thou art the God of my heart and the God that is my portion forever!" (Psalms 72:25–26). Thou art the Love of my heart; Thou art all my riches!

To Thee, then, I recommend my soul—to Thee, who hast redeemed it by Thy death. "Into Thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit: Thou hast re deemed me, O Lord, the God of truth." (Psalms 30:6). Trusting in Thy mercy, I therefore say, "In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever." (Psalms 30:1). O Mary, thou art my hope; "Hail, our hope!" To thee, therefore, I say again, "In thee, O Lady, have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever."

Reflection 24

ON THE HOUSE OF ETERNITY

"MAN SHALL go into the house of his eternity." (Ecclesiastes 12:5). We err in calling this habitation in which we now dwell our home. The home of our body in a little while will be a grave, in which it must rest until the Day of Judgment; and the home of the soul will be either Paradise or Hell, according as it has deserved, and there will it remain through all eternity.

At our burial, our corpses will not go to the grave of themselves; they will be carried there by others; but the soul will go of itself to the place which awaits it, either of eternal joy or eternal woe. "Man shall go into the house of his eternity." According as a man lives well or ill, so he goes of himself to his home in Paradise or in Hell, which habitation he shall never change.

Those who live on this earth often change their dwelling, either to please themselves or because they are compelled. In eternity the dwelling is never changed; where we enter at first, there we abide forever. "If the tree fall to the south or to the north, in what place soever it shall fall, there shall it be." (Ecclesiastes 11:3). He that enters in the south, which is Heaven, will be ever happy; he that enters in the north, which is Hell, will be ever miserable.

He, then, who enters Heaven will be always united with God, always in company with the Saints, always in perfect peace, always fully satisfied, because every blessed soul is filled and satiated with joy, nor will he ever know the fear of losing it. If fear of losing the happiness they enjoy could enter among the Blessed, they would be no longer Blessed, for the mere thought of losing the joy they possess would disturb the peace they enjoy.

On the contrary, whoever enters into Hell will be forever far from God; he will be ever suffering in the fire among the damned. Let us not think that the pains of Hell will be like those of earth, where, by the effect of habit, a pain grows less; for, as in Paradise the delights will never cause weariness, but seem ever new as though they were for the first time enjoyed (which is implied by the expression of "the new canticle," which the blessed are ever singing); so on the contrary, in Hell, the pains never diminish their torment. The miserable beings who are damned will feel the same agony through all eternity which they felt in the first moment they experienced the pains of Hell.

St. Augustine used to say that he who believes in eternity and is not converted to God has either lost his reason or his faith. "Woe," cries St. Cæsarius, "woe to sinners who enter eternity without knowing what it is through having neglected to think upon it." And then he adds, "But, O double woe! They enter it, and they never come forth." It is a double woe, the first of which will be to fall into that abyss of fire; the second, that he who falls into it will never come out: the gate of Hell opens only to those who enter, not to those who would go out.

No, the Saints did not do too much when they went to hide themselves in caves and deserts, to live upon herbs and sleep on the ground in order to save their souls. No, "They did not do too much," says St. Bernard, "because, where eternity is in question, no security can be too great." When therefore God visits us with any cross of sickness, poverty or other trial, let us think of the Hell we have deserved, and thus every affliction will appear light. Let us say, with Job: "I have sinned, and indeed I have offended, and I have not received what I deserved." (Job 33:27). O Lord, I have offended Thee and so many times betrayed Thee, and I have not been punished as I deserved; how, then, can I complain if Thou sendest me some affliction—I, who have deserved Hell?

O my Jesus, send me not to Hell, for in Hell I could no longer love Thee, but would have to hate Thee forever. Deprive me of everything—of goods, of health, of life—but deprive me not of Thyself. Grant that I may love Thee and praise Thee forever, and then chastise me and do with me what Thou wilt.

O Mother of God, pray to Jesus for me.

Reflection 25

SOULS THAT GREATLY LOVE GOD LONG TO GO AND BEHOLD HIM IN HEAVEN

"WHILE we are in the body, we are absent from the Lord," says the Apostle. (2 Corinthians 5:6). Souls who in this life love nothing but God are like noble pilgrims, destined, according to their present state, to be the eternal spouse of the King of Heaven, but who now live at a distance without seeing Him. Wherefore, they do nothing but sigh for their departure to the country of the Blessed, where they know that their Spouse awaits them.

They know indeed that their Beloved is ever present with them, but He is as it were hidden behind a curtain and does not show Himself. Or rather, He is as the sun is frequently, behind clouds, through which, from time to time, it sends forth some ray of its splendor, but does not display itself openly. Moreover, these beloved spouses have a bandage over their eyes, which prevents them from seeing the object of their love. They live, nevertheless, contented, uniting themselves to the will of their Lord, who chooses to keep them in exile and far away from Himself; but with all this, they cannot but continually sigh to behold Him face to face, in order to become more charmed and more inflamed with love for Him.

Therefore, each one of them often sweetly complains to its beloved Spouse because He does not show Himself and says: "O Thou only Love of my heart, since Thou dost love me so much and hast wounded me with Thy holy love, why dost Thou hide Thyself and dost not let me see Thee? I know that Thou art an Infinite Beauty; I love Thee more than myself, though I have never yet beheld Thee. Show me Thy beautiful countenance; I long to see Thee unveiled, so that I may no longer behold myself nor any creature and may think only of loving Thee, my Sovereign Good."

When to these souls thus enamored of God there shines forth any ray of the Divine Goodness and of the love which God bears them, they would wish to be dissolved and melt away for desire of Him; and yet for them the sun is still behind the clouds, and His fair face is concealed behind a veil, and there is still the bandage over their eyes, so that they cannot gaze on Him face to face. But what will be their joy when the clouds shall disperse, when the veil shall be withdrawn, and the bandage shall be taken from their eyes, and the fair countenance of their Spouse shall appear unveiled, so that in the clear light they shall see His beauty, His goodness, His greatness and the love which He bears to them!

O death, why dost thou so long delay to come? If thou comest not, I cannot depart to behold my God. It is thou who must open to me the gate, that I may enter into the palace of my Lord. O blessed country, when will the day come in which I shall find myself within thine eternal tabernacles?

O Beloved of my soul, my Jesus, my Treasure, my Love, my All, when shall come that happy moment when, leaving this earth, I shall see myself entirely united to Thee? I deserve not this happiness; but the love which Thou hast shown me, and still more Thine Infinite Goodness, make me hope that I shall be one day joined to those happy souls who, being wholly united to Thee, love Thee, and will love Thee with a perfect love through all eternity. O my Jesus, Thou seest the alternative in which I am placed, of being either forever united to Thee, or forever banished far from Thee. Have pity upon me; Thy blood is my hope!

And thy intercession, O my mother Mary, is my comfort and my joy!

Reflection 26

JESUS IS THE GOOD SHEPHERD

THUS He Himself spoke: "I am the good Shepherd." (John 10:11). The office of a good shepherd is none other than to guide his flock to good pastures and to guard them from wolves; but what shepherd, O my sweet Redeemer, ever had goodness like to Thine, who didst give Thy life to save Thy sheep, which we are, and to deliver us from the punishment we had deserved?

St. Peter says of Jesus: "Who his own self bore our sins in His body upon the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live to justice, by whose stripes we were healed." (1 Peter 2:24). To heal us of our ills, this good Shepherd took upon Himself all our debts and paid them in His own body, dying with agony upon a cross. It was this excess of love toward us His sheep which made St. Ignatius the martyr burn with desire to give his life for Jesus Christ, saying: "My Love is crucified," as he wrote in his epistle, as though he would say, "What! Has my God been willing to die on a cross for me, and can I live and not desire to die for Him?" And in truth, what great thing did the martyrs do in giving their lives for Jesus Christ, who died for love of them? Oh how the death endured for them by Jesus Christ made sweet to them all their torments—the scourges, the racks, the hooks, the red-hot plates of iron and the most painful deaths!

But the love of this Good Shepherd was not satisfied with giving His life for His sheep; He desired also, after His death, to leave them His very body itself, already first sacrificed on the Cross, that it might be the food and pasture of their souls. "The burning love which He bore to us," says St. John Chrysostom, "induced Him to unite Himself to us, in order to make Himself one thing with us, for such is the instinctive desire of ardent lovers."

And then, when this Good Shepherd sees one of His sheep lost, what does He not do, what means does He not take, to recover it? And He does not cease to seek it till He finds it. "If He shall lose one of them," says Our Lord in the Gospel, "He goes after that which was lost until He finds it." And when He has found it, rejoicing, He places it upon His shoulders, that He may not lose it again; and calling to Him His friends and neighbors, that is, the Angels and Saints, He invites them to rejoice with Him for having recovered the sheep that was lost. Who then will not love with all his affections this good Lord, who shows Himself thus loving to sinners who have turned their backs upon Him and lost themselves of their own accord!

O my amiable Saviour, behold at Thy feet a lost sheep! I have left Thee, but Thou has not abandoned me. Thou hast left no means untried to recover me. What would have become of me if Thou hadst not thought of seeking me? Unhappy me! How long have I not lived far from Thee! Now, through Thy mercy, I trust that I am in Thy grace; and though formerly I fled from Thee, now I desire nothing but to love Thee and to live and die embracing Thy feet. But as long as I live, I am in danger of leaving Thee. Oh bind me, bind me fast with the chains of Thy holy love, and cease not to seek me for so long as I live on this earth.

"I have gone astray like a sheep that is lost; seek Thy servant." (Psalms 118:176).

O Advocate of Sinners, obtain for me holy perseverance.

Reflection 27

ON THE BUSINESS OF ETERNAL SALVATION

THE business of our eternal salvation is for us that affair which is not only the most important, but the only one which ought to trouble us, because if this goes wrong, all is lost. One thought upon eternity, well weighed, is enough to make a saint. The great servant of God, Fr. Vincent Carafa, was accustomed to say that, if all men thought with a lively faith upon the eternity of the next life, the world would become a desert, for no one would attend any more to the affairs of this life.

Oh, that all had ever before their eyes the great maxim taught us by Jesus Christ: "What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?" (Matthew 16:26). This maxim has induced so many men to leave the world, so many noble virgins, even of royal blood, to shut themselves up in a cloister, so many anchorites [hermits] to live in deserts, and so many martyrs to give their lives for the Faith, because they considered that, if they lost their souls, all the goods of the world would profit them nothing in eternity.

Therefore the Apostle wrote to his disciples: "We entreat you, brethren, . . . that you do your own business." (1 Thessalonians 4:11). And of what business did St. Paul speak? He spoke of that business which, if it fail, implies that we lose the eternal kingdom of Paradise and are cast into an abyss of torments which never end. "It is an affair of eternal punishments and of the loss of the heavenly kingdom," says St. John Chrysostom.

St. Philip Neri, therefore, had good reason for calling all those persons mad who in this life take pains to gain riches and honors and give little heed to the salvation of their souls. "All such," the venerable John Avila used to say, "deserve to be shut up in an asylum for lunatics." How so? This great servant of God meant to say: "You believe that there is an eternity of joys for those who love God and an eternity of pain for those who offend Him, and do you offend Him?"

Every loss of goods, of reputation, of relations, of health in this life can be repaired, at least by a good death and by the acquisition of eternal life, as it happened to the holy martyrs; but for what goods of the world, for what fortune, even the greatest, can be given in exchange the loss of the soul? "What exchange shall a man give for his soul?" (Matthew 16:26).

He who dies in the enmity of God and loses his soul, loses with it forever all hope of repairing his ruin. "When the wicked man is dead, there shall be no hope any more." (Proverbs 11:7). O God, if the doctrine of eternal life were but simply a doubtful opinion of divines, we ought surely to give all our care to gain a happy eternity and avoid a miserable one. But no, it is not a doubtful thing; it is certain, it is of faith that one or the other must be our lot!

But what do we see? Everyone who has faith, and thinks upon this truth says: "So it is: we must attend to the salvation of our soul," but few are they who do attend to it in earnest. All are intent on gaining some lawsuit or obtaining some situation, but lay aside the care of their eternal salvation. "Truly, it is the greatest of errors to neglect the business of eternal salvation," said St. Eucherius. It is an error which exceeds all others, for to lose the soul is an error without remedy. "Oh, that they would be wise and would understand and would provide for their last end!" Miserable are those learned men who know many things and know not how to have any forethought for their souls, that they may obtain a favorable sentence in the Day of Judgment!

O my Redeemer, Thou hast shed Thy blood to purchase my soul, and I have so often lost it, and lost it again! I give Thee thanks that Thou hast given me time to recover it by recovering Thy grace. O my God, would that I had died before I had ever offended Thee! It comforts me to know that Thou knowest not how to despise a heart which humbles itself, and repents of its sins.

O Mary, Refuge of Sinners, succor a sinner who recommends himself to thee and trusts in thee.

Reflection 28

WHAT WILL BE THE HAPPINESS OF THE BLESSED

"ENTER thou into the joy of thy Lord." (Matthew 25:23). When the soul enters the Country of the Blessed and the curtain which hinders its sight is taken away, it will see openly and without a veil the infinite beauty of its God, and this will be the joy of the Blessed.

Every object which then it will see in God Himself will overwhelm it with delight: it will see the righteousness of His judgments, the harmony of His decrees regarding every soul, all directed to His own divine glory and the good of each soul.

It will especially perceive, in respect to itself, the boundless love which God has entertained toward it in becoming man and sacrificing His life upon the Cross through love of it. Then will it know what an excess of goodness is contained in the mystery of the Cross, in the sight of God-become-a-servant and dying crucified upon an infamous gibbet, and in the mystery of the Eucharist, in the sight of God concealed beneath the species of bread and become the food of His creatures.

The soul will perceive in particular all the graces and favors bestowed on it, which until then had been hidden. It will see all the mercies He has shown it in waiting for it and pardoning its ingratitude. It will see the many calls and lights and aids which have been granted to it in abundance. It will see that those tribulations, those infirmities, those losses of property or of kindred, which it regarded as punishments, were not really punishments, but loving dispensations on the part of God to draw it to a perfect love for Him.

In a word, all these things will make known to it the infinite goodness of its God and the boundless love which He deserves. Hence, no sooner will it have reached Heaven than its sole desire will be to see Him blessed and happy; and at the same time, comprehending that the happiness of God is supreme, infinite and eternal, it will experience only a joy which is not infinite, because a creature is not capable of anything infinite. It will enjoy, nevertheless, a delight which is immense and complete, and will fill it with joy, and with that same joy which belongs to God Himself; and thus will be fulfilled in it the words: "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." (Matthew 25:23).

The Blessed are happy, not so much through the delight which they experience in themselves, as through the happiness which God enjoys. For as the Blessed love God immensely more than themselves, so the wellbeing of God delights them immensely more than their own on account of the love which they bear to Him. And this love for God will make them forget themselves, and all their delight will be to please their Beloved.

And this is that holy and loving inebriation which causes the Blessed to lose all thought of themselves, to occupy themselves solely in praising and loving the Dear Object of all their love, which is God. "They shall be inebriated with the plenty of Thy house." (Psalms 35:9). Happy from their first entrance into Heaven, they continue, as it were, "lost," and so to say, "drowned" in love, in that boundless ocean of the goodness of God.

Wherefore every blessed soul will lose all its vain desires and will have no other desire but to love God and to be loved by Him; and knowing itself secure of always loving God and of being always loved by Him, this will be its blessedness, which will fill it with joy and will make it throughout eternity so satiated with delight that it will desire nothing more.

In a word, this will be the Paradise of the Blessed, to rejoice in the happiness of God. And therefore, he who in this life rejoices in the blessedness which God enjoys, and will enjoy eternally, can say that even in this life he enters into the joy of God and begins to enjoy Paradise.

Meanwhile, O my sweet Saviour and the Love of my soul, I still see myself in this vale of tears surrounded by enemies, who seek to separate me from Thee. O my beloved Lord, permit me not to lose Thee; make me always love Thee, both in this life and in the next, and then dispose of me as Thou pleasest.

O Queen of Paradise, if thou prayest for me, assuredly I shall be with thee eternally, to bear thee company and to praise thee in Paradise.

Reflection 29

THE PAIN OF HAVING LOST GOD IS THAT WHICH CONSTITUTES HELL

THE grievousness of punishment must correspond to the grievousness of sin. Mortal sin is defined by theologians in a single phrase: "a turning away from God"—turning one's back upon God. And in that consists the malice of mortal sin. It consists in despising the divine grace and in being willing of one's own accord to lose God, the Supreme Good; wherefore, justly the greatest punishment of sinners in Hell is the pain of having lost God.

The other pains of Hell are also great: the devouring fire, the blinding darkness, the deafening shrieks of the damned, the stench which would cause those miserable beings to die (if die they could), the confinement which oppresses and stifles them. But these pains are nothing in comparison to the loss of God. In Hell the reprobate weep eternally, and the bitterest subject of their weeping is the thought that, through their own fault, they have lost God.

And, O God, how great is the good they have lost! In this life, the present objects, the passions, the temporal occupations, the sensible pleasures and the adverse events, hinder us from contemplating the infinite beauty and goodness of God. But when the soul has departed from the prison-house of the body, it does not indeed instantly behold God as He is, for if it saw Him, it would be instantly happy. But it knows that God is an infinite good, infinitely beautiful and worthy of infinite love; hence the soul, which is created to see and love this God, desires to go and unite itself at once with God; but being in sin, it finds an impenetrable wall (which is precisely its sin), which forever closes against it the way which leads to God. O Lord, I thank Thee that this life is not yet ended for me, as I have deserved. I can still come to Thee. "Cast me not away from Thy face." (Psalms 50:13). Oh, drive me not away.

The soul, which is created to love its Creator, cannot but find itself impelled by its nature to love its Last End, which is God. In this life, the darkness of sin and earthly affections lull to sleep this inclination which it has to unite itself to God, and therefore it is not greatly afflicted at seeing itself separated from Him; but when it leaves the body and is delivered from the senses, then it sees in clear light that God alone can satisfy it. Hence, as soon as it is set free from the body, immediately it flies to embrace its Supreme Good; but being in sin, it will find itself thrust back by God as an enemy. But though driven away, it will not cease to feel itself ever drawn to unite itself with God; and this will be its hell—to find itself ever drawn toward God and always driven away from God.

Oh, if only the miserable soul which has lost God and can never more see Him could at least find some comfort in loving Him! But no, for having been abandoned by grace and having become the slave of its sin, its will is perverted; hence, on the one side, it will find itself ever drawn to love God, and on the other, it will feel itself constrained to hate Him. Thus, at the same time that it knows that God is worthy of infinite love and praise, it hates Him and curses Him.

Yet perhaps it might in this prison of torments at least resign itself to the Divine Will, as holy souls do in Purgatory, and bless the hand of that God who justly scourges it. But no, it cannot resign itself because, to do this, the assistance of grace is necessary. But grace (as has been said) has abandoned it; hence, it cannot unite its will to that of God, because its own will is altogether contrary to the Divine Will.

Thus also, it comes to pass that the wretched soul turns all its hatred upon itself and thus will live forever, torn by contrary desires. It would wish to live, it would desire to die. On the one hand, it would live, in order always to hate God, who is the object of its greatest hatred; on the other, it would die, in order not to feel the pain it endures of having lost Him. But it sees that it cannot die. Hence, it will live forever in one continual agony of death. Let us pray God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, to preserve us from Hell; and he especially ought to pray thus who at any time in his life, has lost God through any grievous sin.

O Lord (let him say), save me, and therefore bind me to Thee ever more by Thy holy love; redouble these holy and sweet chains of salvation, that they may ever bind me more firmly to Thee. Wretch that I am, by despising Thy grace I have deserved to be forever separated from Thee, my Sovereign Good, and hate Thee forever! I thank Thee for having borne with me when I was at enmity with Thee; what would have become of me if I had then died? But since Thou hast prolonged my life, grant that I may not use it any more to displease Thee, but only to love Thee, and to weep over the offenses I have committed against Thee. O my Jesus, from this day forth Thou shalt be my only Love, and my only fear shall be no other than that I should offend Thee and separate myself from Thee. But if Thou dost aid me not, I can do nothing; I hope in Thy blood, that Thou wilt give me help to be all Thine, O my Redeemer, my Love, my All.

O Mary, great advocate of sinners, help a sinner who recommends himself to thee and trusts in thee.

If we would be assured of not losing God, let us give ourselves in earnest wholly to God. He that does not give himself wholly to God is ever in danger of turning his back upon Him and of losing Him, but a soul which resolutely detaches itself from everything and gives itself all to God loses Him no more, because God Himself will not allow that a soul which has heartily given itself completely to Him should turn its back upon Him afterwards and perish. Wherefore, a great servant of God was accustomed to say that, when we read of the fall of certain persons who had before given tokens of living a holy life, we must conclude that such persons had not given themselves completely to God.

Reflection 30

ON CONTEMPT OF THE WORLD

THE thought of the vanity of the world and that all the things which the world values are but falsehood and deceit has made many souls resolve to give themselves wholly to God. "What doth it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul?" (Matthew 16:26). How many young persons has this great maxim of the Gospel brought to leave relations, country, possessions, honors and even crowns, to go and shut themselves up in a cloister or desert, there to think of God alone! The day of death is called the day of loss or destruction. "The day of destruction is at hand." (Deuteronomy 32:35). It is a day of loss, because all the goods which we have acquired on earth must all be left on the day of our death. Wherefore, St. Ambrose wisely says that we falsely call these goods our own goods because we cannot carry them with us into the other world, where we must dwell forever. It is our good works alone which accompany us, and they alone will console us in eternity.

All earthly fortunes, the highest dignities, gold, silver, the most precious jewels, when looked at from the bed of death, lose their splendor; the fatal shadow of death obscures even scepters and crowns and makes us see that all which the world values is but smoke, dust, vanity and misery. And in truth, at the time of death, what use is there for all the riches acquired by one who is dying, if nothing belongs to him after death, except a wooden box in which he is placed to rot? What will the boasted beauty of the body serve when there remains of it only a little fetid dust and a few fleshless bones?

What is the life of man upon earth? Behold it as described by St. James: "What is your life? It is a vapor which appeareth for a little while, and afterwards shall vanish away." (James 4:15). Today this great man is esteemed, feared, praised; tomorrow he is despised, slandered, and cursed. "I have seen the wicked highly exalted . . ." says the Psalmist, "and I passed by, and lo he was not." (Psalms 36:35–36). He is no longer to be found in this his beloved villa, in this grand palace which he built himself; and where is he? He is become dust in the grave!

"There is a deceitful balance in his hand." (Osee 12:7). In these words the Holy Spirit warns us not to be deceived by the world, because the world weighs its goods in a false balance. We ought to weigh things in the true balance of faith, which will show us what are true goods, which those things can never be called that soon perish. St. Teresa used to say: "We should not take account of anything which ends with death." O God, what has there remained of greatness to so many first ministers of state, to so many commanders of armies, to so many princes, to so many Roman emperors—now that for them the scene is changed, and they find themselves in eternity? "Their memory has perished with a noise." (Psalms 9:7). They made a great figure in the world, and their names resounded everywhere; but after they were dead, rank, name and everything was ended for them. It is useful to record here an inscription placed over a certain cemetery in which many men and women of rank are buried:

"Behold the end of all the pomp of earth, All human greatness, beauty, noble birth! Worms, rottenness, a little dust, a stone, Close the brief scene of life for ev'ry one."

"The fashion of this world passeth away." (1 Corinthians 7:31). Our life, finally, is but a scene which passes away and speedily ends; and it must end for all, whether nobles or commoners, kings or subjects, rich or poor. Happy is he who in this scene has played his part well before God. Philip III, king of Spain, died young, at the age of forty-two years; and before he died, he said to those around him: "When I am dead, proclaim the spectacle which you now see; proclaim that, in death, to have been a king serves only to make one feel regret of having reigned." And then he ended with a sigh, saying: "Oh, that during this time I had been in a desert, becoming a saint; for now I should appear with more confidence before the tribunal of Jesus Christ!"

We know the change of life which St. Francis Borgia made at the sight of the corpse of the Empress Isabella, who in life was most beautiful, but after death, struck horror in all who saw her. On beholding her, he exclaimed: "Such then is the end of all the grandeur of this world!" And he gave himself wholly to God. Oh, that we would all imitate him before death comes upon us! But let us make haste, because death runs towards us, and we know not when it will arrive. Let us not so act that nothing will remain of the light which God now gives us but remorse, and the account to be rendered of it to God, when we hold in our hands the candle at death. Let us resolve to do now what then we shall wish to have done and shall no longer be able to do.

No, my God, Thou hast borne with me long enough! I do not wish to make Thee wait any longer before seeing me give myself wholly to Thee. Thou hast many times called me to have done with the world and to give myself competely to Thy love. Now Thou callest me again! Behold me, receive me into Thy arms, for at this moment I abandon myself wholly to Thee. O spotless Lamb, who didst once sacrifice Thyself on Calvary, dying on a cross for me, first wash me with Thy blood and pardon all the injuries Thou hast received from me, and then inflame me with Thy holy love. I love Thee above everything; I love Thee with all my soul. And what object can I find in the world more worthy of love than Thou art, or one who has loved me more?

O Mary, Mother of God, and my Advocate, pray to Him for me; obtain for me a true and lasting change of life. In thee I trust.

Reflection 31

ON THE LOVE OF SOLITUDE

GOD does not allow Himself to be found in the tumult of the world; therefore, the Saints were accustomed to seek the most frightful deserts, the most hidden caves, in order that they might flee from men and converse with God alone. St. Hilarion made trial of several deserts, going from one to another, ever seeking the most solitary one, where there should be no man with whom to speak. And in the end, he died in a desert of Cyprus, after having lived there for five years. St. Bruno, when he was called by God to leave the world, went with his companions who wished to follow him, to find St. Hugh, Bishop of Grenoble, that he might assign them some desert place in his diocese. St. Hugh assigned them the Carthusian mountains, which from their frightful wildness, were more fitted to be a resort of wild beasts than a habitation for men; and there they went with joy to dwell, each living in a little hut at a distance from the rest.

Our Lord said once to St. Teresa: "I would willingly speak to many souls, but the world makes so much noise in their hearts that My voice cannot be heard." God does not speak to us in the midst of the tumult and business of the world, knowing that if He speaks, He is not heard. The words of God are His holy inspirations, His lights and calls, by which the Saints are enlightened and inflamed with divine love; but he who does not love solitude will not be allowed to hear these voices of God.

God Himself declares: "I . . . will lead her into the wilderness, and I will speak to her heart." (Osee 2:14). When God desires to raise anyone to a high degree of perfection, He induces him to retire to some solitary place, far from the converse of creatures, and there He speaks to the ears—not of the body, but of the heart—and thus He enlightens and inflames him with His divine love.

St. Bernard used to say that he had learned much more of the love of God among the oaks and beeches of the forest than from books and from the servants of God. Therefore, St. Jerome left the pleasures of Rome and shut himself up in the cave of Bethlehem, and afterwards exclaimed: "O solitude, in which God speaks familiarly and converses with His own!" In solitude God converses familiarly with His beloved souls, and there He makes them hear those words which melt their hearts with holy love, as the sacred Spouse said: "My soul melted when he [my Beloved] spoke." (Canticle of Canticles 5:6).

We see by experience that treating with the world and occupying ourselves in the acquisition of earthly goods makes us forget God; but at the hour of death, what shall we find of all the labor and time we have spent upon the things of earth, except affliction and remorse of conscience? At death we shall find comfort only from that little which we have done and suffered for God. Why, then, do we not detach ourselves from the world before death separates it from us?

"He shall sit solitary, and hold his peace because he hath taken it up upon himself." (Lamentations 3:28). The solitary is not engaged as he formerly was in worldly affairs; he will sit in repose, and he will hold his peace and will not call for sensual delights to satisfy him because, lifted up above himself and above all created things, he will find in God every good and all his happiness.

"Who will give me wings like a dove, and I will fly and be at rest?" (Psalms 54:7). David desired to have the wings of a dove, that he might leave this earth and not touch it even with his feet, and thus give rest to his soul. But so long as we are in this life, it is not given to us to leave this earth; let us at least take care to love retirement, so far as it is practicable, conversing alone with God, and thus gain strength to avoid defects in our unavoidable intercourse with the world, as David did at the very time he was ruling his kingdom: "Lo," he says, "I have gone far off, flying away, and I abode in the wilderness." (Psalms 54:8).

Oh, that I had always thought of Thee, O God of my soul, and not of the goods of this world! I curse those days in which, seeking pleasures, I have offended Thee, my Sovereign Good. Oh that I had always loved Thee! Oh that I had died and not caused Thee displeasure! Miserable that I am, death draws near while I find myself still attached to the world! No, my Jesus, this day I resolve to leave all and to be entirely Thine. Thou art almighty, Thou hast to give me strength to be faithful to Thee.

O Mother of God, pray to Jesus for me!

Reflection 32

ON SOLITUDE OF HEART

SAINT GREGORY wrote: "What does the solitude of the body profit if the solitude of the heart is not there?" In the preceding reflection we have seen how much solitude assists recollection of mind, but St. Gregory says that it profits us little or nothing to be with the body in a solitary place, while we still keep the heart full of worldly thoughts and affections. That a soul may be wholly given to God, two things are necessary: the first is to detach one's self from the love of every created thing; the second is to consecrate all one's love to God. And this is what true solitude of heart means.

We must in the first place, then, detach our hearts from every earthly affection. St. Francis de Sales used to say: "If I knew that I had a single fiber in my heart which was not given to God, I would instantly pluck it out." If we do not purify and strip the heart of everything earthly, the love of God cannot enter in and possess it entirely. God would reign by His love in our hearts, but He would reign there alone; He will have no companions to rob Him of a portion of that affection which He justly claims to have entirely for Himself.

Some souls complain that in all their devout exercises, meditations, Communions, spiritual readings, visits to the Blessed Sacrament, they do not find God and know not what means to adopt in order to find Him. St. Teresa gives them the right means when she says: "Detach thy heart from all created things, and then seek God, and thou shalt find Him."

Many persons cannot, in order to separate themselves from creatures and converse with God alone, go and live in a desert, as they would wish; but we must understand that deserts and caves are not necessary in order to enjoy solitude of heart. Those who from necessity are obliged to converse with the world—provided that their hearts are free from worldly attachments—can, even in the streets, in places of resort and in public assemblies, possess solitude of heart and remain united with God. All those occupations which are undertaken to fulfill the Divine Will do not prevent the solitude of the heart. St. Catherine of Siena was able to find God in the midst of the household labors in which her parents kept her employed in order to withdraw her from devotional exercises; but in the midst of these affairs she remained retired within her heart, which she called her cell, and there ceased not to converse alone with God.

"Be still and see that I am God," says the Psalmist. (Psalms 45:11). To possess that divine light which enables us to know the goodness of God, which when known, is well able to draw to itself all the affections of our heart, we must be still, that is, disentangle ourselves from the earthly attachments which hinder us from knowing God. As a crystal vase when it is filled with sand cannot receive the light of the sun, so a heart which is attached to riches, to worldly honors, or to sensual pleasures, cannot receive the divine light; and not knowing God, it does not love Him. In every state in which a man finds himself placed by God, he must indeed give attention to perform his duties according to the pleasure of God; but to prevent creatures from drawing him away from God, he must in everything else act as if there were no one else in the world except himself and God.

We must detach ourselves from everything, and especially from ourselves, by continually thwarting our self-love. For example, a certain thing pleases us; we must leave it for the very reason that it pleases us. A certain person has injured us; we must do him good just because he has injured us. In a word, we must will and not will, exactly as God wills or does not will, without wishing for anything whatever until we know that it is the will of God that we should desire it.

Oh, how easily does God let Himself be found by everyone who detaches himself from creatures in order to find Him! "The Lord is good . . . to the soul that seeketh Him." (Lamentations 3:25). St. Francis de Sales says: "The pure love of God consumes everything which is not God, in order to convert everything into itself." We must therefore make ourselves an enclosed garden, as the holy spouse in the Canticles is called by God. "My sister, my spouse, is a garden enclosed." (Canticle of Canticles 4:12). The soul which keeps the door shut against earthly affections is called an enclosed garden. God has given us everything that we have, and it is reasonable that He should require of us all our love. When, then, any creature would enter and take for itself a portion of our love, we must altogether deny it any entrance, and turning to our Sovereign Good, we must say with all our affection: "What have I in Heaven? And besides Thee what do I desire on earth? . . . Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever." (Psalms 72:25–26). "O my God, what but Thyself can satisfy my soul? No, I desire nothing but Thee, either in Heaven or on earth; Thou alone art sufficient for me, O God of my heart and my Portion forever."

Oh, happy is he who can say: "The kingdom of the earth and all worldly pomp I have despised for the love of my Lord Jesus Christ." Truly, that great servant of God, sister Margaret of the Cross, the daughter of the Emperor Maximilian II, could say this when at her profession she stripped herself of her rich garments and jewels to clothe herself in the poor woolen habit of the barefooted nuns of the strict rule of St. Clare and when, as the author of her life relates, she cast them away with a contempt which moved to tears of devotion all who assisted at the function.

O my Jesus, for my part I do not desire that creatures should have any share in my heart; Thou must be its only Lord, by possessing it entirely. Let others seek the delights and grandeurs of this earth; Thou alone, both in the present and the future life, must be my only Portion, my only Good, my only Love. And, since Thou hast loved me, as I see by the proofs Thou givest me, help me to detach myself from everything which can divert me from Thy love. Grant that my soul may be entirely taken up with pleasing Thee, as the only object of all my affections. Take possession of all my heart; I will be no longer my own. Do Thou rule me and make me prompt to execute Thy will.

O Mary, Mother of God, in thee I trust; thy prayers have to make me belong wholly to Jesus.

Reflection 33

TO SEE AND LOVE GOD IN THE NEXT LIFE IS THE JOY OF THE BLESSED IN PARADISE

LET us see what it is in Heaven that makes those holy citizens completely happy. The soul in Heaven, seeing God face to face and knowing His infinite beauty and all His perfections, which render Him worthy of infinite love, cannot but love Him with all its powers, and loves Him far more than itself. Nay, even forgetting itself, as it were, it thinks of nothing and desires nothing but to see Him happy who is its Beloved and its God; and seeing that God, the only Object of all its affections, enjoys an infinite happiness, this happiness of God constitutes its entire Paradise. If a soul were capable of anything infinite, its own joy would also be infinite in seeing that its Beloved is infinitely happy; but as a creature is not capable of infinite joy, the soul is at least satiated with joy, so that it desires nothing more. And this is that happiness for which David sighed when he said: "I shall be satisfied when Thy glory shall appear." (Psalms 16:15).

Thus is fulfilled what God says to the soul when He puts it in possession of Paradise: "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." (Matthew 25:21). He does not bid the joy enter into the soul, because this His joy, being infinite, cannot be contained in the creature; but He bids the soul enter into His joy, that it may receive a portion of it, and a portion so great as to satiate it and fill it with delight.

Therefore, I think that in prayer, among all the acts of love for God, there is no act of love more perfect than taking delight in the infinite happiness which God enjoys. This is certainly the continual exercise of the Blessed in Heaven; so that he who often rejoices in the happiness of God begins in this life to do that which he hopes to do in Heaven through all eternity.

The love for God with which the Saints in Paradise burn is so great that, if a fear of losing Him or of not loving Him with all their powers (as now they love Him) should ever enter their minds, this fear would cause them to experience a very hell of anguish. But no, for they are as sure as they are sure of God that they will love Him always with all their powers and that they will be ever loved by God, and that this mutual love will never change throughout eternity. O my God, make me worthy of this certainty through the merits of Jesus Christ.

This happiness which constitutes Paradise, moreover will be increased by the splendor of that delightful City of God, by the beauty of its inhabitants and by their companionship, especially by that of the Queen of all, Mary, who will appear fairer than all, and by that of Jesus Christ, whose beauty again will immensely surpass that of Mary.

The joy of the Blessed will be increased by the knowledge of the dangers of losing so great a Good which each one has passed through in this life. What, then, will be the thanksgiving offered to God by one who had unhappily deserved Hell by his sins and now finds himself there on high, whence he will see so many condemned to Hell for less sins than his own, while he is saved and sure of not losing God, destined to enjoy eternally in Heaven those boundless delights of which he will never grow weary! In this life, however great and continual be our joys, in time they weary us; but as for the delights of Paradise, the more they are enjoyed, the more they are desired, so that the Blessed are always fully satisfied with these delights and always desire them; they ever desire them and ever obtain them. Wherefore, that sweet song with which the Saints praise God and thank Him for the happiness He has given them is called a new canticle: "Sing ye to the Lord a new canticle." (Psalms 97:1). It is called new because the joys of Heaven seem ever as new as when they were tasted the first time, because they always possess them yet always long for them; they ever desire them and ever experience them. Thus, as the damned are called "vessels of wrath," the Blessed are called "vessels of divine love."

Justly, then, does St. Augustine say that, to gain this eternal blessedness, there ought to be eternal labor. Hence, it was little that the anchorites did with their penitential works and prayers to gain Paradise; it was little for the Saints to leave their riches and kingdoms to gain Paradise; little that so many martyrs suffered in enduring racks and burning irons and cruel deaths to gain Paradise.

Let us at least take care to suffer joyfully the crosses which God sends us, because all of them, if we are saved, will procure for us eternal joys. When infirmities, pains or other adversities afflict us, let us lift up our eyes to Heaven and say: "One day all these pains will have an end, and after that I hope to enjoy God forever." Let us take courage to suffer and to despise all the things of the world. Blessed is he who at death will be able to say with St. Agatha: "O Lord, who hast taken from me the love of the world, receive my soul." Let us endure everything, let us despise all that is created; Jesus awaits us and stands with the crown in His hands to make us kings in Heaven, if we be faithful to Him.

But how can I, O my Jesus, aspire to so great a good, I, who have so often for the sake of the miserable pleasures of earth renounced Paradise before Thy face and have trodden underfoot Thy grace? Yet Thy blood gives me courage to hope for Paradise, though I have so often deserved Hell. Yes, I hope for it because Thou hast died upon the Cross precisely in order to bestow Paradise upon those who have not deserved it. O my Redeemer and my God, I resolve to lose Thee no more; do Thou give me help to be faithful to Thee; Thy Kingdom come; through the merits of Thy blood, grant me one day to enter Thy Kingdom; and in the meantime, until death shall come, enable me to fulfill Thy will perfectly, which is the greatest good and is a paradise such as can be possessed upon earth by him who loves Thee.

Therefore, O ye souls who love God, while we live in this vale of tears, let us ever sigh for Paradise and say:

"O beauteous home! where love's reward
Love will itself bestow;
Where my so sweet and loving Lord
Himself unveiled will show;
When shall I see that blest abode,
And there behold and love my God?
When will that wished-for dawn arise?
While now I cry, 'twixt smiles and tears,
Ah, when? Ah, when shall end my fears?
O Paradise! O Paradise!"

ON PRAYER BEFORE THE MOST HOLY SACRAMENT OF THE ALTAR

MEDITATION, wherever it is made, pleases God; but it seems that Jesus Christ especially delights in the prayer which is mad e before the Most Holy Sacrament, since it appears that there He bestows light and grace more abundantly upon those who visit Him. He has left Himself in this Sacrament, not only to be the food of the souls who receive Him in Holy Communion, but also to be found present at all times by everyone who seeks Him. Devout pilgrims go to the holy house of Loreto, where Jesus Christ dwelt during His life, and to Jerusalem, where He died on the Cross; but how much greater ought to be our devotion when we find ourselves before a tabernacle, where this Lord Himself now dwells in person, who once lived among us and died for us on Calvary!

It is not permitted here on earth for persons of all ranks to speak alone with kings; but with Jesus Christ, the King of Heaven, all—both noble and plebeians, rich and poor—can converse at will in this Sacrament and remain as long as they will to lay before Him their needs and to seek His graces. And there Jesus gives audience to all, and hears and comforts all.

Men of the world, who know no pleasures but those of earth, cannot comprehend what pleasure can be found in spending a long time before an altar, where there is a consecrated Host. But to souls who love God, hours and days passed before the Blessed Sacrament seem but moments because of the heavenly sweetness which Our Lord there makes them taste and enjoy.

But how can worldly people expect to enjoy these sweetnesses if they keep their hearts and minds full of the earth? St. Francis Borgia used to say that in order that divine love may rule in our hearts, we must first banish from them the world; otherwise, divine love will never enter into them, because it finds no place to rest: "Be still, and see that I am God," said David. (Psalms 45:11). In order to have a relish for God and to taste how sweet He is to them that love Him, our hearts must be empty, that is, detached from earthly affections. Wouldst thou find God? "Detach thyself from creatures, and thou shalt find Him," says St. Teresa.

What should a soul do when in the presence of the Blessed Sacrament? It should love and pray. It should not stay there in order to experience sweetnesses and consolations, but only to give pleasure to God by making acts of love, by giving itself wholly to God without reserve, by stripping itself of all self-will and by offering itself, saying: "O my God, I love Thee and desire nothing but Thee; grant that I may always love Thee, and then do with me and with all that I possess whatever Thou pleasest." Among all acts of love, the most agreeable to God is that which the Blessed continually exercise in Heaven, that is to say, rejoicing in the infinite happiness which God enjoys. For, as we have already said, the soul in Heaven loves God immeasurably more than itself and therefore desires the happiness of its Beloved far more than its own; and seeing that God enjoys an infinite happiness, it would thereby feel an infinite delight; but as a creature is not capable of an infinite delight, it is at least quite filled with joy, so that the happiness of God constitutes its joy and its Paradise. These acts of love, even when made by us without any sensible sweetness, please God greatly. For the rest, God gives to His most beloved souls the enjoyment of His consolations in this life, not always, but only rarely; and when He does give them, He gives them, not so much as a reward for their good works (the full recompense of which He reserves for them in Heaven), as to give them more courage to suffer with patience the troubles and adversities of this present life and especially to bear with the distractions and dryness which pious souls experience in prayer.

As for distractions, of these we must not make any account; it is enough to drive them away when we perceive them. For the rest, even Saints suffer involuntary distractions, but they do not on this account leave off prayer. Neither must we do so ourselves. St. Francis de Sales said that, if in meditation we did nothing but drive away distractions again and again, our meditation would nevertheless be of great profit. Then, as for dryness, the greatest pain of souls given to prayer is to find themselves sometimes without any feeling of devotion, weary of it and without any sensible [i.e., "perceived"] desire of loving God; and with this is often joined the fear of being under God's displeasure on account of their sins, for which He may have abandoned them; and being in this utter darkness, they know not any way of escaping from it, for it seems to them that every way is closed against them. Let the devout soul, then, continue firm not to leave off meditation, as the devil intends. At such times, let the soul unite its desolation with that which Jesus Christ suffered upon the Cross; and if it can say nothing else, it is enough to say this, at least by an act of the will: "My God, I desire to love Thee; I wish to be wholly Thine. Have pity on me; abandon me not!" Say also, as a holy soul used to say to God in a time of greatest desolation:

"I love Thee, though I seem to be
But hateful in Thy sight;
And I will ever follow Thee
Where'er Thou turn Thy flight."

IN GOD ALONE TRUE PEACE IS FOUND

HE that seeks peace in creatures will never find it, because no creatures are capable of giving contentment to the heart. God has created man for Himself, who is an infinite good; therefore, God alone can satisfy him. Hence it comes that many persons, though loaded with riches, honors and earthly pleasures, are never satisfied; they are ever yearning for more honors, more possessions, more amusements; and however many they obtain, they are always restless and never enjoy a day of true peace. "Delight in the Lord, and He will give thee the requests of thy heart." (Psalms 36:4). When any person delights only in God and seeks nothing but God, God Himself will take care to satisfy all the desires of his heart; and then he will attain the happy state of those souls who desire nothing but to please God.

Senseless are they who say: "Happy is he who can employ himself as he likes, who can command others, who can take what pleasure he pleases." It is madness; he alone is happy who loves God, who says that God alone is sufficient for him. Experience shows clearly that so many persons called fortunate by men of the world, however much they are raised up to the possession of great riches and great dignities, lead an unhappy life and never find rest.

But how is this that so many persons, rich and titled, and even princes, in the midst of the abundance of the goods of the world, do not find peace? And, on the contrary, so many good religious, who live retired in a cell, poor and hidden, live so contentedly? How was it that so many solitaries, living in a desert or in a cave, suffering hunger and cold, yet exulted with joy? It is because they lived for God alone, and God consoled them.

"The peace of God . . . surpasseth all understanding." (Philippians 4:7). Oh, how much does not the peace which the Lord gives to those who love Him exceed all the delights which the world can give! "O taste and see that the Lord is sweet!" (Psalms 33:9). O men of the world, cries the prophet, why will ye despise the life of the Saints, without having ever known it? Try it for once; leave the world, leave it and give yourselves to God, and you shall see how well He knows how to console you more than can all the grandeurs and delights of the world.

It is true that even the Saints suffer great trials in this life; but they, resigning themselves to the Will of God, never lose their peace. The lovers of the world are seen to be at times joyful and at times sad, but in truth they are ever restless and in trouble. On the contrary, the lovers of God are superior to all adversities and to the changes of this world, and therefore they always live in uniform tranquility. See how the celebrated Cardinal Petrucci describes a soul wholly given to God: "It beholds creatures around it changing into various forms, while within the depths of its heart, it lives ever united to God without change."

But he who would be always united with God and would enjoy a continual peace must drive from his heart everything which is not God and live as one dead to earthly affections. O my God, give me help to disengage myself from all the snares which draw me to the world. Grant that I may think of nothing but pleasing Thee.

Happy are they for whom God alone is sufficient!

O Lord, give me grace that I may seek nothing but Thee and desire nothing but to love Thee and give Thee pleasure. For love of Thee I now renounce all earthly pleasure. I renounce also all spiritual consolations. I desire nothing but to do Thy will and to give Thee pleasure.

O Mother of God, recommend me to thy Son, who denies thee nothing.

Reflection 36

WE OUGHT TO HAVE GOD ALONE IN VIEW

IN ALL our actions we should have no other end in view but to please God, not to please our relations or friends or great people or ourselves, because everything which is not done for the sake of God is all lost. Many things are done to please or not to displease men, but says St. Paul: "If I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ." (Galatians 1:10). God only must be regarded in everything we do, so that we may say as Jesus Christ said: "I do always the things that please Him." (John 8:29). God has given us everything we have; we have of our own only nothingness and sin. God alone is He who has truly loved us. He has loved us from eternity, and He has loved us even so as to give Himself to us upon the Cross and in the Sacrament of the Altar. God alone, therefore, deserves all our love. Unhappy is that soul which looks with affection upon any object upon earth to the displeasure of God. It will never know peace in this life and is in imminent peril of never enjoying peace in the next. But on the contrary, happy is he, O my God, who seeks Thee alone and renounces everything for Thy love! He will find that pearl of Thy pure love, a jewel more precious than all the treasures and kingdoms of the earth. He that does this, obtains the true liberty of the sons of God, for he finds himself freed from all the bonds which draw him to earth and hinder him from uniting himself closely to God.

My God and my All, I prefer Thee to all riches, to honors, to knowledge, to glory, to expectations and to all the gifts which Thou couldst bestow on me. Thou art entirely my Good; Thee alone I desire and nothing more, for Thou alone art infinitely beautiful, infinitely kind, infinitely amiable; in a word, Thou art the Only Good. Wherefore, every gift which is not Thyself is not enough for me. I repeat, and I will ever repeat it, Thee alone I desire and nothing more; and whatever is less than Thee, I tell Thee, it is not sufficient for me.

Oh, when shall it be given me to occupy myself solely in praising Thee, loving Thee and pleasing Thee, so that I shall no more think of creatures, nor even of myself? O my Lord and my Love, help me when Thou seest me growing cold in Thy love, in danger of giving my affection to creatures and to earthly pleasures. "Put forth Thy hand from on high, take me out, and deliver me from many waters." (Psalms 143:7). Deliver me at that time from the danger of going far away from Thee.

Let others seek what they will; nothing pleases me and I desire nothing but Thee, my God, my Love and my Hope: "What have I in Heaven? And besides Thee, what do I desire upon earth? . . . Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever." (Psalms 75:25–26). My God and my all!

O men, let us undeceive ourselves! All the good which comes to us from creatures is but dust, smoke and deceits; God alone is He who can satisfy us. But in this life He does not grant us to enjoy Him fully; He only gives us certain foretastes of the good things which He promises in Heaven. There He awaits us to satiate us with His own bliss, when He will say to us: "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." (Matthew 25:21). The Lord gives heavenly consolations to His servants, only to make them yearn for that happiness which He prepares for them in Paradise.

O Almighty God, O God worthy of love, grant that in all things from henceforth we may aim at nothing and seek nothing but Thy pleasure. Grant that Thou mayest be our All and our only Love, since Thou alone, both in justice and in gratitude, dost deserve all our affections. Nothing gives me greater pain than the thought that in times past I have so little loved Thine Infinite Goodness, but I desire and resolve, with Thy help, to love Thee with all my strength for the time to come, and thus I hope to die, loving Thee alone, my Sovereign Good.

O Mary, Mother of God, pray for me, a miserable creature. Thy prayers are never refused; pray to Jesus that He may make me entirely His own.

Reflection 37

EVERYTHING SHOULD BE ENDURED TO PLEASE GOD

THIS has been the one only and dearest endeavor of all the Saints, to desire with their whole heart to endure every toil, all contempt, every pain, in order to give pleasure to God and thus to please that Divine Heart which so much deserves to be loved and loves us so much.

In this consists all perfection and the love of a soul for God—in its always seeking the pleasure of God and doing that which most pleases God. Oh blessed is he who can say with Jesus Christ: "I do always the things that please Him!" (John 8:29). And what greater honor, what greater consolation can a soul have than to go through some fatigue or to accept some affliction with the thought of giving pleasure to God? Too great is our obligation to give pleasure to that God who has loved us so much, who has given us all that we possess and who, not content with giving us so many good things, has gone so far as to give Himself to us, first on the Cross, dying upon it for love of us, and afterwards in the Sacrament of the Altar, where He gives Himself entirely to us in Holy Communion, so that He has nothing more that He can give us.

On this account, the Saints knew not what more they could do in order to give pleasure to God. How many young nobles have left the world in order to give themselves wholly to God! How many young maidens, even of royal blood, have renounced marriage with the great in order to shut themselves up in a cloister! How many anchorites have gone to hide themselves in deserts and caves in order to meditate upon God alone! How many martyrs have embraced scourges and red-hot iron plates and the most cruel torments of tyrants in order to please God! In a word, in order to give pleasure to God, the Saints have stripped themselves of their possessions, have renounced the greatest earthly dignities and have accepted as treasures, infirmities, persecutions, the loss of their goods and a death the most painful and desolate.

The good pleasure of God, therefore, if we truly love it, ought to be preferred by us to the acquisition of all the riches, of all the honors, of all the delights of earth, and even of Paradise itself. Yes, for it is certain that all the Blessed, if they were to know that it would please God more that they should burn in Hell, one and all, even the Mother of God, would cast themselves into that abyss of fire and suffer eternally in order to give greater pleasure to God.

For this end has God placed us in the world, in order that we may labor to please Him and give Him glory. Wherefore, to give satisfaction to God ought to be the one object of all our desires, of all our thoughts and actions. Well does that Heart deserve to be pleased in all things which has so greatly loved us and is so anxious for our good.

But how is it, O Lord, that I, an ungrateful wretch, instead of seeking to give Thee pleasure, have so often displeased Thee? Yet the detestation which Thou makest me feel for the sins I have committed against Thee causes me to hope that Thou art willing to pardon me.

Pardon me, then, and suffer me not to be ungrateful to Thee any more. Grant that I may overcome everything to give Thee pleasure. "In Thee, O Lord, have I hoped; I shall not be confounded forever." (Psalms 30:1).

O Queen of Heaven and my mother, draw me entirely to God.

Reflection 38

BLESSED IS HE WHO DESIRES NOTHING BUT GOD

"BLESSED are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven." (Matthew 5:3). By "the poor in spirit" are meant those who are poor in earthly desires, and wish for nothing but God. These are poor in affection, but not in reality, since they live contented, even in this life; and therefore Our Lord does not say: "Theirs shall be the kingdom of heaven," but "theirs is," because even in this life they are rich in spiritual goods which they receive from God. Thus, however poor they are in temporal goods, they live content with their condition. They are different from those who are rich in earthly desires, who in the present life, whatever riches they possess, are always poor and live discontented. For the good things of this life do not satisfy our thirst, however much they are increased; wherefore, these persons are never contented, never attaining to the acquisition of as much as they desire.

In order to enrich us with true riches, Jesus Christ chose to be poor, as the Apostle writes: "He became poor for your sakes, that through His poverty you might be rich." (2 Corinthians 8:9). He chose to be poor, in order to teach us by His example to despise earthly goods and thus to make us rich with heavenly goods, which are immensely more precious and are eternal. Therefore, He declared that whoever did not renounce everything on earth that he possesses with attachment could not be His true follower.

Happy is he who desires nothing but God and says with St. Paulinus: "Let the rich have their riches and kings their kingdoms; Christ is my riches and my kingdom." Let us persuade ourselves that God alone can content us, but He does not fully content any but those souls that love Him with all their hearts. And what room can the love of God find in a heart that is full of this earth? Such people may go often to Communion and pay frequent visits to the Blessed Sacrament, but because this love of earth is in their hearts, God cannot wholly possess them and enrich them as He would.

Many souls lament that in their meditations and Communions and in their other most devout exercises they do not find God. To such, St. Teresa says: "Detach thy heart from creatures, and thou shalt find God." Let us strip ourselves of every affection which is of earth, and especially of our own will. Let us give to God our whole will without reserve and say to Him: "Lord, do Thou dispose of me and of all I have as Thou pleasest; I desire nothing but what Thou desirest, and I know that what Thou willest is best for me. Grant me, then, that I may ever love Thee, and I desire nothing more."

Now, the only means to detach ourselves from creatures is to acquire a great love for God. If the love of God does not succeed in obtaining the mastery over our whole will, we shall never succeed in becoming saints. The means for acquiring this all-holy love is prayer. Let us constantly pray to God to give us His love, for thus we shall find ourselves detached from everything created. Divine love is a thief, which in a holy way robs us of all earthly affections and causes us to say: "What else do I desire but Thee alone, O God of my heart!"

"Love is strong as death." (Canticle of Canticles 8:6). This means, that as there is no power which resists death, so there is nothing, even of things most difficult to overcome, which can resist divine love. Love conquers all. By the love of God the holy martyrs conquered the fiercest torments, and the most painful deaths.

Oh happy, in a word, is he who can say with David: "What have I in Heaven? And besides Thee, what do I desire upon earth? . . . Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever!" (Psalms 72:2526). What else can I desire in this life and in eternity but Thee alone, O my God? Let others have the good things they desire; be Thou, O God of my heart, my only Good; be Thou all my Peace.

Alas, the soul is always in danger of abandoning God and being lost, so long as it has not given itself wholly to God; while he who has truly given himself entirely to God can rest secure of never leaving Him, because Our Lord is indeed kind and faithful to everyone who has given himself to Him without reserve. But why is it that some persons who at first lived a holy life afterwards fell so grievously that they left little hope of their salvation? Why is this? Because, I answer, they had not given themselves wholly to God, and this their fall is the proof of it.

O my God, and my true Lover, suffer not that my soul, which was created to love Thee, should love anything apart from Thee and should not wholly belong to Thee, who hast purchased me with Thy blood. O my Jesus, how is it possible that, after having known the love which Thou hast borne me, I can love any object besides Thee? Draw me always more within Thy heart; make me forget everything, so that I may not seek nor sigh after anything but Thy love. O my Jesus, in Thee I trust.

O Mary, Mother of God, in thee are my hopes; detach me from the love of everything which is not God, that He may be the object of all my affections and of my eternal happiness.

Reflection 39

ON DRYNESS OF SPIRIT

SAINT FRANCIS de Sales says that true devotion and the true love of God do not consist in feeling spiritual consolations in prayer and other devout exercises, but in having a resolute will to do and to will nothing but what God wills. This is the one end for which we should apply ourselves to prayer, to Communion, to mortification and to every other thing which is pleasing to God, although we do them without relish and in the midst of a thousand temptations and in weariness of spirit. "With aridity and temptations," says St. Teresa, "God makes trial of those who love Him. Even if the whole life should be passed in dryness, let not the soul leave off prayer; the time will come when all will be abundantly rewarded."

As the masters of the spiritual life recommend, in a time of desolation we ought principally to exercise ourselves in acts of humility and resignation. There is no better time for learning our own helplessness and our misery than when we are dry in prayer, wearied, distracted and disgusted, without any sensible fervor, and even without any apparent desires of making progress in divine love. At such times let the soul say: "Lord, have mercy upon me; behold how powerless I am to make even a good act!" Besides, we must resign ourselves and say: "O my God, is it Thy will to keep me thus in darkness, thus in affliction? May Thy holy will be ever done. I desire not to be consoled; it is enough for me to remain here, solely to give Thee pleasure." And thus we ought to persevere in our prayer during the appointed time.

The greatest pain, however, which a soul given to prayer suffers is not so much dryness, as a darkness in which it finds itself stripped of all good will, and tempted against Faith and against Hope. Sometimes, in addition, it experiences violent attacks of temptations and such distrust that it is in grievous fear of having lost even the grace of God; and it seems to it, as if on account of its sins, God had already driven it away from Him and had abandoned it, so that in this state, the soul looks upon itself as if hated by God; and therefore, at such times even solitude torments it, and mental prayer seems to it a kind of hell. Then must it take courage, and it must know that these fears of having yielded to temptation or to despair are indeed fears and the torment of the soul, but not voluntary acts and therefore are free from sin. At such a time a person really resists temptation with his will, though on account of the darkness which bewilders him, he is not able distinctly to perceive it. And this is proved by experience, for if afterwards he were to be tempted to commit knowingly a simple venial sin, his soul, which loves God, would rather accept death a thousand times.

On this account, we must not trouble ourselves at such times to attain a certainty that we are in the grace of God and that there was no sin. You then want to know and to be sure that God loves you, but at this time God does not choose to let you know it. He wills that you should only strive to humble yourself and trust in His Goodness and resign yourself to His Will. You want to see, and God does not will that you should see. For the rest, St. Francis de Sales says that the resolution which you have (at least in your will) to love God and not to give Him deliberately the least displeasure is an assurance that you are in the grace of God. Abandon yourself, therefore, at such times into the arms of the Divine Mercy; protest to God that you desire nothing but Him and His Will, and fear not. Oh, how dear to Almighty God are these acts of confidence and resignation made in the midst of this terrible darkness!

For forty-one years St. Jane Frances de Chantal suffered these interior pains, accompanied by horrible temptations and by fears that she was in a state of sin and was abandoned by God. So great was her anguish that she used to say that the thought of death was the only thing which at this time gave her relief. She said: "Sometimes it seems to me that my patience is exhausted and that I am on the point of giving up everything and of abandoning myself to perdition." For the last eight or nine years of her life, her temptations, instead of diminishing, became more terrible, so that whether she was praying or working, her interior martyrdom was such as to excite compassion in everyone who was intimate with her. It seemed to her sometimes that God drove her from Him, so that to relieve herself, she turned her thoughts away from God. But not finding the relief she sought, she turned again to the contemplation of God, even though He seemed angry with her. In meditations, in Communions and in other devout exercises, she experienced nothing but weariness and anguish. She seemed to herself to be like a sick person overwhelmed with diseases, incapable of turning herself to another side; dumb, so as not to be able to explain her sufferings; and blind, so that she could see no way of escaping from the depths of her misery. She seemed to have lost divine love, and Hope, and Faith; for the rest, she kept her eyes fixed upon God, reposing in the arms of the Divine Will. In a word, St. Francis de Sales used to say of her that her blessed soul was like a deaf musician, who sang most admirably, but had no pleasure in his voice, because he could not hear it. The soul, therefore, which finds itself tried with dryness must not lose courage, however much it may feel overwhelmed by darkness, but must trust in the blood of Jesus Christ and resign itself to the Divine Will and say:

"O Jesus, my Hope, and the only Love of my soul, I deserve not consolations; give them to those who have always loved Thee; I have deserved Hell and to be there forever, abandoned by Thee without hope of ever being able to love Thee. But no, my Saviour, I accept every suffering; chastise me as much as Thou wilt, but deprive me not of the power of loving Thee. Take from me everything, but not Thyself. Miserable as I am, I love Thee more than myself, and I give myself wholly to Thee; I resolve to live no more for myself. Give me strength to be faithful to Thee.

"O holy Virgin, Hope of Sinners, I place my confidence in thy intercession; make me love my God, for He has created and has redeemed me."

Reflection 40

ON A LIFE OF RETIREMENT

SOULS that love God find their paradise in a retired life in which they are removed from intercourse with men. No, to converse with God, withdrawing one's self from creatures, does not bring bitterness or weariness. "His conversation hath no bitterness, nor His company any tediousness, but joy and gladness." (Cf. Wisdom 8:16).

Worldly people, with good reason, flee from solitude, because in solitude, where they are not occupied with diversions or worldly affairs, the remorse of conscience makes itself felt more in their hearts; and therefore such persons seek to relieve themselves, or at least to distract their thoughts, by conversing with men; but the more they study to relieve themselves among men and among worldly affairs, the more they meet with thorns and bitter disappointments.

To the lovers of God this does not happen, because in retirement they find a Sweet Companion who consoles them and makes them glad, more than the company of all their friends or relations, or of the highest personages of the earth. St. Bernard used to say: "I am never less alone than when alone, never less alone than when far from men, for then I find God, who speaks to me, and then I see myself, on the other hand, more attentive to His voice and more disposed to unite myself to Him." Our Blessed Saviour desired that His disciples, notwithstanding that He had destined them to propagate the Faith by journeying throughout the whole world, should from time to time cease their labors and retire into solitude, to treat with God alone. We know, moreover, that Jesus Christ, even at the time when He was living on earth, was accustomed to send them into different parts of Judea, that they might convert sinners; but after their labors, He did not fail to invite them to retire to some solitary place, saying to them: "Come apart into a desert place, and rest a little. For there were many coming and going, and they had not so much as time to eat." (Matthew 6:31).

If Our Lord said even to the Apostles, "rest a little," it is therefore necessary for all apostolic laborers to retire from time to time into solitude to preserve their spirit of recollection and union with God and to obtain strength to labor afterwards with greater vigor for the salvation of souls.

He that labors for his neighbor with but little zeal and with little love for God, having some end in view dictated by self-love, of seeking to gain honor or wealth, does little for gaining souls. Therefore, Our Lord says to His laborers: "Rest a little." Certainly Jesus Christ did not mean by this expression that the Apostles were to go to sleep, but that they should repose in holding communion with God, in praying to Him for the graces necessary for living well, and thus should gain strength to employ themselves afterwards for the salvation of souls. Otherwise, without this repose with God in prayer, there is an absence of the vigor necessary to attend well to one's own progress and to the profit of others.

St. Lawrence Justinian, speaking of retirement, wisely remarks that it is to be always loved, but not always enjoyed: meaning to say that they who are called by God to labor for the conversion of sinners must not remain always in solitude, shut up in a cell, for they would be neglecting their divine vocation, to obey which, when God calls them, they must leave their retirement. Yet they should never cease to love and to sigh for solitude, in which God allows Himself to be more easily found.

O my Jesus, I have loved retirement little, because I have loved Thee little. I have gone seeking pleasures and relaxations from creatures, who have made me lose Thee, the Infinite Good. Alas, that for so many years I have kept my heart dissipated, thinking only of the goods of earth, and forgetting Thee! Oh take Thou for Thyself this heart of mine, since Thou hast purchased it with Thy blood! Inflame it with Thy love and make it entirely Thine own.

O Mary, Queen of Heaven, thou canst obtain for me this grace; from thee I hope for it.

Reflection 41

ON DETACHMENT FROM CREATURES

IN ORDER to attain to loving God with all our hearts, we must detach ourselves from everything which is not God, or does not tend toward God. He wills to be alone in the possession of our hearts; He admits no companions there, and with reason, because He is our only Lord, who has given us everything. Yet more, He is our only Lover, who loves us, not for His own interest, but solely out of His Goodness; and because He loves us exceedingly, He demands that we should love Him with all our hearts: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart." (Matthew 22:37).

To love God with our whole heart implies two things: the first is to banish every affection which is not for God, or according to the will of God. "If I knew," said St. Francis de Sales, "that there was one fiber in my heart which did not belong to God, I would instantly tear it out." The second is prayer, by which divine love is introduced into the heart. But if the heart does not empty itself of all that is of the earth, love cannot enter, for it finds no room for itself. On the contrary, a heart detached from all creatures becomes quickly inflamed and increases in divine love at every breath of grace.

"Pure love," says the holy Bishop of Geneva, "consumes everything which is not God, in order to change it into itself, because everything which is done for God, is love of God." Oh how full of goodness and liberality is God to the soul which seeks nothing but Him and His Will! "The Lord is good . . . to the soul that seeketh Him." (Lamentations 3:25). Happy is he who, still living in the world, can say with truth, as did St. Francis: "My God and my all!" And thus he can hold in contempt all the vanities of the world. "I have despised the kingdom of the world and all worldly honor for the love of Jesus Christ, my Lord."

When, therefore, creatures would enter into our heart and take a share of that love, which we owe entirely to God, we must immediately dismiss them, shutting the door against them and saying: "Begone; go to those who desire you; my heart I have given wholly to Jesus Christ; there is no room for you." And besides this resolution to desire nothing but God, we likewise must hate that which the world loves and love that which the world hates.

Above all, to attain to perfect love, we must deny ourselves, embracing that which is distasteful to self-love and rejecting that which self-love demands. A certain thing is pleasant to us; for that very reason we must refuse it. A certain medicine is disagreeab le, because it is bitter; we must take it, just because it is bitter. We do not like to oblige a certain person who has been ungrateful to us; we must by all means do him good, precisely because he has been ungrateful.

St. Francis de Sales says, moreover, that we must love even virtues with detachment; for example, we ought to love meditation and retirement; but when they are forbidden to us through the calls of obedience or of charity, we must leave both the one and the other without being disquieted. And thus it is necessary to embrace with equanimity everything which happens to us through the Will of God. Happy is he who wishes, or does not wish for, whatever happens to him, because God wills or does not will it, without inclining to either side. And therefore, we must beg of God to enable us to find peace in everything which He appoints us.

Let us listen to the words of Cardinal Petrucci, who in a few lines describes well the folly of the lovers of the world and the happiness of the lovers of God:

"What is this fickle world
So false and vain?
A scene of blasted hopes,
Remorse and pain.
Its sweetest charms, its feasts,
Its gilded toys
Bring tortures, though they seemed Nought else but joys.
Then bravely follow Christ,
The cross endure:
It seems to torture, yet
Gives joys most pure."

It is certain that no one lives more happily in the world, than he who despises the things of the world and lives in continual uniformity with the Will of God. Therefore, it is useful frequently during the day, at least at prayer and Communion, to renew at the foot of the crucifix the total renouncement of ourselves and of all we have, saying:

"O my Jesus, I desire to think no more of myself; I give myself wholly to Thee; do with me what Thou pleasest. I see that everything that the world offers me is vanity and deceit. From this day, I resolve to seek nothing but Thee and Thy good pleasure; help me to be faithful to Thee.

"Most Holy Virgin Mary, pray to Jesus for me."

Reflection 42

PRECIOUS IS THE DEATH OF THE SAINTS

"PRECIOUS in the sight of the Lord is the death of His Saints." (Psalms 115:15). Why is the death of the Saints called precious? "Because," replies St. Bernard, "it is so rich in blessings that it deserves to be purchased at any price."

Some persons attached to this world would wish that there was no such thing as death; but St. Augustine says: "What is it to live long upon this earth except to remain long in suffering?" "The miseries and sorrows which constantly afflict us in this present life are so great," says St. Ambrose, "that death seems rather a relief than a punishment."

Death terrifies sinners because they know that from the first death, if they die in sin, they will pass to the second death, which is eternal; but it does not terrify the good, who, trusting in the merits of Jesus Christ, have sufficient signs to give them a moral assurance that they are in the grace of God. Wherefore, those words, "Depart, Christian soul, from this world," which are so terrible to those who die against their will, do not afflict the Saints, who have preserved their hearts free from worldly love and with a true affection were always repeating: "My God and my all."

To these, death is not a torment, but a rest from the anguish they have suffered in struggling with temptations and in quieting their scruples and their fear of offending God, so that what St. John writes of them is fulfilled: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord! From henceforth now, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors." (Apocalypse 14:13). He that dies loving God is not disturbed by the pains which death brings with it; but rather, he is glad of them, that he may offer them to God as the last remnants of his life. Oh what peace is experienced by him who dies when he has abandoned himself into the arms of Jesus Christ, who chose for Himself a death of bitterness and desolation, that He might obtain for us a death of sweetness and resignation!

O my Jesus, Thou art my judge, but Thou art also my Redeemer, who hast died to save me. From the time of my first sin, I deserved to be condemned to Hell, but in Thy mercy Thou hast given me a deep sorrow for my sins; wherefore, I confidently hope that now Thou hast pardoned me. I did not deserve to love Thee anymore, but Thou by Thy benefits hast drawn me to Thy love. If it is Thy will that death should come to me in this sickness, I willingly accept it. I well see that I do not deserve to enter Paradise at once; I go contented to Purgatory, to suffer as long as it pleases Thee. There my greatest pain will be to remain far from Thee, sighing to come and see Thee and love Thee face to face. Therefore, O my beloved Saviour, have pity on me.

And what else is this present life but a state of perpetual danger of losing God? "We walk amidst snares," says St. Ambrose; amidst the snares and deceits of enemies who seek to make us lose the divine grace. Therefore, St. Teresa, every time that the clock struck, gave thanks to God that another hour of struggle and peril had passed without sin; and therefore also, she was so rejoiced at the tidings that her death was at hand, considering that her conflicts were over and the time was near for her to depart and behold her God.

In this present life we cannot live without defects. This is the motive which makes souls that love God even desire death. It was this thought which, at the time of death, rejoiced Father Vincent Carafa when he said: "Now that I finish my life, I cease to offend God." A certain virtuous man gave directions to his attendants that, at the time of his death, they should often repeat to him these words: "Comfort thyself, because the time is near when thou wilt no more offend God."

And what else is this body to us but a prison in which the soul is confined, so that it cannot depart to unite itself with God? On this account, St. Francis, inflamed with love at the hour of his death, cried out with the prophet: "Bring my soul out of prison." (Psalms 141:8). O Lord, deliver me from this prison which prevents me from seeing Thee. O amiable death, who can fear thee and not desire thee, since thou art the end of labor and the beginning of eternal life! St. Pionius the Martyr, standing by the scaffold, showed himself so full of joy that the people who stood by wondered at his delight and asked him how he could be so happy when he was just about to die. "You are mistaken," said he, "you are mistaken; I am not hastening to death, but to life."

O most sweet Jesus, I thank Thee for not having made me die when I was under Thy wrath and for having won my heart by so many loving artifices which Thou hast employed. When I think of the displeasure I have often given Thee, I should wish to die of grief. This my soul, which once was lost, I now commit wholly into Thy hands. "Into Thy hands I commend my spirit." (Luke 23:46). Remember, O Lord, that Thou hast redeemed it with Thy death. "Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, the God of truth." (Psalms 30:6). I love Thee, O Infinite Goodness, and I desire to depart quickly from this life, that I may come and love Thee with a more perfect love in Heaven. Meanwhile, as long as I shall live on this earth, make me know always better my obligation to love Thee. O my God, receive me; I give myself wholly to Thee, and I put my trust in Thee through the merits of Jesus Christ.

I trust also in thy intercession, O Mary, my hope.

Reflection 43

ON LUKEWARMNESS

THERE are two kinds of lukewarmness: one which can be avoided, and the other which cannot be avoided. Unavoidable tepidity is that which in the present life is endured even by fervent souls because, through natural weakness, they cannot avoid falling from time to time into some slight fault, but without full consent. From such defects, no one, because of the corruption of our nature through Original Sin, is free, without a most special grace, which was granted to no one but the Mother of God. God Himself permits these imperfections in His Saints in order to keep them humble. Often they find themselves without fervor, full of weariness and disgust in their devout exercises; and at such times of dryness they are more apt to fall into many defects, at least without deliberation. For the rest, let not those who find themselves in this condition leave off their usual devotions, nor lose courage, nor believe that they have fallen into lukewarmness, for this is not lukewarmness. Let them go on with their accustomed exercises, let them detest their defects, let them often renew their resolution of giving themselves wholly to God, and let them have confidence in Him, for He will console them. There is true and deplorable lukewarmness when the soul falls into venial sins which are quite voluntary and grieves but little for them and takes even less care to avoid them, saying that they are trifles of no consequence. What! Is it nothing to displease God? St. Teresa used to say to her nuns: "My daughters, may God preserve you from willful sins, however small."

Some people say: "But such sins do not deprive us of the grace of God." He who says this is in great danger of seeing himself one day deprived of divine grace and in a state of mortal sin. St. Gregory writes that whoever falls into deliberate venial sins habitually, without feeling pain at it and without thinking of correcting himself, does not remain where he is, but will go on and fall down a precipice. [i.e., into mortal sin]. "The soul never stays on the spot where it falls." Mortal diseases do not always spring from serious disorders, but often from many slight disorders of long continuance; and thus the fall of certain souls into a state of sin is often to be attributed to the repetition of venial sins, which make the soul so weak, that when attacked by any violent temptation, it has no strength to resist and therefore falls.

"He that contemneth [shows contempt for] small things shall fall by little and little." (Ecclesiasticus 19:1). He that makes no account of trifling falls, will one day find himself down a precipice [i.e., in mortal sin]. Our Lord said: "Because thou art lukewarm, I will begin to vomit thee out of My mouth." (Apocalypse 3:16). This signifies that the soul will be abandoned by God, or at least deprived of those special divine aids which are necessary to preserve us in the state of grace. Let us understand well this point: The Council of Trent condemns those who say that we can persevere in grace without a special help from God: "If any one shall say that a man who is justified . . . can persevere in the justice he has received without the special help of God, . . . let him be anathema." (Council of Trent, Session 6, Canon 22). Therefore, we cannot persevere in grace without a special extraordinary help from God; but this special help God will justly refuse to one who makes no account of committing many venial sins with his eyes open. Is God bound to give this special help to one who does not abstain from willfully causing Him continual displeasure? "He who soweth sparingly, shall also reap sparingly." (2 Corinthians 9:6). If we are niggardly with God, how can we hope that God will be generous towards us?

Miserable is that soul which makes peace with sins, even when venial! He will go from bad to worse; for his passions, ever gaining ground upon him, will easily blind him; and when a man is blind, it is easy for him to find himself fallen down a precipice [into mortal sin] when least he expects it. Let us fear to fall into voluntary tepidity, for it is like hectic fever [consumption, i.e., tuberculosis], which does not cause much alarm, but is so malignant that with great difficulty is anyone cured of it.

For the rest, though it is very difficult for a lukewarm person to amend, yet there are remedies, if only he is resolved to amend. The remedies are: 1) a resolution to escape at all costs from this miserable state; 2) to remove the occasion of falling, without which there is no hope of amendment; and 3) frequently to recommend himself to God with fervent prayer, that He would give him strength to come out of this deplorable condition and not to cease praying until he finds himself delivered from it.

O Lord, have mercy on me. I see that I deserve to be cast forth by Thee for so many defects with which I serve Thee. Miserable that I am, it is for this reason I find myself without love, without confidence and without good desires. O my Jesus, abandon me not; stretch forth Thy powerful hand and draw me out of this depth of lukewarmness in which I see myself fallen. Grant this through the merits of Thy Passion, in which I place my confidence.

O holy Virgin, pray to Jesus for me.

Reflection 44

ON PURITY OF INTENTION

PURITY of intention consists in performing everything we do solely to please God. Jesus Christ has said that according to the intention, whether it be good or evil, such before God is the action performed. "If thy eye be evil, thy whole body shall be darksome." (Matthew 6:23). The single eye signifies a pure intention of pleasing God; the dark and evil eye signifies an intention which is not pure, as when our actions are done out of vanity or to please ourselves.

Can any action be more noble than to give one's life for the Faith? And yet St. Paul says, that he who dies from any motive but to please God gains nothing by his martyrdom.

If, then, even martyrdom profits nothing, unless it be endured for God, of what value will be all the preaching, all the labors of apostolic men, and also all the austerities of penitents, if they are done to obtain the praise of men or to gratify one's inclination?

The prophet Aggæus says that works, although holy in themselves, if not done for God, are put into bags full of holes—which means that they are all lost directly and that nothing remains of them. On the contrary, every action done with an intention of pleasing God, of however little value in itself, is worth more than many works done without a pure intention.

We read in St. Mark that the poor widow cast into the chest for alms in the Temple only two mites, but yet of her our Saviour said: "This poor widow hath cast in more than all." (Mark 12:43). St. Cyprian remarks on this that she put in more than all the others because she gave those two little pieces of money with the pure intention of pleasing God.

One of the best signs by which to know if a person acts with a right intention is that, if the work have not the effect desired, he will not be at all disturbed. Another good sign is that, when he has performed any work and afterwards is spoken ill of for it, or is repaid with ingratitude, he nevertheless remains contented and tranquil. For the rest, should he happen to be praised for it, he ought not to disquiet himself with the fear of vainglory; but should the thought present itself, let him despise it and say with St. Bernard: "I did not begin it for thee, nor because of thee will I leave it."

To act with an intention of acquiring more glory in Heaven is good, but the most perfect intention is to please God. Let us be persuaded that the more we divest ourselves of our own interests, so much the more will Our Lord increase our joy in Paradise. Blessed is he who labors only to give glory to God and to follow His holy will! Let us imitate the love of the Blessed who, in loving God, seek only to please Him. St. Chrysostom says: "If thou hast the honor of doing anything that pleases God, how canst thou ask any other reward?"

This is that single eye which pierces the heart of God with love toward us; as He said to the sacred Spouse: "Thou hast wounded My heart, My sister, My spouse; thou hast wounded My heart with one of thy eyes." (Canticle of Canticles 4:9). This one eye signifies the one end that holy souls have in all their actions, that of pleasing God. And this was the counsel that the Apostle gave to his disciples: "Therefore, whether you eat or drink, or whatsoever else you do, do all to the glory of God." (1 Corinthians 10:31). The venerable Beatrice of the Incarnation, the first daughter of St. Teresa, said: "No sufficient price could be paid for anything, however small, which is done for God." And with reason did she say this, for all works done for God are acts of divine love. Purity of intention makes the lowest actions become precious, such as eating, working, or even taking recreation, when all is done from obedience, and to please God.

We must, then, from the very morning direct to God all the actions of the day; and it is very profitable to renew this intention at the beginning of every action, at least of the most important, such as meditation, Communion, and spiritual reading; pausing a little at the beginning of these, like that holy hermit who, before beginning anything he had to do, lifted his eyes to Heaven and remained still; and when he was asked what he was then doing, he replied: "I am making sure of my aim."

And I, O my Jesus, when shall I begin to love Thee truly? Alas, for me! If I seek among my works, even those that are good, for one action done only to please Thee, my Saviour, I do not find it. Ah then, have pity on me, and suffer me not to serve Thee so ill, even till my death! Grant me Thy help, that what remains to me of life I may spend only in serving and loving Thee. Make me overcome all, that I may please Thee and do everything only to give Thee pleasure. Through the merits of Thy Passion I ask it.

O my great Advocate, Mary, obtain for me this grace by thy prayers.

Reflection 45

SIGHS FOR OUR HEAVENLY HOME

HAPPY is he who is saved and who, leaving this place of exile, enters into the heavenly Jerusalem, to enjoy that perfect day which shall be always day and always joyful, free from all cares and from all fear of ever losing that immense happiness.

The patriarch Jacob said: "The days of my pilgrimage are a hundred and thirty years, few and evil." (Genesis 47:9). The same may be said by us miserable pilgrims, while we remain on this earth, enduring the labors of our exile, distressed by temptations, harassed by passions, and afflicted by miseries and still more by the dangers to our eternal salvation. Seeing all this, we should reflect that this is not our home, but a land of exile where God detains us, in order that we may, by suffering, merit to enter one day into the happy country of Heaven.

And therefore, living detached from this earth, we ought always to sigh for Paradise saying: "When shall it be, O Lord, that I shall be delivered from so many anxieties and think of nothing but of loving Thee and praising Thee? When shall it be that Thou wilt be all to me in all things, as the Apostle writes: 'That God may be all in all?' (1 Corinthians 15:28). When shall I enjoy that unchanging peace, free from all affliction and from all danger of being lost? When, O my God, shall I find myself swallowed up in Thee and behold Thine infinite beauty, face to face and without veil? When, in a word, O my Creator, shall I attain to the possession of Thee in such a manner that I may say: 'My God, I cannot lose Thee anymore?' "

Meanwhile, O my Saviour, while Thou seest me an exile and afflicted in this land of enemies, where I have to be fighting in ceaseless internal wars, help me by Thy grace and console me in this so sorrowful a pilgrimage. Whatever the world may offer me, I already know that nothing in it can give me peace and satisfy me; but yet I fear lest, if I have not help from Thee, the pleasures of the world and my evil inclinations may draw me down some precipice [of committing mortal sin].

Seeing myself an exile in this valley of tears, I would wish at least to think of Thee continually, O my God, and rejoice in that infinite happiness which Thou enjoyest; but the evil desires of the senses often cry out within me and disturb me. I would wish to keep my affections ever occupied in loving Thee and thanking Thee, but the flesh entices me to enjoy sensual delights; hence, I am constrained to exclaim with St. Paul: "Unhappy man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (Romans 7:24). Miserable man that I am, in continual combat, not only with external enemies, but with myself, so that I am weighted down and a trouble to myself! "I am become burdensome to myself," said holy Job. (Job 7:20).

Who, then, will deliver me from the body of this death, that is, from the danger of falling into sin, from that peril, the fear only of which is to me a continual death, which torments me and will not cease to torment me all my life through? "O God, be not Thou far from me; O my God, make haste to my help." (Psalms 70:12).

My God, go not far from me, because if Thou goest from me, I fear I shall displease Thee. Rather, draw nearer to me with Thy powerful help; that is, succor me continually, that I may be able to resist the attacks of my enemies. The Royal Prophet tells me that Thou art near, that is, that Thou dost give holy patience to all who are sorrowful of heart and are in interior affliction. "The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a contrite heart." (Psalms 33:19). Remain very near me, then, my beloved Saviour, and give me that patience that I need to overcome the continual attacks by which I am tormented. How often, when I apply myself to prayer, do not troublesome thoughts draw me away and distract me with a thousand follies! Do Thou give me strength to drive them from me, when occupied with Thee, and crucify all the evil inclinations that hinder me from uniting myself with Thee. And take from me, I pray Thee, the great repugnance that I feel to embrace with resignation anything that is not agreeable to my self-love.

O house of my God, prepared for those that love Thee, to Thee I sigh from this land of misery. "I have gone astray, like a sheep that is lost; seek Thy servant." (Psalms 118:176). O beloved Shepherd of my soul, who didst descend from Heaven to seek and to save the lost sheep, behold, I am one who, turning my back on Thee, am miserably lost. Seek Thy servant, seek me, O Lord; abandon me not as I deserve; seek me and save me; take me and hold me tight upon Thy shoulders, that I may not leave Thee again.

But, even while I am longing for Paradise, my enemy is terrifying me with the remembrance of my sins; but the sight of Thee, my crucified Jesus, consoles me and gives me courage to hope that one day I shall come to love Thee and behold Thee unveiled in Thy blessed Kingdom.

Queen of Heaven, continue to be my advocate. Through the blood of Jesus Christ and through thy intercession, I have a firm hope of being saved.

PREFACE OF THE ITALIAN EDITOR

THE lives of the saints and everything that refers to them, no matter how unimportant and common-place they may be, excite in a wonderful manner the pious curiosity of the faithful who derive great spiritual advantage from their perusal. This fact, attested by daily experience, is very beautifully expressed by St. John Chrysostom when speaking of the apostles he says: "Oh, would that we might meet with a man who could give us the history of the apostles! Not a history, however, containing only what they wrote and spoke, but one portraying for us the whole tenor of their lives, what and when they ate, when they remained at home, when they went forth into the world, what they did every day, what places they visited, what houses they frequented, what journeys they undertook by sea and by land, and all narrated with the greatest exactness, for every detail is of the greatest utility to us." (In ep. ad Philem.) And what is here said of the apostles by St. John Chrysostom, may be applied equally well to all the great servants of God, the slightest details of whose lives have always formed the object as well of constant research as of religious veneration. Nor is it only the faithful who take an interest in such matters, but all sensible men who admire genius, because the heroism of Christian sanctity shines with such lustre that no thinking man can fail to recognize in the saints the heroes of humanity.

It is not wonderful then that so great honor has been paid at all times and by all men to their writings, and especially to their letters or familiar epistles in which are displayed before our eyes the excellence of character and the eminent virtues that made them the benefactors of religion, of society, and of the individual.

Feeling the full force of these considerations and confident that we should be doing a pleasing and useful work, we have undertaken to collect and to give to the public in one complete work as many letters of our holy Father St. Alphonsus as we have been able to find, many of which have never as yet appeared in print. We have chosen the present time for their publication on account of its peculiar appropriateness, for we celebrate this year the centenary of our Founder's happy death.

The letters of St. Alphonsus regarded in their complex fall naturally into four classes: 1. Letters to the religious of his own Congregation; 2. Letters of spiritual guidance; 3. Episcopal letters and ordonances; 4. Letters bearing on the Publication of his works and referring to other special affairs of the saint. Taking them as a whole, we do not hesitate to say that they give us a most faithful and perfect picture of this illustrious Doctor.

Nowhere does the saint show more fully than in this correspondence, which extends over the space of a half-century, the secrets of that soul, naturally noble but so perfected by grace, as to render him like unto his divine Master. Founder of a religious Congregation, a missionary powerful in word and deed, a director experienced and enlightened, an exemplary bishop, an author of wonderful fecundity, St. Alphonsus came in contact with persons of the most diverse character, found himself face to face with great difficulties, and had to treat affairs and questions of every kind. His long career is, so to speak, mirrored in his correspondence. At one time the holy Doctor turns to his own sons, spurs them on, directs them; at another he points out to souls hungering after perfection the simplest and safest road; now as a bishop he addresses his clergy, the civil authorities and the princes of the Church; then as a theologian he treats numberless questions in the field of controversy, which are nevertheless very useful; then finally we see him as an author superintending the editions of his numerous works. It is evident that a correspondence of this character cannot but be pleasing and interesting; for considering the abilities of the author, we expect it to contain many excellent qualities. A style simple, natural, free from all obscurity, and a moderate use of ornament, joined to a great fund of topics (or displayed in a great range of topics), show us the author confident of his strength, master of thought, as well as of expression. Then that practical wisdom, that holy, singular and characteristic gift of the saint, reveals itself on every page. Finally, what crowns the work and excites our unbounded admiration is the continual insight into the apostolic soul that dictated these letters. That burning love of souls which ever characterized the saint and which made of him a true apostle, is the formal element, is, so to speak, the very soul that vivifies the whole correspondence and all its parts. No matter whether the saint writes to his own sons or to strangers; whether he gives to persons favored by our Lord safe and gentle rules or spurs on tepid and unfaithful souls to the practice of the virtues proper to their state; whether he gently instils into the souls of the faint-hearted a filial confidence in God or shows to the scrupulous that their only means of salvation lies in obedience; no matter whether he demands justice against the guilty or implores pardon for the unfortunate; whether engaged in missions or in other works of the ministry, superintending the publication and sale of his works or praising the zeal of the publisher, everywhere and in everything we are forced to admire the apostle inflamed with zeal, animarum zelo succensus, the apostle who lives no longer for himself, but for Jesus Christ, the love of whom was his only aim and his glory. From this source arose that forgetfulness of self, that absence of all pretension, that true simplicity with its accompaniments, true zeal with its attendants, and which stand out in this correspondence in holder relief than in any other work.

It must not, however, be supposed that the correspondence will on that account be monotonous and consequently less delightful reading; on the contrary, on every page we meet with the most pleasing variety. Take for example the letter; which are intended for spiritual guidance. What a richness and variety of delightful subjects! Here we find the practical solution of questions relating to prayer and to its different species, to frequent Communion, to the line of conduct to be followed in time of spiritual consolation or in time of desolation, to a choice of a state of life, to the selection of a spiritual director, etc. These and a hundred more questions are treated here, we venture to say, more clearly and more concisely than in the other works of the holy Doctor, since he had to adapt himself to a variety of persons, to their different intellectual capacity, and to their progress in the spiritual life. The director of souls and the simple child of the Church, the dweller in the cloister, and the secular, will without great study, be enabled to admire that wisdom of St. Alphonsus in guiding along the heavenly path the souls committed to his care. What a knowledge of divine things! What sweet and prudent slowness! What watchfulness in removing all obstacles to grace! What energy in urging on the negligent! What constant charity in comforting desolate souls and in aiding sufferers of all classes, by showing them the great value of tribulations!

The historical notices of so great importance in our day are as abundant as they are valuable. Not to speak of what relates to the author, whose life is here outlined in great part, or of his Institute, the different phases of which are here described, or of his diocese and its government, the great event of the eighteenth century, the furious onslaught or infidelity, the tyrannical and hypocritical measures of the Neapolitan government, especially that regalism, the sworn enemy of the holiest rights of the Church, the suppression of the Society of Jesus, the persistent and malignant assaults of Jansenism on sound Catholic doctrine, all these great events, the importance of which has not been dimmed by time, gain not a little light from remarks scattered here and there throughout the correspondence. The saint's judgment on men and things expressed in his own peculiar style—(my concise style, he said to his publisher, Giuseppe Remondini, in a letter dated April 8, 1770)—will often tell the reader more than he would gain from the pages of history. Moreover, the reader will find here historical matter hitherto unknown which will serve to remove more than one difficulty and solve more than one historical problem. Church history itself cannot fail to be benefited by this work. Finally, no matter how great a man's esteem for the saint may be, he cannot gain a true knowledge of his ceaseless activity, of his services to the Church, not to mention his patience in supporting the vexations of the civil authority and the bitter attacks of enemies banded, together for the ruin of the Congregation, if he remains unacquainted with the saint's correspondence.

We confidently think that the reader will share our conviction and will not accuse us of exaggeration, if he will take the trouble to verify for himself, all that we have said; this he may easily do by taking the general index as a guide.

It will not be out of place to say a few words about the authenticity of the letters. In the editions printed at Rome, 1815, at Turin, 1831, and at Naples, 1848, the whole of the correspondence is not to be found; leaving room for improvement. We need not wonder at this. The works of the saints, and especially their letters, do not all become known at the same time. We may say of their letters what the Holy Scripture, says of their virtues: Justorum semita, quasi lux splendens procedit et crescit usque ad perfectum diem.—But the path of the just as a shining light goeth forward and increaseth even to perfect day. (Prov. iv. 18.) Such was the case with St. Ignatius of Loyola, with St. Teresa, with St. Jane Frances Chantal, with St. Vincent of Paul and others; these letters, truly treasures, scattered and hidden, were found and collected at the time marked out by Providence for the edification of the faithful. The same happened to the letters of our saint. Having been scattered here and there during his life on account of his wide-spread correspondence, it was impossible to collect them all at one time; long and persistent research was needed to bring them to light. Some were hidden beneath the dust of libraries whence they were providentially rescued some ten years ago; a great number had found their way into the hands of antiquaries and collectors of the autographs of celebrated men; others, finally, more than a thousand in number, having been examined by the Church in the process of the saint's beatification had been given to his numerous clients as precious relics, and had in this manner been scattered broadcast over the world. To obtain possession of these treasures, we resorted to all practices; we even called in the aid of the Catholic press to work upon the benevolence of those who either possessed such letters, or at least knew where any were to be found, in order that we might obtain at least a true copy. Our labor was not in vain; God deigned to bless it. Ecclesiastics and seculars and religious Communities responded courteously to our wishes. And here we feel it incumbent on us to thank them for their kindness, and we pray our holy Founder, to whose glory they have contributed, to grant them his choicest blessings. Nor have we neglected to write at the end of each letter the names of those who so kindly lent them, to show in this way our gratitude. We regret that we are not able to do this in every instance; for some of the letters though scrupulously authenticated by ecclesiastical authority reached our hands without any indication as to the names of their holders.

The number of the letters thus far collected convinces us that our edition surpasses by far the others in point of number, although we confess it is not so complete as we had wished to make it. The catalogue of letters drawn up for the beatification shows us that more than three hundred letters are still missing. Our wishes will some day be fulfilled, and God knows how earnestly we desire this. Again we entreat our courteous readers most earnestly and warmly to help us to fill out this void and to enable us to publish an edition in which nothing shall be wanting.

It will be scarcely necessary for us to remark that we have followed the text most scrupulously, going even so far as to leave unaltered those careless expressions which flow at times from the pen of every writer; as an excuse for this negligence we can say that St. Alphonsus never thought of their future publication; he wrote and dictated them while overwhelmed with business affairs, concerning himself only about the substance of the letter. We thought it advisable to enclose in brackets the common Italian term for some of the words belonging to the Neapolitan dialect which might have presented some difficulty to the reader. For the sake of uniformity the dates have been placed at the beginning of the letters. As however the date is missing in more than one letter, we have endeavored with all possible care to glean the date from the matter treated; we have marked with a special sign all such letters. With the exception of these slight modifications, we may say that the letters remain exactly as they were written or dictated by the saint; we say, dictated, for from the year 1758 he required the services of an amanuensis on account of a malady contracted at that time.

"I am not answering with my own hand (thus he wrote from Nocera, August 3, of the same year), as since my last sickness my hand gives me too much trouble. . . . . If there be a real necessity, I force myself to write what is necessary little by little. . . . . ." To this source we may ascribe the occasional omission of a name in these formulas so frequently used by him, Live Jesus, etc., careless expressions, and especially needless repetitions, for we know that when he was bishop, he was often obliged to summon to his aid a simple lay-brother, the good Brother Francesco Antonio Romito.

It would have afforded us the highest satisfaction, to have been able to reproduce the whole correspondence with the original letters before our eyes, though we can say that we have a great many which we have marked: After the original. Although, in spite of our labors, we have not been able to obtain all the originals, we do not think that the authenticity of the letters will be affected thereby. We have found some excellent copies in the general archives, the preservation of which we owe chiefly to the immortal biographer of the holy Doctor, Father Antonio Maria Tannoia; these are marked: After an old copy. As for the others, with the exception of a few letters taken from the Neapolitan edition, we have closely followed the Roman edition, as the reader will easily perceive. This latter edition, the work of the Postulator of the cause of the saint's canonization, Rev. Vincenzo Giattini, is authentic in every respect, as we have been able to compare it with a great number of the original letters. It may not be amiss to add here that though the printed text of the-Roman edition is the text of St. Alphonsus, it is not, unfortunately, always the entire text; having had occasion to compare some letters with the originals, which we had at hand, we found more than one omission which the editor saw fit to make, perhaps because he did not consider the parts omitted directly conducive to the edification, profit and spiritual advantage of the reader, the end that he had in view in editing the letters.

We must now say a few words about the order which we have followed in the arrangement of the letters.

On account of the diversity of matter and of persons it would be difficult, not to say impossible, to give an exact classification of the letters. Seeing, however, the great utility of some such arrangement, we have endeavored to meet it by dividing the whole work into two parts, under the heading of general correspondence and special correspondence. In the first division we place all the letters of whatever import addressed by the saint to his own Sons, and to externs of every class and condition, to ecclesiastical and civil authorities, to nobles, plebeians, relatives, friends, etc., but especially to cloistered persons striving for perfection.

In the second part we shall place, first, the letters referring to the works of the holy Doctor, their publication, the reasons that induced him to write them, his method of writing, the exposition and development of his moral system, etc.; these we shall call scientific letters; then follow the letters written during his episcopate, under the form either of notifications, decrees, instructions to his clergy and through them to the people, or of reports of his Visitation sent to the Sacred Congregation of the Council; added to these are letters wherein he treats ex professo of the government of his diocese, of giving missions or exercises to ecclesiastics, etc.; these we shall call generically pastoral letters.

As far as possible we have held to the chronological order, which, in our opinion, is the clearest and most natural, as it removes ambiguity, avoids repetition, and causes one to see the activity of the saint developing, as it were, before our eyes.

Finally, in order to place everything in the clearest light, we have thought it advisable to insert here and there notes throwing light upon persons and matters spoken of in the letters; the notes have been taken from most trustworthy sources.

If the reader should at times find them superfluous, especially those relating to members of our Congregation, we ask him to bear with us, as we were anxious to avail ourselves of the occasion to make honorable mention of those who, in our eyes, most deserved it.

True it is that the value of such a correspondence cannot be heightened by our poor labor, but the year in which it sees the light, adds to it a new and well-merited lustre; the year eighteen hundred and eighty-seven is the first centenary of the death of the saintly author! During the past century the spirit of St. Alphonsus has been working in the Church, and She has not forgotten to crown his name with honor. It is therefore with most joyful hearts that we bring our humble flowers to adorn the beautiful garland that decks the brow of our holy Father; we lay our poor offering, the pledge of our filial love, at the foot of his glorious tomb, imploring at the same time for ourselves, our gentle readers, and for all the devout clients of St. Alphonsus, his paternal blessing.

Letter 1

TO MOTHER ANGIOLA DEL CIELO[16731] AND TO THE NUNS OF SCALA

The saint gives various exhortations, general as well as particular, and recommends to the prayers of the nuns one of his penitents, who was greatly troubled in spirit.

NAPLES, October 29, 1730.

Praised be Jesus, Joseph, Mary, and Teresa!

May Jesus and Mary always possess our hearts! Finish Thy work, O Lord! and take entire possession of our hearts; we are willing to lose them, and may we find them no more, if only they are in Thy hands, for then they are in good hands.

I received your first letters on the feast of my patroness St. Teresa: it was a consolation for me only to see the envelope, for it told me who had written those letters. I did not write before, because I have been very much occupied, especially with the mission which is being held at Naples, and which is still to be concluded; added to this, I have, as you see, many correspondents to answer.

Now I am writing, and I wish to tell you that though some time has elapsed since my stay at Scala, my remembrance of you is as vivid as if I had departed only yesterday. If this should appear to you to be saying too much, ask our Lord to make me forget you; because, as far as I am concerned, I hope that memory will ever be the same; since, far from drawing me away from God, it serves to unite me more closely to him. I wish you also to know for your common consolation that the words of your letters are like so many arrows that wound me with the love of God. Courage then, Sisters! let us give our hearts entirely to Him who is knocking for admittance, and let us banish from them everything that is not for God. In order to give ourselves to him without reserve, let us endeavor to go out of ourselves, so that God may find no obstacle when he comes to take possession of our hearts.

Up to the present time, as I have already told you, I have been paying up for the agreeable time that I spent at Scala; I am as well as one can expect during the storm; I am in such a state that at times I can see neither heaven nor earth, and I find within myself a dark abyss, ubi nullus ordo, sed terribilis horror inhabitat,—where no order, but everlasting horror dwelleth. [Job, x. 22.] May the will of God be ever done! and if it be for the greater glory of God that I should be damned, may the will of God be done! This I say in all sincerity. Pray to God for me, that I may not offend him, since it would not be for his greater glory that I should offend him. O Lord! here I am; hell would be little for me.

Mgr. Falcoia[16732] has written to me in terms so affectionate, that he has entirely captivated me; he did not mention when he would return, but I understood it was to be about the 20th of November.

My dear Mother, I beg you most earnestly to pray and to have prayers said for my poor penitent Maria; I know no longer what to do or what to say to her. She does not hear me, she does not understand me. The more I say, the more troubled she becomes; hence she is also tempted to leave me. I have told her that she may go to whom she wishes, but I see that it is only a temptation. She is tempted almost continually to commit suicide. It appears to her that there is no God, and that if there be a God, he hates her and she hates him; moreover, it seems to her that this hatred which she bears towards God does not afflict her, and this thought only increases her misery. Her anguish, the reason and source of which she cannot explain, is so great that she has almost gone out of her mind. Only yesterday, while she was kneeling in the confessional, her pain was so excessive that it brought on a kind of swoon, which rendered her speechless. I tell you all this in order to excite your compassion for this poor desolate soul, who, I must say, consoles me by her prompt obedience even in things the most difficult which I have imposed upon her in order to try her. I ask you to pray for her for at least three days, and to recommend her to the prayers of the Community at holy Communion; moreover, have the Litany of our Lady said, that God may give me light and her strength to obey and to suffer this great affliction. If she does not throw off the yoke of obedience, I hope that she will give great glory to God; but there is need of much prayer and assistance. Pray then for her, as God has perhaps made me acquainted with you in order to obtain your prayers in behalf of this soul. And she in her turn will pray for you as well as she can.

Now, my dear Sisters, do not grow negligent in praying for me. I, who am a priest, called to save souls, should be filled with zeal for the glory of God: pray that I may give him pleasure, and then if he wishes to send me to hell, may his will be done! I shall appear importunate by repeating so often, Pray for me; because I fear that as time goes on you may grow cold. You must know that the very thought that you are praying for me gives me courage, and spurs me on to give pleasure to God, as it seems to me almost impossible that God can refuse to hear you when you pray earnestly for some soul, and say to him as St. Teresa was accustomed to say: Lord, we wish to obtain this for our friend. How discouraged I should feel if you should cease to pray for me! I beg you, if that should ever happen, to leave me in ignorance of the fact, that I may flatter myself with the thought that you are still praying for me. It would be a very great trial for me to find that you had forgotten me in your prayers. I for my part never forget you in my prayers, poor as they may be: to tell the truth, you share in a great part of my unworthy prayers. It seems to me that I pray more for you than for myself: for, as regards myself, I endeavor to be resigned if God wishes me to remain in the lowest grade of sanctity; but as for you, I will not rest until I see you all like Seraphim.

From time to time I turn towards your home and exclaim: O ye enamoured souls! love Jesus. Love him, then; do not lose a moment of time; you can give him the greatest pleasure. Remember that he loves you without ceasing; he loses no time. Speak to him often, especially when you find yourselves before him in the Blessed Sacrament; speak to him of love rather than of anything else: for he enjoys the conversation about love more than any other subject. Love Jesus: love above all his Sacred Heart and his divine will. Do not trouble yourselves as to whether you are among the predestined or the reprobate, among the abandoned or among the favorites of God. Unite your will with the will of God, and then say: O Lord! Thy pleasure and Thy glory are sufficient for me. Let this be our only aim to glorify God in ourselves; after that let disgrace and abandonment, crosses and trials, storms and darkness, desolation and despondency, come upon us; let them come as often as it pleases God to send them. He remains the same good God, worthy of all our love; may he then be blessed and loved forever!

Let us always speak in this manner, and then place all our confidence in God, for this is what he earnestly desires. I beseech our Lord to cause your hearts to burn in that furnace of love, of which St. Teresa speaks, and in which love is the torture of hearts.

My heart, confide and hope:

The tempest too is able oft

To bring the bark to port.[16733]

Do me the favor to omit henceforward in your letters the title Most Illustrious, as I am not a bishop.

Don Giovanni[16734] recommends himself to the prayers of all.

You may read the foregoing in public; but the following lines you will please read yourself, and then read to those particular Sisters to whom I am writing privately.

My penitent is writing to Sister Maria Colomba.

In the first place I address you not as Mother, but as Maria Angiola, and I wish to say to you: My daughter (I call you so because you call me Father), I am deeply grateful to you for whatever you do for me. I know that you not only pray for me yourself, but that you also recommend me very often to the prayers of the Community. To judge from your manner of acting, I should say that you are a woman of deeds rather than of words. You cannot imagine what great pleasure your conduct affords me.

Do not forget to pray for me; I never forget you nor will I ever do so, I assure you. I am no friend of twaddle, but I speak as I really feel. I recommend you to God in a special manner not only at Mass, but also in all my humble prayers; the grace which I ask from God for myself I seek to obtain for you also.

You are a guiding light to me, as I am certain that God reposes in your heart and wishes never more to leave it. Gratitude, as you well know, even towards our neighbor, is not displeasing to God. Your soul is very, very dear to God. It rests with you to inflame me with the love of God: it will be sufficient if you speak only one tender word to him when you recline upon his bosom after holy Communion.

The fears you express with regard to Maria Colomba fill me with great consolation: it encourages me to tell her that she must surrender her whole will to God, for he desires this. I conclude by blessing all your affections, thoughts, words, deeds, and in fact everything that is yours.

I forgot to send you that souvenir. I send you in this letter the verse: Dio mio, ecc.—My God, etc.[16735]

I send to Maria Cherubina her prayer: Gesù mio, ecc.—My Spouse, etc. Tell her from one that sorrow for sin is not necessary for one who has been already pardoned by God. I wish her to become inflamed with love, to become foolish for love, and finally to die of love for him who became a fool and died for love of us. Let her do this, and I, on my part, will take upon myself the responsibility of rendering an account of her soul; tell her that I bless her.

To Sister Maria Felice: Please tell her, I shall continue to offer her will to God, and that she must continue to do the same in my regard. I send her also the little prayer: .My Jesus, etc., which she has asked for.

To Sister Maria Rosa: Our dear Lord wishes her to become a saint, but without any delay. St. Rose became a saint and died the death of a saint while still very young.

Tell good Sister Maria Raffaella[16736] that I send her the following message: My dear Sister, I rejoice to hear that you have become blind and deaf; I would that you were as I desire to see you. I am delighted to hear again: Amo, e pure non so che ne sento amore.—I love, and yet I know not what I love. Whether you are far or near, united or separated, love, love the adorable will of God; do not trouble yourself to find out whether you love or do not love, whether you belong to God or not. Seek neither consolation nor light; do not strive to come forth out of your darkness and misery; everything happens according to the sweet will of God. For example, it is the will of God that you pray for me; abstain then from doing so if you can! Do not give yourself any further thought as to whether your prayer helps me or not. It is certain that if you make a saint of me, I shall be better able to assist you, as you well observe. I shall send the message for you to Mamma,[16737] through my other Mamma, St. Teresa; I know that Mamma will listen to it with the greatest pleasure. May Jesus and Mary bless you!

To Sister Maria Michele: Tell her that if my imprecations[16738] were realized, she would have to be pitied; and let her know that I shall not cease to pray for her until I learn that she is fairly burning alive with the love of God. I wish she would obtain from her Spouse, who I know loves her dearly, the same imprecation for me. I send her my blessing.

To Sister Maria Eletta: Ask her to keep her word, as I always recommend her to God.

To Sister Maria Emmanuele: I wish her to belong entirely to God before she dies.

To Sister Maria Giuseppa: I do not know whether you delivered my message to her, and whether she has promised to pray for me. Remember me again to her.

To Sister Maria Cristina: She ought to thank our dear Lord for all the lights that he has vouchsafed her; let her be careful to follow them. I thank her for her kind remembrance of me, and ask her to continue to pray for me, as I never forget her in my prayers.

To Sister Maria Evangelista: Tell her that in accordance with the promise that I made her, I recommend her very often to God: I hope that she, on her part, will keep her word. Let her also know that her Spouse is a jealous Spouse; he wishes to have her all his own.

To Sister Battista: I shall beseech our Lord to imprison her in his divine Heart.

You may tell all in particular, if they should ask, that I always remember them in my prayers, since I pray for all; tell them not to forget me.

If it should happen that you have to write to me before Christmas, especially if you wish to speak to me about Mgr. Falcoia, or about your own affairs, please write before the middle of December; for I believe about that time we shall have to set out for a distant mission, a journey of some eight days from Naples.

May God be our all! Praised be Jesus and Mary!

Mamma has begun to finish her work in my regard; this has induced me to compose a little canticle in her honor, which I now send you. You may read it to the others.

I am, your most devoted and humble servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI, a wretched sinner.

Letter 2

TO A COMMUNITY OF NUNS

Books sent.—Various counsels.—Exhortations to love Jesus and Mary.

[The year 1731]

My beloved Sisters in Jesus and Mary, praised and blessed forever be Jesus, Joseph, Mary, and Teresa!

Chains! ciliciums! I send you a good supply of books, which will do more to make you holy than chains and ciliciums. I have sent you eight books for meditation. You will please make three divisions of all the books that you receive: one for meditation, one for private reading in your cell, and one for the reading at table.

With regard to meditation, you may make use of one book in the morning and of another during the day. Choose any one that pleases you: they are all excellent.

After you have finished that meditation book on the presence of God, I wish you to begin the book called "Motives for Loving God."[16739] It would please me very much were you to make your morning meditation, for the most part, on the Passion of our Saviour, using for that purpose the little book, "Meditations on the Passion," by Da Ponte, or one by Spinola. On the feasts of our Lady or of the saints, take Spinola.

When you make your meditations from the book "Motives for Loving God," divide a point into three parts; do the same with the meditation on the Passion.

For private spiritual reading I send you eleven books, which Mother Superior will distribute among you; let them be circulated among all the Sisters in such a manner that each one will have the pleasure of reading them all.

I have sent you six lives of saints for the reading in the refectory; they will last a long time, and when you have finished them, begin to read them anew. I do not wish you by any means to give up reading at table in the morning P. Marchese's [16740] little work on the Madonna, which I understand you have. As for the rest, you may read any life.

Pay attention to what I am now going to say (I have already called the attention of the nuns of Scala to this point and they have obeyed me; I forgot to tell it to you before): in the reading at table, be extremely careful to read slowly and to observe the necessary pauses; for otherwise the reading cannot be understood and the listeners grow weary; let it be loud enough for all to hear. Remember this, for if when I arrive I find that you have not obeyed me, I shall scold you without fail. I have spoken with P. Sparano; he has conceded you the privilege of receiving holy Communion every Saturday in honor of our Lady.

Well now, do you want anything else? You see now that I have not forgotten you, and that I have been thinking of your welfare; try to forget me, if you have the heart to do so. Do not omit to recommend my poor penitent Maria[16741] every day to the Blessed Virgin; she is at present plunged in the very depths of misery. Ask Jesus to give her strength to endure this awful visitation, and pray to him for me.

I wish to make another remark with regard to the reading, and that is, that you are free to use for private spiritual reading the books destined for table reading, and those marked for private spiritual reading may be read in the refectory; do as you see fit.

Love Jesus and Mary, love them with all your heart, for they reveal themselves to those that strive to know them.

Love and be happy; he who loves so good a God should never allow dark and gloomy thoughts to enter his heart. Hence I do not wish to see you omit the recreation for any reason whatever; and if anything should ever happen to disturb the joy and harmony of recreation (which I hope will never be the case), let each do her utmost to restore cheerfulness and peace.

Ah! my dear daughters, if you only knew how Jesus loves you, how he always thinks of you and of your welfare, you could no longer live, no, you would die through the intensity of your love. If, then, you do not die of love, live for love; become fools for the love of Jesus, sigh after and desire that adorable Spouse who is so worthy of all our love. You have chosen him from among all for your Spouse; but he had already chosen you from all eternity to be his beloved spouses. Of whom then will you dare to think, if not of Jesus? whom can you love, if not Jesus? Oh, give all your thoughts and affections to Jesus! give them to him without reserve, and he will become entirely yours.

Always have a great devotion to Mamma Mary: in order to induce her to favor you; love her, praise her, honor her; let her sweet name be ever on your lips. Believe me, she loves you most tenderly. Show yourselves grateful by corresponding to her love. Devotion to Mary is a sure pledge of Paradise.

And now do not forget me; I assure you I do not ask you as a mere matter of form to pray for me to Jesus and Mary: I speak from my heart and mean what I say. Yes, pray for me, as you have promised, especially after holy Communion that I may always do the will of God; and when you pray for me, do not forget my poor penitent, to whom I have already promised your prayers. We shall remember you in our prayers.

Assist me in this storm, where I am in continual danger of losing my God.

But you will never lose him, no, never, whilst you are his and he is yours. Do you wish for more? I believe that God can be sufficient for you.

May Jesus, Joseph, and Mary be praised and blessed for all eternity!

ALFONSO DE LIGCORI, a vile sinner.

Letter 3

TO THE BENEDICTINE NUNS OF POLIGNANO

(In PUGLIA.)

He congratulates them on having been freed, through the assistance of the Blessed Virgin, from the molestations of the demons, and exhorts them to show their gratitude.

[NAPLES, September 10, 1732]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

My beloved daughters in Jesus and Mary: Our Lord knows the consolation that your affectionate letter, informing me of the favor received from Mary, afforded me. I read it to the Superior of the Congregation,[16742] Canon Torni, and he has retained it in order to read it before the assembled Congregation. Beginning with to-day, you must love Mary with new fervor, in a new manner. On Saturdays let each one do something more than usual—one by increasing the number of her vocal prayers and her acts of love, and another by seeking out new mortifications and sufferings. In order to commemorate this grace and to prevent all new attacks of the demons, have some devotion performed every day—either one in honor of the sorrows of Jesus or some other suitable devotion; for if you show yourselves ungrateful, the demons may return. And let a common fast on bread and water for those who are able to observe it be strictly kept on the anniversary of that memorable day, the 13th of August. But the greatest pleasure you can give to Mary is to love Jesus devotedly, who has granted this favor in order to be more loved by you. Think that Jesus, that Prisoner of love, has passed so many lonely nights without being visited by you, prevented as you were by your fear of the beast. Now that you are free you must make up for lost time. I ask the abbess to be kind enough to grant permission to all those Sisters who may wish to pray at night before their Spouse in the Blessed Sacrament. I beg her also to promote frequent Communion in order that the poor panting hinds may quench their thirst at the fountain of that dear Saviour who is the only love of our hearts. If anyone should desire to communicate daily, I beg the abbess to offer no opposition; let her not scruple to give permission as often as the confessor gives his consent. One Communion is at times worth more than a year of prayer. If anyone should remain imperfect, and should show no signs of wishing to amend, it would be well to deprive her of holy Communion.

Now I wish you to recommend me to Jesus and Mary with the greatest fervor every day, for that important matter,[16743] tending to the greater glory of God, of which I have already spoken to you, is about to be settled. As soon as it has been decided I shall let you know, for you have assisted me greatly by your prayers; but you must still continue to aid me. Offer up a holy Communion at least every week for the success of this project, in order that all may be done for the greater glory of God.

I never forget you; I recommend you to Jesus Christ very often during the day. Greet Monsignor for me (for I congratulate him also on the favor received), and your Father Confessor; ask him to pray for me. Live Jesus, Joseph, Mary, and Teresa! The feast of my dear St. Teresa is at hand; celebrate a novena or at least a triduum. Tell Sister Maria Francesca not to forget her agreement, as I do not forget it; please say the same to Sister Maria Agnes.

A miserable sinner and most tender Father.

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI.

Letter 4

TO TOMMASO FALCOIA, BISHOP OF CASTELLAMMARE, HIS SPIRITUAL DIRECTOR

He entreats Falcoia to give him permission to leave Naples in order that he may found the Institute of the Most Holy Saviour at Scala.

[October, 1732.]

My dear Father, for charity's sake, make haste, for I am dying with the desire to set out; send for me immediately, withdraw the command that binds me to Naples. Don Giovanni Battista[16744] [di Donato] is also energetic and zealous. See what obstacles the devil is throwing up to prevent the speedy beginning of our work! Let us begin immediately, for they amount to nothing; all will succeed admirably. This is the second last day of the spiritual exercises, and I am to speak on our Mamma Mary. Pray for me constantly, yes, constantly; again, make haste, make haste, for the glory and praise of Jesus and Mary.[16745]

Quoted by Tannoia, "Life of St. Alphonsus," Book i. Chapter xx.

Letter 5

TO THE SAME

He relates to him his troubles, and conjures him not to abandon him.

[At the beginning of March, 1733.]

. . . . . Canon Torni has written to me that the Congregation has decided to take from me the chaplaincy, and to deprive me of membership;[16746] but the Cardinal has ordained that nothing should be done in this matter without his command.[16747] I have written to his Eminence expressing to him my thanks, and also to the Canon; the latter tells me that he could not do anything more in my behalf. . . . . .

O my Father! how painful it is for me to associate with D. Vincenzo [Mannarini].[16748] I have experienced this these past days, and it is only the love of Jesus Christ that can render such a situation possible. . . . . .

I thank God for the strength that he gives me to endure these storms (and what is worse my domestic storms), so that I may resist and may not lose courage. This is what I have gained for myself after having, as everyone knows, renounced so much, incurring thereby the displeasure of my family, of my friends, and of the archbishop, upon whom I have turned my back to please God. Still you encourage me to put my confidence in God, even though all my companions should desert me. Ah, my Father, do not abandon me! for without you what could I do? Command, and I will obey. . . . . .

I send you a plan of the Rules, which we have agreed upon. Have pity on me. . . . . .

Quoted by Tannoia, Book ii. Chapters iii. and iv.

Letter 6

TO SISTER MARIA CELESTE CROSTAROSA,[16749] NUN OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY SAVIOUR AT SCALA

Sorrow which he feels at seeing her so deficient in humility. He excuses himself for having reprimanded her rather harshly.

[The month of March, 1733.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Celeste, I am answering your last letter, which I received at the same time as that of Mgr. Falcoia, and I tell you that if you are right I am not wrong; for I have not been able to banish from my mind the message of Don Vincenzo [Mannarini], and what was said by Don Silvestro [Tosquez]. When they arrive you may ask them. Still I believe that the Lord has permitted all this to happen for our greater good; judging from what Monsignor writes to me and from what I hear of Don Silvestro, affairs are now in the very best condition. The latter continues to remain on intimate terms as formerly. There is, however, one thorn that pierces my heart and causes me great anguish: it deprives me too of my night's sleep, and it is, my dear Celeste, the thought of you. I see that during this trouble between us you have not uttered one sentiment breathing humility.

Especially in your last letter I noticed how you address me and how you sign yourself; I perceived, too, how little you care whether I believe you or not; now, do not tell me that you are praying to God for me, as if I were already a reprobate, and that you end your letter: I remain in the Heart of Jesus, My dear Celeste, could the most imperfect soul write in a different tone? I know that you bear me no ill-will; but judging from the altered style of your letter, it appears to me that you do retain some ill-feeling towards me. I do not say that I deserve to see you humble yourself before me; I confess that I am not worthy even to sit at your feet, for I know your life and I know my own. But I do not on this account despair of loving Jesus as you do; He will grant me this in his infinite mercy. What I wish to say is that I should like to see in a soul so united with God and so favored by him, as is your soul, the profoundest humility; for the greater our humility is, the more intimate is our union with God: the one is ever in proportion to the other. Humility, however, does not consist at all in saying: I am a wretch, I deserve much worse than this; no, it consists in having a low opinion of one's self, and in knowing how to humble one's self most before him who most despises us. I would have desired this humility for you, even though I should have had reason to ask for other things; but up to the present time I have not seen it in you, and this is the thorn that torments me. Understand now that this is the secret cause of my affliction and the reason why I could not approve of your conduct, as I wrote to the Mother Superior before receiving your letter.

It is true I may have written harshly, and perhaps too harshly, but I did so relying on past experience; for whenever, heretofore, I addressed you in that manner, it resulted in great profit for your soul. For it is always salutary for a soul favored by God to meet with humiliations; and the more you experience from me, the more nearly you approach that which Christ has marked out for you. You may rest assured I have done everything for a good purpose; I feel no remorse for what I have done, for I really believed that your naturally high spirit, relying on its own judgment, deserved to be treated in this manner for its own good, and to cause it to be submissive in all things. I do not speak here of your will (for, as I have already written to you, I have not condemned you on account of your will, but rather for having followed your own judgment). Besides, it appeared to me that I had hitherto effected nothing with kind words. Understand now that in matters that relate to the welfare of the Institute I can quickly rid myself of your intrigues by laying the whole matter before Falcoia; however, I have not done so, as it appears to me to be a species of treachery to reveal the situation to Falcoia, when I myself, though troubled and disgusted, can apply the remedy by writing to you. You cannot imagine what great pain it causes me to treat any one harshly, especially as I believe that more may be done by gentleness than by harshness.

If, perchance, through want of reflection and through indiscreet zeal, I have gone beyond the bounds of moderation, and you consequently feel yourself offended, I beg your pardon now and always, and beseech you to pardon me expressly. If I were allowed, I would kiss your feet a thousand times for having so treated a beloved spouse of Jesus Christ; if Mgr. Falcoia gives me permission, I will beg your pardon publicly, before all. But still I want to see you as humble as I wish you to be.

And is my soul, then, of so much importance to you?[16750] Ah, my dear Celeste, do not speak in that strain to me, for it sounds like great ingratitude: the union of our souls in Jesus Christ is too intimate for that. Do you not know that the interests of your soul have become mine? And this is not my work, but God's work; I must desire the same perfection for you that I wish to obtain for myself.

I am seeking for reasons to excuse you, and to calm my alarm at seeing your want of humility, and I am trying to flatter myself that you have not considered this matter sufficiently. Perhaps you have a very good end in view in treating me thus; but the thorn still continues to torment me. If during this time you have had a good end in view, I beg you to let me know it as quickly as possible, and thus to allay my fears.

On my part, I promise to make a special memento for you every day at Mass until I become calm; I began this morning, and I prayed very hard to our Lord that he might grant you perfect humility. And you must ask the same for me from Jesus Christ, that I may no longer resist the allurements of God, who wishes to have me entirely his. I have resisted only too often in the past; that time is gone; I wish with all my heart to give myself entirely, yes entirely, to Jesus Christ, and I desire the same for you; but without humility neither you nor I shall attain anything. Henceforward, study to mortify me in every possible way, and this you should do the more readily in order not to allow me to suspect that you are disgusted. Don Silvestro Tosquez is coming; I hope that all will redound to the glory of God. I do not call you daughter that you may not think I am arrogating to myself what is not mine.

Praised be Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

My dear Celeste, it is not true that I said that Don Silvestro is deceived; I do not remember ever having spoken those words.

Letter 7

TO THE SAME SISTER

He explains the conditions under which the new Institute can prosper; he reproves her for withdrawing from the spiritual guidance of Mgr. Falcoia, and points out the dangers that threaten her on this account.

[End of March, 1733.]

Praised be Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Celeste, my beloved Sister in Jesus Christ and our Mother Mary, I had asked you not to answer me; but since you have thought fit to honor me with an answer, I beg you to read this letter and then follow the inspiration of God. But read it with resignation, without seeking for a reply to what you read; for if you read with an inclination to contradict, you will find an abundance of reasons for replying, but you will never discover the truth. Heretics have found reasons for opposing the Church, even against holy Scripture. Read then, I pray you, this letter, and spend three days in prayer entirely resigned and with the most perfect indifference, without writing to me or without so much as noting down anything for an answer; then do as you please.

And now, since you require fidelity from me, I ask the same of you; I do not allow you to show this letter of mine or to mention its contents to any one—neither to Don Silvestro nor to others. You already believe that I know all; and so if you really desire not to be defended and praised before men, but to please God by investigating the truth in order to embrace it, allow me, my dear Sister Celeste, to speak frankly and to place the truth before you. I seek nothing but the glory of God and the welfare of your soul, which I so ardently desire. Let us separate the interests of your soul from those of the Institute.

And now let us speak of the affairs of your soul. Tell me, Celeste, why have you left Mgr. Falcoia, who is so saintly and so enlightened, as you yourself have often told me? You know that God himself has given him to you as your director; he has guided you so admirably for many years, that, prostrate on the ground, you ought unceasingly to return thanks to God and to him. What defect have you now perceived in him? Has he perhaps cast you into an abyss? Have you left him because he disturbed you by humbling and thwarting you? But, my dear Sister, do you not see that this course is absolutely necessary to conquer your high spirit, and to prevent you from becoming attached to your own judgment? This is a fault that was perceived in you not only by Mgr. Falcoia, but also by Don Bartolomeo Carace,[16751] and by others who were acquainted with you. It is a fault, of which St. Philip Neri has said that there can be nothing more dangerous in the spiritual life; and St. John Chrysostom assures us that there is more danger for a saint in following such a course than for any other person. Another saint tells us that he who confides in himself has no need of demons to tempt him. Who has approved of the step you have taken in leaving Falcoia? Have you perhaps received lights from God? Are the effects, that joyous calmness, etc., sufficient signs of the correctness of your step? And who has approved of these lights and of this sense of security and peace? Is it that penitent who for eight years labored under a delusion which, judged by its good effects, seemed to her confessor to be from God, and which was afterwards discovered by Father Collelis, as we read in his life, to be nothing else but a delusion?

The most experienced and cautious masters of the spiritual life can be deceived on this point, and you wish to have certainty in the matter by taking counsel with yourself? But has perhaps Don Silvestro [Tosquez] given his approbation? If you suspect Falcoia because he has humbled you, you have greater reason to mistrust the judgment of Don Silvestro, who, as you know, places you above St. Teresa, and sings your praises everywhere, even at Vienna.[16752] He approves of everything, even of his entire dependence on you—a thing, which above all others, a spiritual director should guard against, if he wishes to guide a soul properly and to keep it humble.

O my dear Celeste! how Don Silvestro has caused you to lose the spirit of humility! how he has aided you in wedding yourself, so to speak, to your own judgment! See to what lengths you have gone, asserting openly in your convent that one is not obliged to obey a command of the Superior given sub mortali—under pain of mortal sin! My Celeste, what Doctor ever taught such nonsense—that it is not a mortal sin for one who has made the vow of obedience to disobey the command of a Superior in a grave matter? By a grave matter we are to understand either a great evil or something that may have evil consequences; we must always suppose this, for the Superior before giving a command examines the matter carefully. It savors too much of arrogance when a woman who has made no studies wishes to contradict in this matter those whom the Church has placed over us as teachers.

Ah! where is that Celeste whom I knew of old? How has this ruin been effected? Oh! I feel the pangs of death whenever I think of this. Who has so fascinated you? Where is that former prompt and edifying obedience to Superiors? Where is that beautiful spirit of humility which caused you to desire to be trodden under foot and despised by all?

Now, however, having abandoned, as it were, the practice of obedience, you are endeavoring to gain the esteem and approval of all, under the vain pretence of seeking the glory of God. God stands in no need of your self-defence to promote his glory. When he sees you truly humble, and the more he sees you humbled, the more readily will he undertake to defend you and your work. You already understand what I mean.

Let me tell you that Don Silvestro, whose fine teaching on obedience perhaps it is which you have followed, in matters of doctrine is wrong-headed, and very much so. I have heard him say that on the fasting days of the Church people are not allowed to eat until about three o'clock, and that the customary collation in the evening cannot be taken—thus presuming to condemn so many religious Orders and so many saintly men who practised the contrary. He has given utterance to other false doctrines in points of Moral Theology which I shall not mention here. It is sufficient to know that he had the boldness to assert, as you perhaps have already heard, that all who were under the spiritual direction of Falcoia were damned. Hence it is certain that the vision that induced you to leave Falcoia was a delusion, and if you consulted a thousand unbiassed theologians they would all tell you the very same thing, although it should have sufficed for you when Falcoia, who was at that time your spiritual director, pronounced it to be such. Tell me, Celeste, was it possible that your vision could be an illusion? At least you ought to have a reasonable doubt about it when a St. Teresa, in the account that she gives us of her visions, writes of herself that she never believed so firmly that it was God who had spoken that she could have sworn to it, even though it were asserted by others. And for this reason, as she says in the same place, she never did anything in consequence of light received in prayer, but always consulted her confessors; if at times they told her the contrary of that which she had heard from our Lord, she obeyed instantly and executed it.

She acted in this manner especially at the time of the foundation of a house at Malagone;[16753] for God had at first revealed to her that the monasteries were to be founded without revenues, but her confessor told her the contrary. She obeyed, and our Lord afterwards showed his approval of her obedience.

And now let us suppose a reasonable doubt which you have concerning the vision, and which you ought to have, if you wish to walk securely: in whose judgment should you place more reliance than in that of your spiritual director, unless you really wish to disregard that beautiful order of obedience which Jesus Christ has left in his Church to make known to us his holy will? You reveal the vision to your director; he tells you it is a delusion, and you do the contrary! Tell me, would St. Teresa have acted in that manner? And you do a very great wrong to Father Falcoia, who was at one time so dear to you, if you say that this saintly man, through partiality, advised you to act against the will of God, and thus betrayed his conscience. When it is not clear and evident that our spiritual director speaks through passion, we must obey him. Falcoia is partial, and Don Silvestro is not so? Celeste, give this great pleasure to God—leave Don Silvestro. I know that you will have to do great violence to yourself, but the greater the violence, the greater will also be the stride towards perfection. Tell me, if God wishes you to leave Don Silvestro, are you willing to make the sacrifice? But God does not wish it, you say. Ah! my beloved Celeste in Jesus Christ, who does clearly not see that you are deluded, and what is by far worse, voluntarily so! I know not what excuse you will have for Jesus Christ on the day of judgment, after hearing the truth from so many persons. To this you will perhaps reply: That is my affair. Well, then, let us pass to the other point—the affairs of the Institute.

It is certain that the rules[16754] noted down by you need a thousand and one explanations. Do you not yourself remember telling me when I first went to the convent that Falcoia acted wisely in sifting the divine elements from the human, as there were many things in the rules which owed their origin to self-will? You moreover agreed to this with regard to the Institute for men, when before the opening of the foundation I went to Scala to call upon you; we canvassed the matter and came to an agreement. Besides the numerous explanations of the rules, there are many other points and constitutions which are to be treated separately, as, for example, the schools,[16755] the missions, the houses of studies, the different exercises to be given by us, the occupations which are permitted or prohibited, the academies, the meetings, etc. The missions and schools alone require two separate little books to establish the order which is henceforward to be followed, so that the same observance may ever flourish in the Congregation.

Now, who is to give these explanations and constitutions? Don Vincenzo [Mannarini] and I have no practical experience of Community life; I am moreover an ignoramus, Don Silvestro [Tosquez] is less practical than we. Don Giovanni Battista[16756] [di Donato] still retains an affection for his old Rule; hence, as you know, he is resolutely opposed to the recitation of Office in choir—a point which is so essential. In short, he would like to introduce among us his old Rule. Furthermore, if we should leave Falcoia in order to agree among ourselves upon the rules, Don Silvestro would most certainly wish to play the role of director and of infallible interpreter of your revelations, not only of the past, but also of your future visions. He has been accustomed hitherto to play the teacher and not the disciple, and woe to the man who should dare to contradict him in this matter, as experience has shown me that he wishes to rule in everything. And if, scarcely having entered the monastery, he undertook as a secular the guidance of several Sisters who now, according to their own confession, behold themselves emerging from a pit after leaving his spiritual direction; if, I say, having but entered, he wished that permission should be obtained from him when a letter was to be written to Falcoia—what breach would he not effect between us, if we should forsake Falcoia? What happened to those Sisters, my dear Celeste, ought to be a lesson for you. I already believe that it would be your aim after we should have left Falcoia to induce us all to follow Don Silvestro blindly as an oracle, and to depend on him entirely, as you do. If it were God's will I would do so, but at present I do not feel that inspiration. Let us return to the conversation about ourselves.

The only way to establish anything on a solid basis is to place ourselves entirely in the hands of one man, and having communicated to him our ideas, to follow blindly his counsels and directions. He must be a man of experience, with a practical knowledge of Community life, missions, and other spiritual exercises; he must be well versed in the sciences necessary for a missionary, a man of enlightened spirit, and finally, one who will solve all doubts and questions without appeal. In this manner charity and unity will be the better preserved among us, for they are, as you yourself say, and as I have so often repeated, in fact ad nauseam, necessary for us to guide our little bark aright. And tell me, what Rule of religious Order or Congregation was not established in this way, that is, by depending entirely on one director? I had at first a doubt whether this was the case in the Reform of St. Teresa, when doubts arose concerning the Rule of St. Albert which had been adopted by the saint. Afterwards, however, I discovered that although the first companions of St. Teresa were holy men, experienced in Community life, the Reform was on the verge of destruction because they did not follow one director; so great a diversity of observances was introduced in consequence of this that the saint feared that the Reform would suffer shipwreck. At last, Father Graziano having visited the houses of the Reform, and having found a different observance in each one, drew up the constitutions himself, as we find them to-day in the chronicles; these constitutions were then adopted by all.

Thus, I say, to establish the Rule and Institute firmly, it is necessary for us to place ourselves entirely in the hands of one experienced guide, as well because we ourselves are not fit, as because this way is easy and safe—one which is followed by all religious Orders. Again, such a course will serve to maintain unity among us. Otherwise there will never be that perfect harmony among us; for, on the one hand, we should have unceasingly to discuss our mutual pretensions, and on the other hand, the formation of the rules would go on indefinitely, amid continual jarring and wrangling.

But, you say, to obviate all this, one should yield to the other. My dear Celeste, this is impossible. It would be possible and all very well, if there were question here of honors, of comforts, in short, of indifferent things; but when there is question of matters pertaining to the glory of God, no one, unless bound by obedience and by the promise to abide by the decisions of one director, is ready to yield in points which he believes to be for the greater glory of God. And this experience itself would teach you, as it has taught me up to the present moment, for we have not been able to agree even in unimportant things. Hence, we must always—yes, always—have one to whom we can refer our doubts for solution; every man who has the use of his reason and who is not crack-brained will recognize the truth of this. Why, your Don Vincenzo only lately told me the very same thing himself.

You will say: Place yourself at the disposal of your present Superior.[16757] I venerate Father Superior, and know that I have to obey him in the rules already established; but I never have had the intention to follow any rules which Don Giovanni Battista might make. I will obey only in that which Mgr. Falcoia ordains, for he is my director and the director of the whole work. My Sister, let me tell you once for all that I have not entered the Institute to become its head and director, or to take precedence in anything, as you seem to insinuate, or to please men. You yourself can remember that when Falcoia begged me to use my influence with Guerriero[16758] to obtain the approbation of your rules, I told him plainly and frankly that he would have to excuse me, as it was against the obedience which was due to my director at that time. I tell you that I have come here solely to obey God, and I hope never to leave, no matter how great the solicitations and importunities of men may be. I have just been implored to return to Naples. I beg you to understand that in so acting I am not following your revelations, as I told you in the very beginning. I am travelling only the well-beaten and secure road of obedience to my spiritual guides, where, as Jesus Christ has promised us, we are sure to ascertain the will of God, and this, as the masters of the spiritual life tell us, he has not attached to all the revelations in the world. St. Teresa in particular says in chapter 10 of the Foundations, that we ought in this life to place ourselves unreservedly in the hands of a guide, be he Superior or Confessor, relying entirely on the truth of these words: Qui vos audit, me audit—he who hears you, hears me. For, as she adds, our Lord esteems this submission so highly that although what is commanded appears to be utterly absurd, by overcoming ourselves and obeying our Superiors we succeed in fulfilling the will of God most perfectly.

Now you know that I have surrendered myself entirely into the hands of Falcoia, and so I hope to live and die under the yoke of obedience. If you choose to follow another route, good-bye till we meet again, at the place for which you are striving. If I follow the beck of obedience, I shall certainly sanctify myself; but as you have left your guide, I do not know whether you will become a saint. I tell you that I have no intention of deserting Falcoia, even though all—if such a thing were possible—should place themselves entirely in my hands. Do you not see that it is far better to give up one's vocation, than to give up the practice of obedience—that is, if a true vocation could exist without obedience. To conclude, I am content to leave the Institute and to practise obedience rather than remain in the Institute and give up obedience. I am aware that St. Philip Neri thought more of a soul that walked the ordinary way of obedience than of another who, following its own will, did great things for the glory of God. Let me also tell you that when doubts caused by what I now know of you arise in my mind whether your former lights were not also delusions (for it is certain that all the lights and visions confirming you in your obstinacy, which you say you enjoy, are illusions, as Falcoia wrote you, and as everyone can see), I encourage myself with the thought that in this matter I am not following your revelations, but I am practising obedience to my spiritual director. And thus, even if all your visions were delusions, I am walking securely in holy obedience, and I cannot take a wrong step in my vocation.

But to return to ourselves. Let us suppose, then, that a man must be selected to settle all doubts and present difficulties. Don Vincenzo says that we should choose someone else, not Falcoia! But, I ask, why must we choose some other person and not Falcoia, unless we wish to make the choice under the influence of passion? As for Falcoia, we have received only too many signs from God, showing that he is the man destined to regulate the work. The fact that he was your confessor would be sufficient of itself to show this; for as your confessor, it was his duty, and no one else's, to explain and approve of your lights and visions, just as the confessor of St. Teresa who guided her in the matter of the revelation with regard to the Reform, directed the whole work of the Reform. Besides, we have the testimony of Sister Maria Colomba[16759] who wrote to me in the beginning (I have just re-read her letter): "I understood that the divine Majesty wishes to have you as head of the Institute, dependent, however, on his beloved son, Tommaso [Falcoia]; for the divine Majesty has chosen him as the principal head to regulate this great work." Colomba, then, wrote to me that she had heard this from our Lord on several occasions. But then Colomba may be under a delusion? And Celeste, I maintain, can be in the same state. To tell the truth, I look upon you both as saints; but as there is question here of delusions under which our Lord at times permits holy souls to labor, as we know from the life of Sister Maria Serafina of Capri and of others, why should I believe Colomba, and not you, to be deluded, especially when I behold her travelling the safe road of obedience, presenting in this respect so great a contrast to you? You yourself wrote to me several times that we must depend on Falcoia in this work. In a letter which, if you wish I shall send to you,—for our Lord, not without good reason, inspired me to preserve it,—you express yourself in the following terms: "Give yourself no more trouble; leave everything to the judgment of our Father whom God has placed over the work, and on whom all should depend." What follows is only a confirmation of the above-quoted passage. Now you will say, I have received contrary directions. And who, pray, approves of these blessed lights? Have I perhaps to believe what you tell me now, and not what you have told me in the past? Lastly, you must remember, my dear Celeste, that Falcoia, as far as the Institute is concerned, has not followed exclusively your revelations, but has consulted the lights and revelations of others, and in the first place those which he himself received from God, before he made your acquaintance. For this reason he has for many years been endeavoring to establish an Institute of this kind, both at Naples and at Rome, following above all the light of the Gospel, which is worth more than your combined lights—yours and Falcoia's.

But setting aside those supernatural elements, we should adopt the course I propose, since we see at least that it is the shortest and safest way to establish the rules and to preserve union and harmony; now if this be the case, why not select Falcoia? Before Don Silvestro appeared upon the scene, we had in fact already chosen Falcoia: for his name was ever in our mouths; to him we always had recourse in our difficulties; he is a man of many years' experience, of an enlightened spirit, learned, with a practical knowledge of Community life, of missions, and finally of secular matters; in short, it would be difficult to find many who possess in so high a degree as he all those qualities that are necessary for the regulation of this great work. Or is there perhaps an express revelation that God wishes us to depend upon any one but Falcoia?

Ah! my God, what a terrible hallucination you have been laboring under, Celeste! This happens when an enlightened soul through some fault of her own falls into a delusion; this I make bold to say of you, and I add that a miracle on the part of God is necessary to open your eyes to the light. See how disunited we are, and know that you are the cause of this disunion. Celeste,—I am speaking to you in the name of God,—consider well that you by your obstinacy are devoting to destruction a work that is not yours, but God's. True it is that neither you nor all the men in the world can ruin the work of God if he wills to prevent it; I am inclined to think that if you remain stiff-necked, our Lord will aid us only the more, for when there shall be no longer any talk about lights and revelations, we shall the more easily obtain the approbation of Rome. But as for you, if you appear before Jesus Christ burdened with the charge of having tried to ruin his work, what will become of your poor soul? If I be excluded from the Institute, as you keep repeating, I confess that I deserve to be excluded and am content, provided I am allowed to practise obedience; but I beg you at the same time to understand that neither you nor Don Silvestro can expel me from the Institute: that is God's affair, and he needs neither you nor Don Silvestro. I regard myself unmistakably called to the Institute, for obedience has told me so.

As for you, Celeste, I see you on the brink of an awful precipice, and I shall bitterly regret your loss if you do not turn back. I behold you living without practising obedience to Falcoia whom you are obliged to obey, at least as spiritual director of your Community. It may already be said that you have lost the sense of obedience to your true Superiors and have lost your peace of soul. See that you do not suffer the shipwreck of your soul, for you are on the way. I have had novenas said for you in several places; but I see you are too hard-hearted. I fear that God is already abandoning you.

My dear Sister, I have spoken to you for the glory of God and for the welfare of your soul; do not become angry. It will do no good now to trouble yourself to write to me. I know well that that brain of yours will be able to find replies and counter-replies, but what I do not know is that these will be of any service to you when you stand before the tribunal of Jesus Christ, especially as I see that you are growing only more obstinate in your opinions, and are bent entirely on finding answers, and not on sanctifying yourself.

My dear Celeste, do listen to me: humble yourself; the Lord will certainly enlighten you if you humble yourself; obey your Superiors, and you will fall into no error: Falcoia is holy and meek; do not for a moment imagine that he wishes you ill. If you humble yourself before him, you will be dearer to him than at first; be resigned to the will of God, and pray; otherwise your prayer will be of no service to you, all your reasons will be passions, and your revelations will be imagination and delusion. If you do not care to listen to me and Falcoia, consult other unprejudiced men. Seek other assistance; do not walk blindly on the road of perdition; seek the advice of others, not to find matter for reply, but to discover and embrace the truth with your whole heart.

Believe me, dear Celeste, all that I have written, I have written because I love you in Jesus Christ; if you wish me evil you do me a great wrong. May Jesus and Mary induce you to do the will of God!

My letter is finished; but I feel myself necessitated to say a few more words. My dear Celeste, pardon me if I conclude by speaking too frankly. Do you not recognize the fact that you are attached to Don Silvestro, and that he returns this feeling? You say: It is an affection in God, because I seek nothing but God. I do not say that you are sinning thereby; but, am I not right in saying that there is a great deal of this earth in such an affection? You do not seek God alone in Don Silvestro, but look also for something else, which is not God. You are in the mire; take care lest by following Don Silvestro you voluntarily place yourself in danger of losing God. Again you say: I rely on God. No. I tell you, Celeste, you do not place your reliance on God in this matter; for God does not assist, nay, he abandons those who of their own free will expose themselves to danger. To sum up: So much is certain, if you follow Falcoia, you will surely become a saint; if you follow Don Silvestro, you will certainly not sanctify yourself, and only God knows whether you will be saved.

Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 8

TO THE NUNS OF THE MONASTERY OF POCARA.[16760]

The saint informs them of his intended visit.

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

My dear daughters, I remember that in the letter I sent you yesterday I told you I would come Thursday a week; but this is a mistake, because the letter was written before yesterday. I will come on Thursday of this week, and will preach on the same day. Praised be Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

When I arrive, do not force me to listen to useless complaints; let me find you entirely divested of yourselves, so that you no longer have anything of your own.

Letter 9

TO THE PRIEST GIUSEPPE CERCHIA AT CASTELLAMMARE.[16761]

He exhorts him to leave the world, and to give himself entirely to God.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SCALA, July 3, 1733.

See, now, to what a fine conclusion you have come: Spiritus promptus est, caro autem infirma! [The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak.—Matt. xxvi. 41.] This is the way in which you correspond to the graces received from our good Mother Mary! Such is the generous resolution that you have formed of giving yourself entirely to God! Spiritus promptus est, caro autem infirma!

I beg you, for pity's sake, come quickly, quickly, quickly. Why speak of your family, of your mother, of your brothers, of your relatives! Audi, filia. . . . obliviscere populum tuum, et concupiscet te Rex. [Hearken, O daughter. . . . forget thy people and thy father's house, and the King shall greatly desire thy beauty.—Ps. xliv. 11, 12.] He that does not leave all for God, will not find God entirely. Make haste! there are many missions to be given, and we wish to have you with us. Your mother is well now; come then to Scala without delay; fix your own time for your departure, and profit by the convenience that I now offer you, for I do not wish to expose you to the unpleasantness of another journey. Come speedily, speedily! Let the desire that we cherish of seeing you, urge you to come without delay; and be convinced that you can work here even better than at Castellammare. Si quis. . . . non odit patrem suum, et matrem. . . . non potest meus esse discipulus. [If any man. . . . hate not his father, and mother. . . . he cannot be my disciple. —Luke, xv. 26.]

Pray to our Mother Mary for me. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 10

TO THE SAME

He continues the same exhortation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SCALA, July 13, 1733.

At the beginning of next month we shall begin a mission at Agerola; but we expect to see you at Scala before we set out for the mission. You have resolved not only to assist us in our missions as an auxiliary priest, but also to give yourself entirely to Jesus Christ by sacrificing to him your family, your relatives, and your country. If you do not do this, you will never arrive at sanctity;—never, never! Si quis. . . . non odit patrem suum, et matrem. . . . non potest meus esse discipulus. [If any man. . . . hate not his father, and mother. . . . he cannot be my disciple.—Luke, xv. 26.] Up to the present, you acted the brave man; all was for God; and now, what is the matter with you?

Come, now! set out at once; you see that the Lord has consoled you by restoring health to your mother; come quickly; obtain an exeat from the bishop, and come. We do not wish that you bring with you any baggage or money; food and clothing will not be wanting. There is no question among us of family, of relatives, of strangers: we think only of loving God, and of doing perfectly his holy will. Come without delay; I shall take no excuse. God does not wish you to be a curate in a parish; he wishes you to be in the Institute of the Most Holy Saviour.

Make haste! for you should prepare yourself little by little for the exercises of the missions, in order that disengaged from all care you may be able to give yourself entirely to the service of God and of souls. The souls that belong to God are not only those of Castellammare; those of other places have also been purchased by the blood of Jesus Christ, and have perhaps more need of succor. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Quickly, quickly, quickly! I wish no answer; you must answer this letter by coming yourself.

After the Roman edition.

Letter 11

TO THE SAME

He renews his request, briefly repeating to him the same reasons.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SCALA, July 21, 1733.

My dear Don Giuseppe: When will you come, when? You seem to wish that we should purchase dearly your arrival! Come at once; what are you waiting for? We wish to have you; Jesus Christ is calling for you; our Mother Mary is waiting for you: and you remain where you are and say: Spiritus promptus est, caro autem infirma! [The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.—Matt. xxvi. 41.] But I answer: Qui non odit matrem, fratrem, etc., non potest mens esse discipulus. [Who does not hate mother, brother, etc., cannot be my disciple.]

Please hurry; I wish that you should prepare for the instructions that are to be given during the next missions. Come and seek solitude; come to seek God: Audi filia. . . . . obliviscere populum tuum, et domum patris tui; et concupiscet Rex decorem tuum. [Hearken, O daughter. . . . forget thy people and thy father's house; and the King shall greatly desire thy beauty.—Ps. xliv. 11.] If you do not do so, you will never become a saint;—no; never! Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

After the Roman edition.

Letter 12

TO THE SAME

He assures him of his prayers and again invites him to proceed to Scala.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SCALA, August 11, 1733.

My dear Don Giuseppe: Send me some news about your health. I do not doubt that you will give me good news; for on hearing that you are not very well I recommended you earnestly to our Mother Mary. If you are not in bed, come without delay; you will become well at Scala. Our dear Don Gennaro[16762] has arrived, and at the end of August we shall set out for the missions. Come, therefore, in all haste, as soon as you think that you will be able to bear the journey. In the meantime, I shall not cease to recommend you and to have you recommended to our Mother Mary, and I hope that we shall be heard.

But I beg you to drive out of your head all that keeps you back, namely, your mother, your family, and your relatives. I ask this as a favor, for without it I really believe that you cannot sanctify yourself: Audi filia, et vide, et inclina aurem tuam; et obliviscere populum tuum, et domum patris tui; et concupiscet (what a beautiful word!) et concupiscet Rex decorem tuum. [Hearken, O daughter, and see, and incline thy ear, and forget thy people and thy father's house; and the King shall greatly desire thy beauty.—Ps. xliv. 11.] Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 13

TO THE SAME

He refutes one of his objections.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SCALA, August 18, 1733.

I very well see, my dear Giuseppe, that you feel a repugnance to be one of our number, and that this repugnance is growing from day to day. Has anyone ever heard it said that a son must renounce a more perfect life in order to attend to his mother when she has with her in the same place, where she is living, several secular sons? But he should renounce it. Because his mother does not wish to live with them! If she does not wish to live with them, you are not obliged to give up the more perfect life to which God has called you, and in which you would serve him, divested of everything, etc. In short, I do not wish to say more, for I see that more words would undoubtedly be lost upon you through your fault. Perhaps the foundation at Caiazzo, which had already been decided upon, will not take place, but enough: we do not wish to force any one. At least speak to Don Gennaro Sarnelli to whom you have, it is true, given your word; but such promises are not binding. At all events, let us have you for the missions which will soon take place; we are expecting a definite answer, and when I receive it I will communicate it at once. As for your illness, I have had you recommended to our Mother Mary. Pray at least for us. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

You must also know that if you do not come, you will displease the bishop; however, do as you please.

Letter 14

TO THE SAME

He invites him to assist him at least in the missions as an auxiliary priest.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SCALA, August 30, 1733.

When one cannot do a certain thing, one cannot do it. Be it so; and I say, When one is not willing to do it, one is not willing.—But that is enough; I have no intention to annoy you anymore. We do not wish to see you among us if you do not come to remain with us with your whole heart; for we do not take people by force.

Give us the pleasure of accompanying us on the missions; as soon as I receive notice of the time they begin I shall let you know. Yet it may be that we shall not first go to Agerola, because sickness appears to continue there; we shall begin in other places. You would then have to come to Scala; but this, you will say, would not be a trifling thing for you to do, since Scala has become so odious to you that you would not wish even to pass through it!

This is enough; more words would be useless. I do not believe that you will take offence at our desire to have you as our confrère. During this novena pray to our dear Mother Mary for me a poor miserable being. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 15

TO THE PRIEST D. FRANCESCO DE VIVA

He exhorts him to detach himself from all human affection.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

VILLA, June 7, 1734.

My dear Ciccio: We see in an evident manner that Jesus Christ is blessing us, and that he wishes to make it known in us that it is of him that it is said: De stercore erigens pauperem. [Lifteth up the poor from the dunghill. I Kings, ii. 8.]

Continue to labor with Father Campanello for the "little crown of the Infant Jesus." Go in search of him, or write to him, otherwise you will not succeed.

As for your retreat at Santa Maria del Vignanello,[16763] my dear Ciccio, how can you doubt that I feel an extreme pleasure of having you as a neighbor, since I have been wishing to draw you still closer to me? I believed even that it was perhaps already a settled matter when I saw you so much inclined to a retired life, and so enamoured of the charms of virtue. But human respect, or rather my sins, have placed an obstacle thereto. How could I, after that, not esteem myself very happy to have you at least for my neighbor, and to enjoy, at least sometimes during the year, during the holy missions, the beautiful examples of virtue that you give? But listen to me, dear Ciccio: you will not be perfectly happy, and perhaps even you will with difficulty belong entirely to Jesus Christ if you do not really renounce Campanello, and tread under foot the world with all its considerations. Thomas à Kempis says: Dimitte omnia, et invenies omnia. [Put aside all things, and you will find all things.] But I must stop; I do not wish to carry my boldness farther in the case of one that can give me lessons both in science and in virtue.

Recommend me to Jesus and Mary, and recommend to them your affair specially during this month. Who knows what our dear Mother Mary will say to you? Live Jesus, Mary; Joseph, and Teresa!

Be so kind as to send to me four pictures of the Blessed Virgin of Caravaggio; send me also an answer. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 16

TO THE SAME

Great works should rest only on the spirit of faith and on confidence in God.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

VILLA, July 15, [1734].

You tell me that I should write to you often; here I am, but what must I tell you? You write to me that neither Campanello nor human considerations are keeping you from entering the Institute, but from what you say you seem to think it impossible for the work of the Institute to succeed. But I answer you in the words of Jesus Christ: Apud homines hoc impedimentum est, apud Deum omnia possibilia sunt. [With men this is impossible, with God all things are possible.—Matt. xix. 26.]

But what support have you? We have God. And which supernatural work of great importance has ever rested upon human support? Tell me what human support had the foundation of St. Francis, of St. John of the Cross, of St. Teresa?

You tell me that this priest[16764] has better human resources than we; hence for this reason we should have more confidence than he, since the more important the works are, the more Jesus Christ causes them to rise out of nothing and from the midst of contradictions, so as to make them admired and venerated by all as God's work, and not as the work of men. And what work was more destitute of human means than the preaching of the Gospel? Ah! my dear Don Ciccio, as long as you speak thus, it will be evident that you are not called to the Institute; because Jesus Christ wishes that there should be in our Institute men who are dead to their own will and their own judgment; men, moreover, who have put their confidence in God, and not in human means.

You tell me that you would wait and see, and then decide; but take care that lest before finishing the reflection life itself may not finish, because very likely in order to see the affairs of our Institute settled many years will be required. For the reform of the Carmelites, fifty years, if I mistake not, had to pass before everything was definitely settled.

O my God! if Jesus Christ should wish that the Institute is to cease with us, what injury would be done if in the meantime, as you see, we should give ourselves up less to prayer and to the salvation of souls, redeemed by Jesus Christ? And although the Institute should be dissolved before the end of our life, would this be ever a great disgrace to us, for having undertaken so holy a work the end of which is certainly very grand? And if ever we should earn thereby the contempt of men, shall we not likely gain the good pleasure of Jesus Christ, since we have been doing what contributes so much to his glory? But you must know, my dear Ciccio, that we shall understand these things better when all of us, we and those that discredit the Institute, shall be in eternity; then we shall see which was dearer to Jesus Christ: to have been a member of the Institute, or to have thrown discredit upon it. Remember that if we do not lose confidence, the Institute will surely not be dissolved. Only if we are wanting in confidence in God, and if we place our hopes in human aid, shall this work be destroyed. This we know by experience, because when we confided in human means the whole work was nearly destroyed.[16765] God is omnipotent, et Protector est omnium sperantium in se [and the Protector of all those that trust in Him—Ps. xvii. 31.] And I tell you the truth: my hopes for the Institute are supported by the great confidence that I notice in my companions, who astonish me when I see them advance, and as it were flying, towards perfection. I assure you, I feel ashamed to see myself among them.

Ah! my dear Don Ciccio, who could it have been that has done what has hitherto been done? I or God? And this God can also finish what he has begun.

If therefore Jesus Christ does not wish to afford me the consolation of having you as my Brother, I must have patience, for I do not deserve such a favor. Come soon to Santa Maria del Vignanello; we shall then be at least brethren on the missions. But, my dear Don Ciccio, when you speak of us be careful, because your words can do more harm to us than the words of others, and because we esteem you our friend; therefore your words have greater weight, and what you say will continually be repeated.

Continue to prepare with Father Campanello that little crown; but labor is necessary; the Infant Jesus will however reward you for it.

I wish to have the pictures of Santa Maria di Carrevaggio which you have promised me. I shall have prayers said for you by our little Community.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa! Leave word at the house of Rendina that their Gennaro[16766] is content, and that I love him as my own brother. Live Jesus and Mary! Your very humble servant,

TO FATHER TOMMASO PAGANO, PRIEST OF THE ORATORY AT NAPLES

A brief dissertation on the question, whether and when a priest is obliged to go to the country of the heathen, and to preach to them the teachings of the Gospel.[16767]

[July, 1734.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Don Mattheo Ripa[16768] said at Naples that before reaching the Indies we come to the Cape of Good Hope where there are many idolatrous people, and where no one goes to teach the faith. It is asked whether he that knows this state of things is obliged to go there.

The question is reduced to the general question, whether in the spiritual necessities of our neighbor we are obliged to help him at grave inconvenience to ourselves.

It is the common opinion according to the theologians of Salamanca that in regard to the necessities of individuals, we are obliged to help them at the risk of our property, reputation, and life, only in an extreme necessity, in respect to which extreme necessity two things are required, namely: 1. Ut proximus sine tuo auxilio damnandus sit [that your neighbor would be damned if you do not help him]; 2. Ut non habeat a quo sublevetur [that there is no one to help him]. The theologians of Salamanca therefore say that non debes navigare ad Indos convertendos, cum sint qui subvenire possunt, et alias est incertum illos esse per to convertendos [you need not travel to the Indies to convert the inhabitants when there are those that can assist them, and it is otherwise uncertain whether they would be converted by you.] Tamburini says that when there is any uncertainty chiefly about success we are excused from going among the heathen.

The theologians of Salamanca say that it is the common opinion that in reference to the necessities of any Community we are obliged to come to their assistance in a grave necessity even at our grave inconvenience. They say for example: That preachers are obliged at their grave peril to denounce public sins of scandal; or if during an incursion of enemies there is no administration of the sacraments, and without it the faith of the people is endangered, you are obliged to administer the sacraments at the peril of your life.

This doctrine being supposed, it is asked why the theologians of Salamanca put the case of travelling to the Indies among the necessities of individuals, and not among the necessities of Communities, since there is question of entire kingdoms of idolaters; and Bonacina and Viva when speaking of the heathen speak of a case of extreme necessity. Hence it appears that to prove the obligation of which we speak, it is sufficient to establish here a grave, not an extreme necessity.

That these countries are in a grave necessity as regards their spiritual condition appears to be certain, since few missionaries go there. It is true, the theologians of Salamanca say that there is then this obligation of going there when aliter subveniri non potest [when otherwise they could receive no assistance]; and Laymann says of this obligation quando populus infidelis sit Omni sacerdote destitutus [when the unbelieving people are without a priest]. Of these people it could be said that they are altogether deprived of the services of a priest, et aliter subveniri non potest [and cannot be otherwise assisted].

However, speaking of the above-mentioned case of the Cape of Good Hope, it might be said that at least at present there is someone to go to the assistance of its people if this has not been done in the past, or at least some one will be able to do so in future; particularly since bishops are appointed for such places, and they are obliged to provide for them, etc. Thus at least aliter subveniri potest [they can be helped otherwise]; hence, individuals are excused from going there. Or if any one of these Communities is altogether destitute of help, it must be supposed that the many missionaries sent to these forsaken places have abandoned them, because there was no hope of being of any benefit to its inhabitants. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

TO SISTER MARIA GIOVANNA DELLA CROCE IN THE MONASTERY AT CAMIGLIANO.[16769]

He writes out for her a rule of life, and exhorts her to give herself up entirely to God.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

VILLA, August 26, [1734.]

Beloved Sister and daughter in Jesus Christ, let us praise together the goodness of Jesus, since he has vouchsafed to give you through my letter a greater desire to love him.

As for mortifications, you may use the discipline four times a week, but not to blood, and wear twice the cilicium till dinner-time. Try to mortify yourself also in eating by abstaining from fruit three times a week, and from something more on Wednesdays and Fridays; on Saturdays only you may fast on bread and water. In the evening be careful to eat as little as possible, in order to be well disposed for your devotions in the night and in the morning.

As for prayer, I should wish that besides the hour during which it is made in common, you would devote another hour in private, at the most convenient time, especially during the night and during the hours of the greatest solitude when Jesus speaks to the souls whom he loves. In regard to silence, I wish that it be strictly observed: except during the time of recreation, that is to say, after dinner and after supper, do not speak without necessity, and speak always in a low tone of voice; moreover, during the day, devote two hours to a stricter silence. We never find a soul given to prayer that speaks much. Whoever really loves Jesus should never wish to speak to any other than to Jesus, never to see nor to hear anyone else than Jesus.

Every week, choose a day of retreat for the purpose of spending it entirely in prayer, in spiritual reading, and in other exercises of piety.

Make every day a half hour's spiritual reading on the virtues; often read in St. John of the Cross that passage in which he speaks of the seven deadly sins, of pride, etc., which one may find at the beginning of the Obscure Night.

In the novenas you may increase the foregoing mortifications by using the discipline every day, etc.

If you follow these rules, you may receive holy Communion, if it is permitted to you, three or four times a week, and during the novenas every day.

Have great devotion to the Blessed Virgin, and every day in visiting her, place yourself entirely in her hands.

Make at least three visits every day to the Blessed Sacrament.

In prayer see to what you are most attracted, and meditate upon it; then employ the time in making acts of love to Jesus and Mary, and in asking them for graces. Outside of the time of prayer you must always be sighing for this divine Spouse, who loves you, and who only deserves all your love. If you fall into any sin, rise again with courage by making an act of love of Jesus Christ, and think no more of the sin except to confess it.

In case of illness, omit all the mortifications that may injure you.

This is all that I have to say to you for the present. Strengthen yourself in the resolution to give yourself entirely to God, since he wishes to give himself entirely to you.

The little girl is yet too much of a child to exact from her the spiritual life; you may, however, promote the glory of God by letting her advance in his holy love, but without too great a solicitude. If, nevertheless, she should be truly an obstacle to your spiritual good, endeavor to find out a means of getting rid of her; if not, Jesus Christ will assist you.

I beg you to recommend me to Jesus and Mary in all your prayers and Communions, and to make a novena to Mary to obtain for me certain graces that I desire.

Though I am so wretched, yet this morning I prayed to Jesus Christ for you in a special manner, in order that he may dispose you to give yourself entirely to him by renouncing for the love of him every consolation in this life and the next. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very humble servant

Letter 19

TO THE SAME

He exhorts her to fervor, and tells her what she is to do on his visit to Camigliano.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

VILLA, September 19, [1734.]

I write in haste, because the porter is in a hurry to depart. I received your letter at Caiazzo, where I was engaged in giving a retreat to the religious. I learn with what fervor you have resumed the service of Jesus Christ, your Spouse; henceforth pray to him unceasingly to obtain perseverance, and fear that you may relapse into tepidity which would perhaps be succeeded by a great chastisement on the part of our Lord who, when he calls, wishes that we respond to his voice. Continue always to make your meditation as you are doing, and do not omit it, however great may be your coldness; be convinced that it is on meditation that your progress in virtue depends.

If you desire my presence, send me the evening before a conveyance with someone to accompany me, and I shall devote a day to your service. At the same time ask for me jurisdiction to hear confessions, and permission to address a few words to the Community, if it be desirable. Do not, however, speak to me about making a general confession; because for certain souls a general confession, after having been once made, is more hurtful than useful. This visit would be only for the purpose of giving the religious some advice, though I have already given it by letter, and I do not know what more important counsels I could communicate by word of mouth. If, therefore, you could spare me this journey, and defer it to another occasion when it would be more urgent, you would afford me great pleasure. However, if you send a conveyance, and obtain the needed permissions, I shall be at your service; but this must not be on a feast-day, nor on a Tuesday, nor a Thursday.

Recommend me always to Jesus and to Mary. It would be better to induce the bishop to have a mission; then we would give a regular retreat to the Community, and very much good would result therefrom. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 20

TO MONSIGNOR PIETRO AGOSTINO SCORZA,[16770] ARCHBISHOP OF AMALFI

The saint asks him to fix the time for the spiritual exercises to be given to the clergy of Amalfi, and points out the difficulties that have arisen in regard to making a foundation at Positano.

[End of February, 1735.]

Most Reverend and Dear Sir: Remembering the orders that your Grace gave me in regard to the exercises to be given to the clergy of Amalfi, I beg you to inform me of the time that will best suit you. Rest assured that I will do all I can to oblige you; and I feel myself under the greatest obligation to you for all the kindness and affection that your Grace has shown to poor me.

I should be pleased to have the exercises given during Passion week, beginning on the preceding Saturday, and ending on the Saturday before Palm Sunday, because after Easter I should like to go at once to Caiazzo on account of business connected with the Institute.

I say this, because your Grace already knows of the demands made by the gentlemen of Positano;[16771] they wish that we should take charge of the school; this demand I have regarded as surprising, since from the beginning I have repeated to them many times that I cannot agree to such a proposal. . . . how annoying! Having inconvenienced your Grace and me (God knows in what straits I was in my endeavor to satisfy them) they have brought forward the above-mentioned demand . . . I imagine that up to the present time they were not bold enough to speak to me directly about this matter, knowing what has passed, but I have knowledge of it from another source.

TO MGR. CONSTANTINO VIGILANTE, BISHOP OF CAIAZZO

Petition.

[June, 1735.]

Right Reverend Sir: Alphonsus de Liguori, Superior of the Congregation of the Most Holy Saviour of the Villa degli Schiavi has the honor of submitting the following fact:

Your Lordship enjoined upon the administrators of the Santissima Annunziata di Majorano, to furnish the Fathers of our Congregation with six ducats every year on account of the school which the Fathers of said Congregation maintain in said city. Now the time for paying the said six ducats having already matured, the said administrators do not intend to pay this debt; hence the said suppliant[16772] has recourse to your Lordship that satisfaction may be made to him. He wishes you to accept now the assurance of his very sincere thanks, etc.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

VILLA, December 31, [1735.]

I remember, my dear daughter, to have received two letters from you, and I know that I have answered the second. I even kept for some time this answer, for the reason that I had no one to whom I might entrust it; then I sent it to you, if I mistake not, through someone from Bellona.[16773]

I answer you now by way of Fondola,[16774] for to-morrow I shall return to Naples. Yes, certainly, I wish you to write to me, and when you do not receive any answer, offer this sacrifice to Jesus Christ.

Begin your retreat as soon as you can, and always tell me whether you persevere in prayer, for everything depends on that. I bless you in the name of Jesus and of Mary. Pray always for me in your prayers and Communions; on my part I will not forget you. When you hear that I am no longer at Villa, continue nevertheless to address your letters to me at the same place, for thence I shall receive them, and thence you will also receive my answers. You must, however, have the patience to wait.

Gennaro [Sarnelli], and both of you may go together, arranging this with the coachman who will call for you. From this place your Reverence may travel to Villa, and thence to Dragone; for which place I have also been asked for two Fathers. You may then travel together.

Letter 24

TO MARQUIS GIUSEPPE GIOACCHINO MONTALLEGRE

Abridgment of the Rule of the Institute of the Most Holy Saviour.

[Month of January 1736.]

Father Ludovico Fiorillo, a Dominican, wrote thus to the saint, January 16, 1736: "This evening, the 16th of the month, I called upon Signor Marchese Montallegre, and was happy to be able to speak to him in detail about the affairs of the new foundation. He promised to do all in his power to obtain the needed approbation. He moreover told me to procure for him an abridgment of the Rule which is observed, so that he may know what to say when he has an audience with the Pope. . . . Send me, therefore, an outline of the Rule."

In compliance with this request, the saint gave the following account:—It is already four years since a certain number of priests have been living together in Community at Scala; at the request of Monsignor Vigilante, Bishop of Caiazzo, they afterwards founded a house at Villa degli Schiavi, and finally they established one at Ciorani, in the diocese of Salerno. They have been giving satisfaction as much to the bishops and people of those places, as to those who have been coming from the neighborhood where a notable reformation has been wrought in the morals of the inhabitants through the spiritual exercises that have been given.

The principal aim of these priests is to imitate as far as it is possible, with the help of divine grace, the life and the holy virtues of our Lord Jesus Christ, so as to procure spiritual profit for themselves, for the people of the kingdom, particularly of those destitute of help, and to be able to assist the bishops and relieve the spiritual wants of the dioceses.

They live in the above-mentioned houses a perfect Community life, subject to their own Superior, engaged in various labors for the people, some at the school, some in the confessional, others in giving instructions, in preaching to Confraternities, in oratories, and elsewhere.

In the dioceses where they are staying, they go about giving missions; and afterwards, in order to preserve the good that they do through the help of the divine Majesty, some of them return from time to time to hear confessions, to confirm the people in the resolutions that they have made, by instructions, sermons, spiritual directions, counsel, and so forth.

Within and without their own houses they endeavor with the divine grace to follow as closely as possible the footsteps of our divine Redeemer and Master Jesus Christ Crucified, so that they may serve as models to the people both by word and by example.

Moreover, in order to attain this object their Constitutions prescribe twelve virtues for them to practise; these are: Faith, hope, love of God, concord and charity among themselves, poverty, purity of heart, obedience, meekness and humility of heart, mortification, recollection, prayer, self-abnegation, and the love of the cross.

Every week each one makes a day of retreat in order that, while conversing only with the divine Majesty and devoting himself to the care of his own soul, he may draw thence more strength to labor in behalf of his neighbor.

Whenever they remain at home they spend the greater part of the day in silence, in recollection, in the choir, in the practice of mortification, in meditation, which they make three times a day, namely, in the morning at the first hour, during the day about the hour of Vespers, and in the evening after Compline; there are examinations of conscience before dinner and before going to bed. They, moreover, have domestic meetings during which they discuss the ecclesiastical sciences, the mode of advancing more and more in a solid, true, and positive imitation of the sublime virtues of the divine Majesty, the manner of more effectively laboring for the spiritual welfare of souls, especially of those that are mostly neglected, and that live in abandoned places.

The houses of the subjects are not numerous, and in regard to their maintenance they seek to be troublesome to no one, but they support themselves by that which they have brought from their own families, and which they place at the feet of the Superior, and by that which is voluntarily offered to them by the faithful for the love of Jesus Christ.

This is a brief sketch of the aim and purpose of the Institute of the Most Holy Saviour.

Exhortation to practise renunciation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI [1736.]

Your letter, my dear daughter, is the first that I have received from you for a long time, and I do not remember to have received any letter from you without having answered it.

My answer to-day will, however, be short, for you tell me in your letter that you are painfully continuing in the practice of prayer, and that you are always in desolation: two things that afford me great pleasure.

Continue then, and do not even ask our Lord for consolation; make even every day a special visit of renunciation, I wish to say a visit in which you should renounce for the love of him all consolations and all creatures. Continue also to pray to our Lord for me; ask him in particular to deprive me of my will, so that I may perfectly unite myself to his.

I have not forgotten you, and I will not forget you in compliance with, our agreement. Write to me.

I am at Sanseverino. We shall hardly see each other again in this life; but while doing the will of God, let us hope that we may see each other both as saints in heaven. I leave you with Jesus and Mary. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Have your letters taken to Signor Giovanni Oliviero at Naples, Porta di Capua and di San Onofrio. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 26

TO THE SAME

Different counsels of perfection.

Live Infant Jesus, and Mary Immaculate!

[VILLA, February 1736.]

Yesterday, my dear daughter, I received one of your letters, and I answer it this morning. The name of the bearer to whom I entrusted my letter is unknown to me; if then it was lost, you must have patience.

I am quite confused on hearing that our Lord uses my letters for the purpose of doing so much good to your soul. But I must tell you that I am at present going to the diocese of Salerno for a new foundation.[16775] Nevertheless I do not wish to omit rendering you all the services that are in my power. Always write to me, and send your letters here to Villa; care will be taken for them to reach me.

Try, in future, not to allow yourself to be cast down by the thought of your imperfections. The best, then, will be to trust more in God, and to abandon yourself lovingly to his paternal guidance. All our confidence, in fact, rests not on our works, but on the infinite goodness which never rejects those who sincerely seek it.

It would be injurious to your health to sleep in the cell of which you speak; if, however, you are able to have it repaired, I would allow you to ask to have it done as an alms. In the meantime, could you not go to the chapel after supper? I give you permission for an hour. And do not fear; he that loves Jesus, fears no one.

In regard to prayer, do not allow the distractions that come to trouble you. When you perceive them, recall your mind to God, but sweetly, without disquietude, and never reflect upon what you have done in prayer. Seek always to unite yourself to God by your will, but always by sweet and unrestrained acts. Read a little; then leave off, and content yourself with walking on this path of obscure faith; it is the sweet path for sanctifying yourself. Nor should you ever try to seek God with the senses; it is sufficient if you find him with pure love and with the will. In prayer, especially when you are in desolation, always recommend poor sinners without forgetting the souls in purgatory, especially those that have been most devoted to the Most Blessed Sacrament and to Mary.

You must not think for a moment that we shall see each other at Camigliano, because I set out to-morrow. Submit yourself on this point to the will of Jesus Christ. Besides, I do not see that my visit to you is necessary. It would undoubtedly cause you sensible consolation; but you should always sacrifice all consolations of this kind to the love of Jesus, of this God who lived on this earth constantly deprived of every consolation.

As mistress of novices, try to instruct more by deeds than by words. Let your words be always full of sweetness. Avoid, as a general thing, reproving the novices in public, and always make your corrections by saying kind words.

As a matter of obedience to you, I say: Always remember my poor soul, above all in the presence of the Blessed Sacrament and in your Communions. I bless you in the hearts of Jesus and Mary. Live Jesus and Mary!

Your very devoted servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI.

Letter 27

TO THE SAME

He recommends his Institute to her prayers, and exhorts her to persevere in prayer.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, April 18, [1736.]

First of all I must tell you, my dearest daughter, that when you write to me omit the title Your most illustrious Lord; it is sufficient to say Your Reverence out of respect to the priesthood with which I, though unworthy, am invested.

In the second place, I must tell you that you must not be afraid; when we embrace the cross we also embrace Jesus Christ who is united with the cross.

I thank you for recommending me to Jesus Christ; never omit doing so, whether you receive letters from me or not; and with me always recommend our Institute to Jesus Christ. You must know that we are in great trouble; within a short time we have lost four, perhaps, five subjects; and thus you see how much we need your prayers. Pray to Jesus Christ to send us subjects; I ask especially for a novena to Mary Immaculate and to St. Joseph, that they may obtain for us three subjects.

In regard to the state of your soul, content yourself with having Jesus in your heart if you have him not before your eyes, and offer up to him this pain—a pain that could not be greater—for the soul that loves Jesus it is a pain that drew complaints from Jesus himself on the cross. But what does he know that knows not how to suffer for God? Thus spoke your St. John of the Cross; and St. Philip Neri said that there is no greater tribulation in this world than to have no tribulations. He added that he that desires to suffer little has little love for God. When you are more desolate than usual, raise up by a sigh your heart to Jesus by saying to him: O my Spouse! I ask not Thy consolations; it is only Thee that I wish. Therefore, endeavor also to feel the pain that was felt by St. Aloysius de Gonzaga; it was for him a martyrdom of love not to be able to love God as much as he acknowledged him worthy of being loved.

Pains or consolations, offer them all to Jesus.

How I love to see in you, dearest daughter, this weariness in prayer, and this perseverance in spite of the weariness! It suffices, then, that you always make acts of union of your will with the will of God.

If you would see, dearest daughter, that all goes well with you in regard to God, where would be your suffering? To suffer, then, would be a paradise. When trouble takes possession of you, try to recover at once peace of mind; persevere in prayer and in your other spiritual exercises, notwithstanding every feeling of disgust, even though all should seem to you to be lost; leave all to Jesus Christ.

Guard against all solicitude in relation to my letters, else they will be for you an obstacle to your perfection.

I send my regards to Mother Superior, and I recommend myself to the prayers of this afflicted soul, because afflicted souls are dear to God; on my part I have recommended her to Jesus and to Mary. As regards yourself, I follow the agreement that we have made. Live in the hearts of Jesus and Mary! Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very humble and very devoted servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI.

Letter 28

TO THE SAME

Counsels in regard to perfection.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, May 23, 1736.

My dear daughter, I received two letters from you at the same time.

Continue to practise meditation as you are doing; it is good; and have in this no other contentment, no other desire than to accomplish the will of the Lord.

Although you may be in desolation and in trouble, yet endeavor always to practise meekness in your relations with your Sisters, and for this end do violence to yourself. Continue to say to them something about God when such a thing is useful to them. Charity is more pleasing to God than humility. Take care, however, on these occasions to acknowledge yourself (but before God more than before those to whom you speak) as miserable and despicable, as you are; and if a thought of vain-glory presents itself do not heed it.

When even you should find yourself colder than snow, do never omit to pray for poor sinners, for the souls in purgatory, and especially for me, in order that I may gain many souls for God.

It seems to me that I have already told you not to ask me any more for the love of Mary to go to see you; but I see that you have repeated the request. If God wishes this, I would obey him; but it is difficult at present, for I am going to make a long stay at Villa. Do not, therefore, ask for this anymore. Content yourself with what I can do for you, and I repeat, do not be solicitous on the subject of my letters. I have written to you more than once; but either the letters are lost or they are delayed. Jesus will then grant you this consolation according to his good pleasure, and if he wishes that we should wait till we reach Paradise to see each other, you should be resigned; if not, you would prove that you do not yet belong entirely to God.

I now recommend to you three things: Silence, the exercise of the presence of God, and a tender love for Mary. Pray without ceasing to this good Mother for me, for the Institute, and ask her for subjects; for so far no one has come to replace those that have left us. The month of July is consecrated to Mary; go then, every day of this month, to pray to her to my intention and to that of the Institute that she may send us subjects if it be to her glory.

I leave you in the heart of Jesus, and under the mantle of Mary.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 29

TO HIS FATHER DON GIUSEPPE DE LIGUORI

He asks him to help on the work of the Venerable Gennaro Sarnelli.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, July 16, [1736.]

My dear Father: I again recommend to you the affair[16776] of D. Gennaro Sarnelli in reference to the removal of prostitutes; it is truly an important work that is conducive to the glory of God. This courageous missionary is the son of the Baron of the barony of Ciorani who does us a thousand favors. He has given us a beautiful piece of property with buildings, and a garden for a house and church. He has also furnished us with lime, wood, and even money in order that we may begin to build.—Asking you for your blessing, I remain, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 30

TO THE SAME

He begs him to speak to him no more about the episcopate.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, August 5 [1736].

My dear Father: I have just heard what has been done in regard to the affair of Father Sarnelli. I beg you to co-operate with him as much as you can for the glory of Jesus Christ.

In regard to the other affair, the episcopate, my dear Father, do not mention it to me any more if you do not wish to give me real pain. In case it were offered to me, even if it were the archbishopric of Naples, I should not fail to refuse it in order to continue this great work to which Jesus Christ has deigned to call me; for if I abandon this work, I would regard myself as almost one of the damned, for having abandoned the vocation that God has so evidently made known to me. I wish, therefore, that you would no longer speak to me or to anyone else about this affair, the more so, since in our Institute we are obliged by the Rule to renounce the episcopate and all dignities.

I do not cease to recommend you to Jesus Christ. May you bless me always, so that I may remain faithful to God to whom I owe everything. I conclude by most humbly throwing myself at your feet and asking you for your blessing. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 31

TO SISTER MARIA GIOVANNA DELLA CROCE

He marks out a rule of conduct for her interior and her exterior life.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, September 26 [1736.]

I yesterday received your two letters. I learned with great pleasure that you have become detached from that person, and that afterwards you have been blamed. What you have told the Superior is sufficient; there is no longer any need of justifying yourself, unless some are really scandalized at your breaking off in this way, supposing that you are entertaining an aversion. To the other religious you must always show a smiling and friendly countenance.

Penances and mortifications should be performed only when you are well.

In regard to the mission, assure the bishop that he did well to call the missionaries of St. George;[16777] for we cannot go so far, and we have so much to do here that we cannot possibly give the mission. Indeed, our number is small; do not, therefore, cease, my dearest daughter, to pray to Jesus and Mary that they may send us companions; always pray, and especially now; for I have been informed that many wish to come. Although we are few in number, yet we are giving missions continually.

I am displeased to learn of the great eagerness that you manifest of seeing me again. A general confession is not necessary, and God does not wish that you should think of seeing me again. I do not go to see even my mother, nor anyone else. As for Villa, it is not at all proper for me to go there; besides, I could not go without permission, and this permission my director [Mgr. Falcoia] would surely never give me if I asked him. Be therefore undisturbed, and I beg you never more to speak to me about this journey. Be calm; God wishes you to be detached from all creatures—from all without exception; he desires to be your only companion and your consolation.

Here is the advice that I give you:

Use the discipline every day, and wear the cilicium till dinner-time; on Fridays you may do something more: but when you are indisposed, especially when you have only little fever, do nothing, absolutely nothing.

As for the fruit, if you can abstain from it, seeing that it is not strictly necessary for your health, you will do well to abstain from it; it is sufficient if you take it only on Sundays, and then only a small quantity; on other days you may abstain from it when you have soup [minestra] and there is no other special reason.

Do not, my dear daughter, complain about my silence; if I do not receive your letters, how can I answer them? Signor Giovanni Oliviero has changed his place of residence. He now lives in the Forcella quarter, in the street called Sopra Muro. Now let me know to which person I can address my answers so that they may reach you.

As for past faults, think no more of them. Endeavor to keep aloof from every one: go to the parlor as rarely as possible; if, with the permission of the Superior, you could avoid going there altogether, it would be well; but if this cannot be, on account of business connected with your life-annuity, or other necessities, try at least to show yourself there as rarely as possible. However, if it were possible for you to let your relatives and others know that you would no more go to the parlor, oh, how glad I would be!

Write to Luisa that I am very happy to see her continuing as she does; tell her that she should love Jesus and Mary very much by resolving to sanctify herself earnestly and cordially, and that she should pray for me. And as for you, all the time that you may have, employ it in prayer by always asking Jesus Christ for the grace of doing perfectly his will, in order to belong entirely to him. Oh, how beautiful is it to see a soul that belongs entirely to God, a soul that wishes only God, that loves only God, that thinks only of God, that seeks in all things only God!

When obedience prescribes anything for you to do, especially when you are to attend the sick, leave all your devotions; then in your occupations and fatiguing labor sustain yourself by ejaculatory prayers which you should allow to originate from all that you do or see; render also assistance to the sick every time that you can do so.

Always remember me and our Congregation; you see that on my part I do not forget you, and that I am deeply interested in seeing you a saint. O my dearest daughter! the God that we have is so amiable and so good to him that seeks him with his whole heart. Courage, then! Let us seek God only, him only, and nothing more; and let us always pray to Mary that she may help us to find him.

Make a novena to Mary for the new subjects of whom I have spoken, in order that she may send them to us and confirm them in their good-will. May Mary be our hope, and Jesus alone be our love!

Since you desire to give me a more distinct knowledge of your past life, this is what you may do: When you have a little time, write to me all that concerns your past life, your faults, those at least that may be entrusted to a letter; but on the other hand, note also the little attention that you have given to prayer, etc., and the graces that you have received from our Lord. I shall thus be better able to direct you.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI.

TO THE SAME

He prescribes for her the way she should behave under existing circumstances.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, October 26 [1736].

My dear daughter: I returned home yesterday, and I now answer your last letter. The expenses of the missions are incurred by us. We call ourselves the Congregation of the Most Holy Saviour. At present it is not possible for us to give a mission at your place; for we have so much to do in this vast diocese of Salerno that we cannot go even to Cava which is near us.

As regards the mortifications, I do not wish you to begin them if you are not well. Eat fruit sometimes when you see that it serves as a remedy either for the stomach or in order that you may not eat something else that will disagree with you.

I am much pleased that you have that companion; I counsel you to use all your influence with the Superiors that she may not be taken from you. Be always friendly to her, and always praise her before others. As for the services that appear to you so lowly in regard to the sick, you know that they have been highly prized and honored by the saints; if the senses loath such things, it does not matter; let nature show repugnance and do your duty.

As to the mission, it is impossible at present: the distance is too great.

Finally, if you wish to be consoled, hear this advice: embrace in all things the will of God, and you will always be content.

Pray always for me, who do not forget you. Pray to Jesus and to Mary to send us subjects. I recommend to you three visits every day to the Blessed Sacrament and to the Blessed Virgin by offering for the love of them your life and all things; and in these visits give a sigh of love in behalf of my soul, in order that Jesus and Mary may help me to accomplish perfectly the will of God. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Various counsels.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, April 4 [1737].

My dear daughter: I write you hurriedly these few lines in answer to your last letter, as we are very much occupied in the building [of a house at Ciorani]; nearly fifty persons have come through charity, to assist us. For this reason thank our Lord for us, and beg him to continue to bless us.

Two good subjects have already come to join the Institute.

What you tell me about your severe carnival and the first Friday of March, gives me pleasure.

As for the foundation, I do not yet say that it is either a temptation or an inspiration. Pray to our Lord to enlighten me, and in the meantime keep yourself entirely resigned, as if the thing could never succeed. Write, moreover, to the duchess, and inform me of all.

I am pleased with your sister, and her letter delighted me with the beautiful sentiments that she expresses. Cultivate this soul with care, for I hope that she will produce great fruit.

When, my daughter, shall I come to Caiazzo? I do not know; perhaps this may be when we least imagine it. In the meantime, let us love Jesus Christ with all our power, for he is well worthy to be loved. Always pray for me who will not forget you.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 34

TO THE SAME

He reproaches her for her great repugnance to suffering.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

[The middle of April, 1737.]

As for the journey to Villa, God knows, my dear daughter, when I shall be able to make it, for I cannot leave this place, and I have no occasion to go to Villa.

I rejoiced to hear of the persecutions of which you are the object; but what you add, that you despair of being able to remain longer in that monastery, gives me pain.

If our Lord wishes a new foundation, he will himself open the way, and let us know when he wishes it. But perhaps this is a great temptation to you; I fear it when I see the horrible repugnance that you feel to bear any longer the persecutions of the monastery. You should, however, desire these persecutions. Do you not see that you are now treated as our Lord, and that in watching you so closely, in keeping you in humility, your Sisters are cooperating in the work of your perfection? And you say after this that you can no longer bear with them!

O my God! what has then become of your desire to suffer for your Spouse, to belong entirely to him? Sister Giovanna, my daughter, nevermore use such language when you speak to me; otherwise you will make me lose the hope of ever seeing you really a saint, and I shall no longer regard you as my daughter.

God wishes you to be a saint, but by means of crosses. In future, far from complaining of being persecuted, do not omit to thank Jesus Christ on this account: even ask him, in all your prayers, to make you live, unceasingly despised by all creatures. Your present aridity is without doubt a chastisement from his hand which is intended to punish your great repugnance to sufferings.

When you are despised or accused, be silent until you are commanded to speak; and in this case, instead of excusing yourself, say that you deserve to be dismissed on account of your imperfections.

Continue to pray for the Institute and for me, and ask God to send us subjects.

To expiate your want of patience, impose upon yourself some supererogatory mortification during eight days, in eating, in taking the discipline, or in wearing the cilicium.

Pray to your divine Spouse to pardon you your want of resignation, and recommend yourself to our Lady of Seven Dolors; she will solicit your pardon.

Write to me, and tell me how you are getting on. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very devoted Father in Jesus and Mary,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI.

Letter 35

TO THE SAME

He exhorts her to detach herself from creatures, and offers her advice how to behave towards her sister.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, April 22, 1737.

I have just received your two letters, and I again answer that for the present it is impossible for us to go to your place to give a mission; for our number is small, and we have so much to do here that we can hardly finish. Moreover, it is our rule never to give missions so far away, especially when we have to give them in places that are near us.

I permit you to pray to Jesus Christ as St. Scholastica did; but I forbid you all eagerness to see and to hear me. It may suffice for us to see each other in Paradise in order never to be separated from the beautiful vision of God; while waiting, let us aid each other by prayer, and remain in peace. God only is that good from which we must not be separated. All creatures are creatures that chill in us the love for the supreme good when we desire them with solicitude. I wish, therefore, to help you to unite yourself more and more to Jesus Christ, and not to separate you from him; hence, I desire that henceforth you be more resigned.

What consoles me is that darkness and contempt continue in you. Oh, would to God that in the midst of all the darkness, abandoned and despised by everyone, we may have the happiness of loving and pleasing Jesus Christ! In darkness I recommend to you to employ a great part of your meditation in saying prayers to Jesus and to Mary. Oh, what an excellent meditation is that in which we do not cease to ask of Jesus the love of Jesus!

I send you certain little works of piety with some hymns of my own composition.

As regards your sister, it is necessary that you should neglect nothing to promote her eternal salvation. If there were some means of obtaining a place for her it would not much matter if something should be lost in selling the property. In short, you must take care of this affair, and find out whether the house of your aunt is frequented by a relative or anyone else; for in that case, you must cry out against such a thing, create a noise about it and decide upon measures. Do all that you can, but without losing your peace of mind; what you cannot do place in the hands of Jesus Christ.

Continue to recommend me very much to Jesus and to Mary. We are few in number, and at the present time we are nearly all sick. Make a novena to Mary Immaculate that she may procure for us both health and subjects; we shall then go to give a mission at your place.

I also request you to make without intermission acts of love to Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament. May Mary be our hope, and may Jesus be our love! Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

Letter 36

TO HIS DIRECTOR MGR. TOMMASO FALCOIA

Reflections as to the abandonment of the foundation at Villa degli Schiavi.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, July 12, 1737.

Yesterday Brother Andrea arrived here, bringing good news from Caiazzo, and telling us that Mgr. Vigilante, being ill-disposed towards us, makes no further mention of another foundation.[16778] Cheer up, my dear Father, may Jesus Christ send us tribulations in every way; blessed be his name forever! Meanwhile, I see that the devil is endeavoring to cause us trouble from within. Don Giovanni [Mazzini] and Don Andrea [Villani] have written to me in confidence, and I confide it to you as a secret, my dear Father, that it may serve as a guide for you; but when speaking to them, do not mention that they have written to me. In short, I understand that Don Giovanni, judging from the tenor of his letter, has heard that our people are not to return to Caiazzo, and Don Andrea writes to me that he has had many interior and exterior struggles. I hope, nevertheless, that Jesus Christ will not abandon us.

My dear Father, let me get rid of a scruple concerning the foundation at Villa which torments me very much: it is caused by seeing the great abandonment of these poor souls.

When we went to the prince,[16779] he said in the beginning that we could not expect more than the hundred and fifty ducats which had been promised, and that we should go to the delegate, as he did not understand the matter. I saw then, that, though he did not show himself favorable to us, he would not have been offended if the delegate had done us justice. Judging now from what he has said, it seems to me that I should have acknowledged that we could not claim more than the hundred and fifty ducats. My memory is, moreover, confused, and I know no longer whether or not I would have finished by taking leave. But Don Cesare [Sportelli] suddenly came out very boldly and said to the prince: "We have come hither to take leave, and we want nothing else." The prince then dismissed us with bad grace. I could then apply no remedy, since leave had already been taken. But during our journey to Villa, the doubt occurred to me whether I was not able to remedy matters, and whether the leave-taking was according to the intention of your Lordship. Yet I brightened up on the way when I heard of the violence used, for we may safely infer the consent of the prince, and furthermore we may conclude that he was opposed to us. I desired to tell you this in order to lighten my mind of a load. As for the rest, I am satisfied with whatever God has been pleased to do through your Lordship.

I also wish to tell you that we were offered three foundations at Cava and at Vietri, but at the time I did not pay much attention to these offers, as I knew that your Lordship wished to see us united, rather than scattered in other places. But if, my dear Father, you wish that when I have to return to those places, I should select the best house as a new foundation, I shall obey.

But, my dear Father, allow me to express my sentiments on this point.

In the first place, it is necessary henceforward to exercise great caution in accepting foundations of this kind so miserable and wretched; for though it is true that we can relinquish them at our pleasure, still such a proceeding reflects great discredit upon our poor little Institute; for people will say, as the talk now goes at Caiazzo, that we have been expelled.

Then I would ask your Lordship, since we are so few, to keep us together; this consoles me when I think of Villa, for Jesus Christ has allowed us to abandon it without remorse, in order to make us more united. My dear Father, where subjects are only too few (your Lordship already know this, but I have had the experience) regular observance and fervor languish, even perseverance is threatened; to tell the truth, everything grows tepid: for let a subject be absent from choir on account of some affair which is always turning up, such as preaching or hearing confessions, or some other business, of course there can be no choir; this happens pretty often. Moreover, when the choir is made up of so few, one can hardly make out what is said, for the same one must be hebdomadary, antiphonarius, and must intone the psalms. Hence, we never learn to say the Office in the proper manner. Retreats and spiritual exercises are seldom made. For my own part, since I am alone, I do not remember that I have ever been able on a single occasion to make the exercises perfectly, as we were so few, and it was necessary for me to occupy myself with some affair or other. As for the domestic conferences, which are such an assistance to us, one is tempted to give them up; one does not know what to say when so few are to be addressed; all that one can do is to moralize a little, in order not to wound the small audience. The faults of which it is customary for us to accuse ourselves in the refectory, are also few on account of the paucity of members, and so the accusation on Friday is often omitted. In the same manner the recreations, especially when one is out of humor, are more tiresome than refreshing. The result of all this is relaxed observance on the part of the subjects; and we, my dear Father, have experienced this. We know it from the divisions, from the dispersion and ruin of the subjects at Ciorani; Don Xaverio [Rossi] and Don Giulio [Marocco], to speak the truth, are not what they were, and I have become colder than all the others. It is good to speak of this, not only on our own account, but also on account of the others, who can with difficulty bring themselves to unite with us, because they see that we are so few.

Only yesterday Father Fiorillo wrote me that there is a good foundation at Grotta Goglierma, beyond Sessa. It is a large village in the diocese of Aquino, where we would have a church quite finished, a house with twenty cells, and an abundance of comforts. Father Fiorillo asked me to go thither to inspect the place, for the municipality, he said, wishes to bestow it upon missionaries.

I answered that I had been informed of it. . . . . [The remainder is wanting.]

TO HIS FATHER DON GIUSEPPE DE LIGUORI

He begs him to be more charitable to his son D. Ercole, and gives him some advice about his own sanctification.

[The end of October, 1737.]

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

My dear Father: I beg you for pity's sake to have a little more charity for your son. This morning he came to see me at Naples,[16781] and began in my presence to weep, because he could not do otherwise on account of the grief that afflicts him. My God! do you wish to make him desperate, and cause him to throw himself into a well, or to do some other rash act? For mercy's sake, stop showing your melancholy at table, give him some assistance, since your poor son is now married, exiled from Naples, without any comfort whatsoever. See that you do not make him do any imprudent act; especially should you show charity towards him now that he is sick. Think that he is your son, and not a dog; hence, he should be dearer to you than possessions, than money; and be assured that if charity is practised towards your own family, God will help you in some other way. What do you wish should be done? What is done is done; and has already been arranged ab æterno [from all eternity]; upon whom can you lay the blame?

I beg you, dear Father, to be habitually a little more united with God, to go to confession oftener, to prepare your accounts, because when Jesus Christ comes there will then be no time to attend to this matter. Think that you are already advanced in age; who knows within what space of time you will no longer be in this world? and it is certain that this must be, whether you wish it or not. Every morning I recommend you to God at my Mass, for I fear much for your eternal salvation. I hope the Blessed Virgin will assist you; but the Blessed Virgin will not be able to assist you without your co-operation. . . . .

TO FATHER GIUGLIO MAROCCO,[16782] AT CAIAZZO

The saint complains of his silence, and tells him some news.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, March 9 [1738].

My dear Don Giuglio: What is the matter that I have not seen any of your letters for so long a time? The past week we have been at home after two months spent in giving missions. We wish to know how you are, and when we shall have the consolation of seeing you; when you come from the holy house of the Blessed Virgin, we hope that you will come here directly.

We have learned that Columbano[16783] has become re-united to his wife; through this union Monsignor di Caiazzo was hoping to obtain his consent for the foundation. I should most sincerely wish you to inform yourself how things stand, without, however, making your desire known.

Present my regards to Don Silvestro and also to Elizabeth; let the latter pray to Jesus and Mary for me; tell her that I do not forget her. Remember me kindly to Monsignor, and recommend me to Jesus Christ and to Mary every morning, especially at Mass.

Here they have begun to build the church. . . . We hope to get a good Neapolitan subject; recommend him to Jesus Christ. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO THE SAME

It is impossible to give the mission for which he asks. Great desire of seeing him enter the Institute.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

From the mission at CALVANICO,[16784] April 27, [1739.]

My dear Don Giovanni: I was greatly consoled to receive your most esteemed note, because I thought that you no longer remembered us. But your note proved to me that this is not the case; it proved, on the contrary, that you are thinking of us and of our Institute with real affection. O God! how much assistance you could have given us this year by going with us on the missions, and I had so great a desire to write this to you! But I was told not to do so on account of the disposition of your family and of the bishop. The latter, I believe, will grow somewhat cool towards us on account of what your relatives will have told him; the fact is he will not even send us the candidates for ordination next Pentecost. If you have an occasion do not omit, I beg you, to assure him that in regard to this point we are altogether without fault.

Let us now speak of the mission at Dupino. Dear Giovanni, I have received orders from our Father [Mgr. Falcoia] to retire after the mission at Mercato di Giffoni and to give no other, so that, though we had received a most urgent application from Valle di Giffoni—an extensive and beautiful country—we had to leave the people disconsolate, because no mission was given to them. It, however, happened that for a special reason the archbishop positively wished to have a mission given at Calvanico where I am now; our Father has granted us permission to give this mission tantum [only], and no more, as he does not wish us to labor any more during the month of May. Now you ask me for a mission at Dupino; but it is too late. The most that I can do to serve you is to send a courier to Castel Montori to obtain permission to go; but I must say to you that such a thing will be impossible on account of the reasons given above. As soon as I receive an answer, Don Cesare [Sportelli] will send it to you. If we cannot go now, we shall wait till the weather becomes cooler. You must thank those gentlemen of the parish for the honor that they have done us. Had they notified me before, I could have taken more suitable measures to serve them.

To return to ourselves. Do not forget us or the Institute. Whatever you may do, you may be sure a good rewarder will pay you; I say no more. Ah, my dear Giovanni, my dear Giovanni! Let me at least know at what time, with the consent of your family and of your bishop, you will be able to help us on the missions; let me know this, so that I may send you word when the missions are to be given. Messis quidem multa [the harvest is great] . . . especially for the corning year; oh, what a harvest is awaiting us! There is especially Eboli where there are six thousand souls; and our services have been asked for S. Lorenzo della Padula where there are also six thousand souls. Well then! pray to Jesus and Mary for us, and particularly for me. Asking you to write to me, I remain, etc.

Your very humble and very devoted servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI.

Letter 41

TO FATHER GIULIO MAROCCO

He writes to him to prolong his stay at Caiazzo.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph!

CIORANI, [June 1739.]

My dear Giulio: When you wrote to me I was absent on a mission. Then Father Cesare [Sportelli] answered you for me, and begged that you would write about the matter to our Father [Mgr. Falcoia]. But now this is no longer necessary, since I have spoken to Monsignor. He says that you should stay at Caiazzo as long as the doctors say that it is necessary for your health. Pray to Jesus and Mary for me.

Salute for me Monsignor [Vigilante], and tell him that we soon expect him and Don Silvestro; be cheerful; for pity's sake, be courageous, take exercise, and do not trouble yourself about anything. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your devoted brother and servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

Letter 42

TO THE SAME

He hopes to see him soon again at Ciorani, and begs him to recommend to our Lady of Loreto himself and the Institute.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, [End of July, 1739].

My dear Giulio: I was waiting a long time for news from you, and at last I received it. We rejoice that your health is better. We should like to know when we shall have the consolation of receiving you here.

The priest in question wished to enter this summer; as, however, by entering he would have to make the exercises, our Father [Mgr. Falcoia] wished his entrance to be postponed. He will come towards the second week of September.

Know that on the 15th of October I shall begin a retreat to the clergy at Naples, and after that I shall return home. If during this time you would be able to arrange about coming here, my consolation would be redoubled. If not, may God's will be done!

After having written this, I heard that our Father has granted you permission to go to our Lady of Loreto. I am glad of this; pray to this good Mother for me, for our companions and for our Institute, and go to her with great confidence that she may give you either good health or perfect resignation. I suppose that you will go by the way of the Abruzzi in order to avoid the mountainous countries.

I have nothing more to say. May we meet again immediately after your trip.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your brother and servant,

ALFONSO LE LIGU0RI.

Letter 43

TO MOST REVEREND CASIMIRO ROSSI,[16785] ARCHBISHOP OF SALERNO

He asks for faculties for the exercise of the apostolic ministry.

[CIORANI, December 26, 1739.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Most Reverend and respected Sir: I write this letter to ask your Grace for two favors in regard to the faculties. The first is this: Your Grace will remember that for a priest of the diocese whose faculties for hearing confessions, granted for six months, were shortly to expire, you granted me an extension as long as the missions would last. Now as the same thing will often happen, and will in fact happen as I understand in the case of some confessors in the missions that are about to be given, I beg your Grace to concede to me also for the future, the same extension, in a similar case, to approved confessors for the time only during which they assist me on the mission.

The other favor is this: The evening that I spent at Salerno it seems to me that your Grace allowed me the faculty of employing any one whom I believe fit to help me to hear confessions in the monasteries of nuns; but as on that evening I was so much occupied at the moment that afterwards I did not remember how I had formulated my request on this point, I now beg your Grace for the peace of my conscience to declare to me that you grant me the faculty of hearing confessions in said monasteries, and of asking anyone whom I think suitable also to hear confessions, with the same faculties granted to me for the missions when I happen to give the exercises or when I preach in the said monasteries.

For my greater tranquility and for your convenience it will be sufficient, and I beg you that below you inform me that the aforesaid faculties are granted. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph! While humbly prostrating myself at your feet, I have the honor to remain,

Most Reverend Sir,

Your very humble, very devoted,

and very grateful servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

The archbishop answered in the same letter: “The two faculties asked for, as expressed in this letter, are granted. December 28, 1739.

Letter 44

TO A NUN AT FISCIANO, IN THE DIOCESE OF SALERNO

He exhorts her never to omit Communion, notwithstanding all her temptations.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CASTELLAMMARE,[16786] January 6, 1740.

How much am I pained that you have so little faith in obedience, notwithstanding what I have told you and repeated so often! One thing in your letter has, however, consoled me, that in spite of all this you have not given up Communion.

I beg you, and I command you, never to omit holy Communion, even when it should seem to you that you are giving consent to every temptation in the world. For pity's sake, do not treat your Spouse as a tyrant who wishes you evil, and who wishes to punish the soul that is anxious to seek him and not to displease him.

If you cannot swear at first sight to have deliberately consented to the temptation, and consented to lose God, always go blindly. (I take it on my conscience) to Communion, in spite of all disquietudes, and even if you believe you are committing a sacrilege. Act thus; you will no doubt suffer, but you will not on that account be less pleasing to Jesus Christ, since it is only to please him and to obey him that you communicate.

In your Communions and prayers, do not forget the agreement that we have made with each other; on my part, I pray and will earnestly pray for you to this good Master, for I see that you are very dear to him; yes, very dear, although you do not know this. Could you not convince yourself of this? You would then become, miserable creature that you are, grateful to this God your Creator who bears towards you so tender a love.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI.

Letter 45

TO THE VENERABLE GENNARO SARNELLI.[16787]

He gives him advice in regard to the composition of spiritual books.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, April 3, 1740.

My dear Gennaro: We are distressed on account of Father Xavier [Rossi] whose illness has grown much worse, causing him to lose more blood than before. To-day, however, he is a little better. May God spare him to us!

I have read what you have written to me. My dear Gennaro, I have, however, very little time, and soon I must go to Nocera to preach some sermons; besides I am not very well. It would, indeed, be a great work for me to collect those small treatises about the Heart of Jesus and the Passion. I shall do what I can.

I have told Brother Gennaro [Rending] to copy the canticles, because I have not time to do so myself; but I shall revise them. In the canticle of the Desolate Soul it will suffice that you change the strophe arranged by Fontana as follows:

E se per me non mai
Vi fosse, o Dio, perdono,
Sappi che tua pur sono
E sempre tua sarò.[16788]

As for the pious meditations on the Passion, the Blessed Sacrament, etc., of which you speak, I wish you to fill them with affections, rather than with citations, revelations and reflections; for in this kind of meditations one should exercise, the will more than the understanding; and what devout persons require more, are affections and not considerations.

Particularly in the meditation on the Passion, when the meditation is on Jesus bound by the executioners, let the prayer be: O Jesus deign to bind us with the chains of Thy love, etc. You will find a similar aspiration written in the paper I send you.

To Jesus covered with wounds by the scourging, the prayer may be as follows; May he wound us with his love, since all these wounds cry for and demand only love, as our Lord himself one day said to Sister Vittoria Angelini.

To Jesus crowned with thorns: May he reign over our hearts and our affections, etc.

To Jesus dying: May he make us die to all the affections of the world.

To Jesus wounded in his heart by a lance: May he wound us, etc.

Read the book entitled: "Sufferings of Jesus;"[16789] you will find in it very beautiful aspirations. See also the exercises which the author gives after the reflections. I conclude. When you have read them give them to Jorio for me.

I will send you later the other affections and the canticles drawn from the "Book of Canticles." Recommend me to Jesus and Mary.

Letter 46

TO THE FOUNDRESS OF A MONASTERY OF NUNS AT SARAGNANO

Necessity of establishing perfect observance from the beginning, especially in regard to poverty.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, July 12, 1740.

Reverend and honored Mother: I regret exceedingly not to have been able to give you before your departure some useful counsels for the good of the new foundation and for the glory of Jesus Christ. I have therefore thought that I would send you the counsels in writing.

I would say to you in the first place: Prepare yourself to suffer much for Jesus Christ, if you wish that this foundation should be made according to his design. You will have to suffer poverty; you will have to endure persecutions, not so much from outsiders as from those that are within; because the latter are accustomed to live according to their own fancy, and as soon as they see themselves restricted by the Rule, there will be among them malcontents who will murmur and create disturbance; there will also be some who will take their departure. But let those go away with full liberty who do not wish to observe the Rule punctually. It will not matter if you remain alone; Jesus and Mary will come to your aid.

Consider that you have to implant the spirit of fervor which is always to endure in future. But if now you begin to relax, either through human respect, or through fear that complaints will be made, or that some will leave you, remember that the foundation will go from bad to worse.

In all other points, be full of charity towards all the Sisters, especially the sick; try to be the servant of all, and make them understand that you bear great love towards each one of them, because love, and not force, is an excellent means of rendering them docile and obedient. But when you see that any one obstinately resists obedience, and especially the Rule, dismiss her resolutely, and implore the help of the bishop, asking him to support you in this matter, which is absolutely of the first importance.

Keep always before your eyes, Reverend Mother, the beautiful reward that awaits you in heaven if you maintain observance, and the severe chastisement that will, on the contrary, be inflicted upon you if, in order to condescend to the weakness of some Sister, you introduce inobservance by scandalizing the others. And what is not done now, you should despair of doing later, since fervor will always diminish rather than increase.

Take care to instruct more by example than by words. Be the first to observe all the Rules, and as to the observance, lay aside everything else. It is on the observance, understand this well, that the sanctity of this foundation depends.

Watch particularly over the observance of poverty, and absolutely, absolutely, absolutely, permit no one to retain anything as her own, not even a needle, if there is no real necessity. Let everything be in common, as is required by the Rule. Do not allow anything to be kept in the rooms that is not strictly necessary. Fruit, sweetmeats, jewels! Of what use will all this be, if not to make us suffer years and years in purgatory? For a much greater reason should you forbid the keeping of linen, of money, or of any other object, even if it has been received as a present. Let all presents be for the benefit of the Community.

Be on your guard, for if now you do not establish good customs, it will afterwards be impossible for you to remove bad ones. Recall to mind what I preached at Fisciano where some abuse had been introduced; and you know what it cost to remove it.

Endeavor also to suppress as much as can be done all talking in the parlor, and see to it that the listeners be always present. A monastery in which poverty is observed and in which the grate is closed, is a holy monastery.

Consider, Reverend Mother, that there is now for you question either of becoming a saint or of being damned. Give as much time as possible to prayer, for you stand very much in need of it, and exhort the others without intermission to pray before the Blessed Sacrament and at the feet of Mary, because on this everything depends. Tell the Sisters that all those that begin a foundation usually become saints when they strive to please Jesus Christ.

I already know that in order to execute what I have just written, you will have much to suffer; but it cannot be otherwise. If the members of the Community do not wish to obey you, frankly declare to them and to the bishop that you wish to return to Fisciano where you can have more peace and where you will be in less danger of damning your soul.

Have this letter read by the Sister who is your companion in this undertaking. Your Rule forbids flesh-meat. If you can settle this point, you will do well; so it is practised in the monastery of Tramonti.

Trust in the Lord and fear nothing, even if you see the whole world leagued against you on the question of observance. I hope that all that I have just said to you will be for you at the hour of death a subject of consolation, and not a subject of remorse. May you both recommend me to Jesus and to Mary; on my part, I will not forget you in my prayers.

May Jesus be our love and Mary our hope!

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 47

TO FATHER GIULIO MAROCCO

He expresses to him his satisfaction in knowing that he is resolved to persevere in his vocation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, July 12, [1740].

My dear Giulio: I have received your letter which we were longing to receive; and it has consoled us all. This is enough to understand the rest.

Dear Giulio, what frightened us in your letter was not so much the sentence: I wish first of all to see my health restored, as the sentence : for God has clearly made known to me that he wishes me to be in the Institute, not as a sick, but as a healthy man It is this thought joined to one of your old temptations already known, namely, that you are not made for the Institute if you are sick, it was this thought, I say, that frightened us. As for the words clearly made known, they made us think that you had consulted some rabbi. But let there be no more of this. We are all of us consoled, and our fear has rendered more intense our desire of seeing you very soon.

For the rest, as this consolation to see us must necessarily be deferred, we as well as you must have patience. You may freely attend to the care of your health, as our Father [Mgr. Falcoia] has already expressed this to you, and has, I believe, confirmed it in another letter.

In regard to the Masses, please to answer Don Giovanni [Mazzini],[16790] so as to take away all scruples. In short, do not give a thought as to whether or not you have celebrated the Masses, whether or not you have incurred expenses; and I say again to you most sincerely that you may send me word for anything that you may need, and Jesus Christ will provide.

You tell me not to write to you as I have done; and I beg Don Giulio, for pity's sake, not to write to me as he has done; that he should not frighten us again, saying that he wished to leave us. Come now! no more of this. Let the whole of what has been said be buried in the bottom of the sea.

I shall read in recreation this evening your Maccaronica. In the meantime recommend me to Jesus Christ and write us where you are and how you are.

I conclude by embracing you in the hearts of Jesus and of Mary. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!'

TO HIS DIRECTOR MONSIGNOR TOMMASO FALCOIA.[16791]

CIORANI, July 24, 1740.

My dear Father: I am cold; please send me a little of your fire; at least tell me what I have to do and bless me. Live Jesus and Mary!

Your very humble son,

ALFONSO.

TO FATHER GIULIO MAROCCO

He tenderly exhorts him to return to Ciorani, as he is certain about his vocation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, August 2, 1740].

My dear Don Giulio: I fear that the letters that I am writing to you at present are becoming wearisome to you. But what can I do? The affection that I bear towards one of the first and oldest companions of this little Congregation impels me to write again.

We have been expecting to receive from Naples the papers or the letters about which you wrote us, but nothing has yet come.

What prompts me to write you to-day is a note of the Bishop of Caiazzo in which, writing to his sister, the Prioress of S. Giorgio, he says expressly of you: "Neither I nor anyone else has put any obstacle in the way of Don Giulio's return to the Institute; on the contrary, I have been the first to urge him to enter it. Although I regarded him not only as useful, but necessary, yet I did not wish to charge my conscience with scruples in regard to his vocation."

Since now the bishop has approved your vocation, there is no longer any hindrance to your return.

Your vocation was afterwards approved by Father Fiorillo to whom, as your director, you referred the matter.

Monsignor Falcoia has found one of your notes in which you mention to him the resolution that you have made and the approbation that you have received.

Not to weary you, what are you doing at Caiazzo? What resolution did you make?

For pity's sake, do not take counsel at Naples, nor elsewhere, because if Mgr. Falcoia heard of this he would no more receive you. You were so detached from your relatives, why allow yourself to be overcome by the devil and the flesh? Do you wish to act as Alteriis[16792] acted, whose behavior you once condemned? Nevertheless he had against him the archbishop, who obliged him to remain in his diocese.

Do you perhaps believe that we shall not receive you with the same affection that we received you before? Here you will find more than brothers, more than a mother. Here all are sighing for you, although you have almost discarded us who are your companions.

For pity's sake, do not give any more time to the enemy to gain you over. What a fine excuse you make about your family! Say to them that you wish to obtain counsel at Naples. But you should consult Jesus Christ and at once you would come to Ciorani.

I beg you for the love of the Blessed Virgin to return immediately on receiving this letter. Who knows, if you were perhaps no longer in Caiazzo, you would be cured of your infirmities? We of course know that you will be nearly useless, but here you will find us all charity. And though you are useless, we receive and desire you, not because you are useless, but because you are our companion, and we do not wish you to be separated from us.

I have nothing more to say. After you have read this, consult the crucifix and take a resolution at the foot of it, but at once, and do not rise, I command you, before you have decided. And come just as you are.[16793] Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very devoted father and brother in Jesus Christ,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

Letter 50

TO FATHER CESARE SPORTELLI, AT CIORANI

He begs him to write to several monasteries in favor of a religious vocation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

S. ANIELLO,[16794] July 12, [1741].

Don C. has told me through D. G. that there is a good priest named D. L. who would come here; he is most anxious to enter the Congregation; but he has with him a sister who is as pure as an angel. As she does not wish to marry, he is in search of a convent where she may enter as a lay-sister.

I am going to write to Cava, to Fisciano, and to the convent of the Purità at Nocera. Let Father Andrea [Villani] be so kind as to write in my name to the Carmelites at Pagani and to those at Penta. Let him also write to the Carmelites at Solofra and ask Vigilante to engage the services of the primicerius who has great influence.

I hope your Reverence will also do me the favor of writing to these three places: to San Giorgio, to endeavor to gain over Polichetti; to Solofra, to the Franciscan Sisters; to Nocera; to the Convent of St. Clare at Nocera. Write also to Tripaldi, and even, if you think it advisable, to Serino. You must say that she is my penitent; that she is truly an angel from Paradise, but poor in this world's goods; and that it is I myself that urges her case most strongly. Please write these letters very soon, and have them forwarded at once.

I embrace you all in Jesus and Mary. Let Father Xavier not tire himself too much before he has fully regained his health.

My dear Don Giuseppe: I should like to ask an important favor of you. If you would be kind enough when you go to S. Aniello on your way to S. Sebastiano to grant me a moment's interview, you would do me a great favor.

TO FATHER CESARE SPORTELLI, AT CIORANI

He expresses to him his desire of promptly returning to Ciorani.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

S. ANIELLO, June 22, [1742]

My dear Father Cesare: If you do not send me Brother Gennaro [Rendina], I shall not be able to send you Brother Leonardo [Cicchetti]; for it is impossible for one Brother to work in the kitchen, to make purchases, and to serve the great number of Masses that are said here.

Nothing new has occurred here. Father Giovanni [Mazzini] is better. About July 3, he will go first to Castellammare and then to Ciorani.

Let all of you recommend me to Jesus Christ, and do so especially during the holy sacrifice of the Mass. Tell all that they should pray to our Lord that if it be conducive to his glory, he may deliver, me from Naples.[16796]

The Cardinal has not yet returned; when he returns, I will speak to him. I am, however, afraid, that he will not allow us to go away for good; we shall likely have to come and go, as the saying is. I remain, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO THE SAME

Various requests to be forwarded to Mgr. Falcoia.

[CIORANI, October 26, 1742.]

. . . . I wish to tell you that yesterday morning, through the mercy of Jesus Christ, the Archbishop [of Salerno] sent us twenty ducats[16797] as an alms, and published at the same time an order that all the candidates for ordination and those in sacris [in Orders] are to make a retreat of ten days, either at Ciorani or at the Vergini.[16798] Now since it would seem strange and improper to countermand the exercises in accordance with what our Father [Mgr. Falcoia] has ordered, after they have been arranged, what is to be done? This Don Xavier [Rossi] would like to know, so as to prepare the house. He desires permission to make the necessary arrangements, and see to the removal of the prohibition to do the slightest work on the new building.

As for the missions, there are three to be given at Montuoro, which I should like to give consecutively; it would please me very much if your Reverence were to come. Write to our Father and send me as quickly as possible his answer, whether he wishes us to begin on All Saints, or at some other time appointed by him. . . . .

Letter 54

TO DON MATTEO GRECO

Method of making mental prayer.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

December 10, 1742.

Abridgment of a method of making mental prayer.

Mental prayer has three parts; namely: preparation, meditation, and conclusion.

I. As to the preparation, it contains three acts: 1. Of faith, in adoring God who is present; 2. Of humility, in humbling ourselves before God and asking his pardon; 3. Of petition for light, in asking God for light for the love of Jesus and Mary, so as to make the meditation well.

Having then said a Hail Mary to the Blessed Virgin, we pass on to the meditation.

II. In regard to meditation, we must note several things: First, it is well for us to read that point of the meditation which makes us more recollected, and on which we are more inclined to think; but when we find ourselves moved by some pious sentiment, we should then cease to read and should occupy ourselves with gathering the fruits of the meditation which are as follows:

There are three fruits of meditation; namely: (1) the affections, (2) prayers, and (3) resolutions.

As for the 1., the will of the soul should occupy itself sweetly, without violence in making affections towards Jesus and Mary, etc., acts of confidence, humility, contrition, love, resignation, or oblation, etc.; since the affections are inflamed in meditation, the soul is also inflamed and unites itself to God. This is the principal fruit of meditation.

As to the 2., the soul should try to obtain from Jesus and Mary, etc., the graces that it needs, not only in general, but in particular, as the conquering of some vice, the love of God, holy perseverance, etc. And such a method of making meditation is very useful, and even necessary, especially during the time of aridity, or when our affections are not moved. Then it is best for us to humble ourselves, be resigned, and ask the divine Goodness for mercy; otherwise there is the danger that we either give up meditation because it is tedious, or derive very little profit from it.

As to the 3., before finishing the meditation we should always make or renew some particular resolution of overcoming some more than ordinary defect or practise some virtue that is more useful to us.

III. As regards the conclusion, it is made briefly by these acts:

1. We should thank Jesus and Mary for the lights received.

2. We should offer to God through Jesus and Mary the acts and the resolutions that we have made.

We should pray to the Lord through the love of Jesus and Mary to give us strength to keep our resolutions.

As to speaking more fully about meditation, and the method of making it, we may read the "Guida spirituale" [Spiritual Guide], of [Ludovico] da Ponte, or the "Hondo santificato" [World Sanctified], of Sarnelli.[16799]

TO THE KING OF NAPLES

Petition for a foundation of a house at Pagani.

[Towards the end of the year 1842.]

We the undersigned secular priests, Alfonso de Liguori, Cesare Sportelli, Giovanni Mazzini, Andrea Villani, who with other companions are united in the sentiments of mutual charity and zeal for the salvation of souls, especially of the most abandoned that live in the country and poor hamlets, where the necessity is very great and the spiritual help is very little, most humbly represent to your Majesty the following facts:

Since the year 1732, we have been living together for the before-mentioned end, in the city of Scala, in a church and house, to the great profit of its people. But as we have found out that the situation, owing to the rugged mountains, is most inconvenient to the people who are desirous of being benefited by our services, and is most injurious to the health of the subjects who have become ill, because of the great cold that exists there, we are anxious to build at Nocera de' Pagani, at some distance from the inhabited places, a house and a chapel to which the people of the surrounding country may easily come and find the spiritual help necessary for their souls. We therefore supplicate the clemency of your Majesty to deign to grant us permission to erect for the end mentioned the aforesaid house and chapel, being ready to leave them at the least sign of your Majesty, of whose great piety and zeal for the salvation of the souls of your beloved vassals we hope to obtain the favor asked.

In the meantime, humbly prostrate before your royal throne, we promise that we shall always pray to the divine Majesty for the welfare of your kingdom.

Letter 56

TO HIS FATHER D. GIUSEPPE DE LIGUORI

He informs him of the state of his health.—Various counsels.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, March 28, [1743].

I received your esteemed letter, as also the chocolate, for which I thank you very much. Through the grace of Jesus Christ I find myself in good health, and to-morrow I shall go to Salerno to give the retreat to the clergy. Affairs here are in the same state.

If you wish to buy some lives of the saints, buy the large Life of St. Aloysius de Gonzaga, which has just been published; the Life of St. Philip Neri, and if you can find it, the Life of St. Pascale or of St. Peter of Alcantara. Procure also a little book called the "Eternal Truths," by Rossignoli, and the "Eternal Maxims," by Cattaneo.

I conclude by prostrating myself at your feet and asking you for your blessing. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER CESARE SPORTELLI, SUPERIOR OF THE HOUSE AT PAGANI

The saint furnishes him with arguments against the adversaries of the Community of Pagani.[16800]

[CIORANI, 1744.]

Live Jesus and Mary!

This morning I was in so great trouble and haste that I forgot to send you the treatise on alms which I think you would like to have.

Passerini says (Book vi. of the Decretals): We give the name damage only to that which injures a right acquired, and not to that which may injure a contingent right. Consequently it matters little whether certain persons should no longer receive the alms that they now receive, for these depend on the free will of the donors.[16801] Resting on this saying, he quotes a number of Doctors whose names I have not set down, and brings forward decision 32 of the Rota, n. 32 and 33, part 9, Recentiorum.

Speaking specially of the opposition made by the parish priests, he says: Even should the parish see that the alms are failing it, one should prefer the spiritual profit to the profit proceeding from the alms; otherwise no religious Order could be anywhere established.[16802] He cites in support of this Pasqualigo and Frances.

In a word, he says that what should be well considered is the spiritual good that is done to the places.[16803] And this point having been once established, the bishop is not even obliged to call together those that are interested.[16804] He says this at n. 37. resting on decision 742 of the Rota, part 2, Recent. And the bishop is not obliged to institute a process.[16805]—Pignatelli is of the same opinion as Cespedes, Donato, Lezana, and Pasqualigo, who say: It is not necessary to institute a tribunal if the place is rich enough that all may find a means of living.[16806]

On this same subject of alms Rotario (Theol. Moral. Regularium lib. 3, cap. 5, punct. 4, n. 3), cites a decision of Farinaccio (tom. 2, part. 2, decis. 745) by which, notwithstanding the opposition of the interested parties who were besides mendicant religious, a new convent could be established with the right of having Masses and burials. The reason alleged was that things of this kind were left free to everyone.

Tamburini, Cespedes, Bordoni, cited by Pignatelli (d. 1. n. 54), also say that no regard should be had to the diminution of alms; for these being naturally very uncertain, there exists only an accidental damage.[16807] They adduce in proof the decision 745, adding with Alexander: One should not on account of an imaginary diminution of alms hinder a public work of public utility.[16808]

Still, it is true, that Pignatelli is of a contrary opinion, as he brings forward a decision of the Rota; but there was question of building a new monastery with all its immunities and privileges, especially the privilege of saying Mass before the parochial Mass had been said.

The decision was given in this sense on account of the proximity of the two churches; and Don Andrea was told at Salerno that this practice obtained in France where affairs are regulated in a different manner.

If you still desire texts, I will send them to you afterwards.

It is very necessary at this juncture to be as careful as possible not to offend the bishop or the vicar. I say, as careful as possible, for it would be folly to lose their favor at present. Try then to obtain justice more by love than by fear.

With regard to appeals, it is necessary to ponder that point well, otherwise we should give offence to the bishop.

If there even be a contrary decree of Nihil innovare [no innovation], one may have recourse to Contrario Imperio [contrary judgment], Reclamazione [counter claims], etc. Then in case of extreme necessity recourse may be had to the power of appeal.

If I find a good opportunity, I will send you the authentic Act.[16809]

May Jesus and Mary bless us all. Live Jesus and Mary!

Try to collect as many proofs as you can, showing the great number of Masses. You will see that our adversaries will try to make capital out of the decrease in the number of Masses and in the concourse of the people, basing their arguments on Pignatelli, etc., as in the decision given above.

Then you must come out boldly with Passerini, Rotario, and the decision of Farinaccio, quoted by the latter.

You can reply in regard to the decision of Pignatelli that there existed particular circumstances, and that, moreover, there was question of a new monastery with its immunities and privileges.

Moreover, Passerini says that the Bull of Pope Gregory [XV.] without regard to the diminution of alms, requires only that no positive wrong should be done to those that had established themselves before.

If it be in any way possible, do not mention Pignatelli.

Remember that a Nihil innovetur[16810] [prohibition to do anything new] would not at present prevent us from building, as the request was to the effect that the blessing of the church should be impeded.

I do not as yet send the report[16811] of the blessing, because the bearer is a mere boy. I shall wait for a better opportunity. Live Jesus and Mary!

Do not forget the man who wished to give three hundred ducats; he should begin to give something as soon as possible. You have to work hard; for it is necessary that the work on the church be hastened; Don Xavier [Rossi] torments me, as he finds himself very much embarrassed; he does not know where to borrow more money. Live Jesus and Mary!

Your brother and servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

Letter 58

TO NICOLA MARIA CELESTINO DE ROBERTIS.[16812]

Exhortation to correspond at once to God's call.

Praised be the Most Blessed Sacrament, and Mary Immaculate![16813]

CIORANI, March 15, 1744.

Having had knowledge of your good resolution or rather inclination as to your vocation, I have been astonished that you have communicated it to others and not to me whom as the Superior it concerned principally. It has also been the cause of no little regret that you have been advised to wait a long time before you follow your vocation, as this would expose you to the great danger of losing it. For in matters of this kind when the devil is not able to divert one entirely from carrying out a good design, he nevertheless aims at inducing one to defer it. He has then succeeded many a time in making one lose the best vocation.

After what I have heard, your vocation in view of the circumstances appears to me as evidently to have come from God. It is, therefore, certain that your salvation depends on your fidelity in following it. Hence I wish you to come as soon as possible to have an interview with me, as I hope to be able to shorten your road considerably, provided you persevere in the good sentiments you now exhibit. As soon as you have decided on the course you wish to pursue, there will not be wanting to you such facilities as will aid you to come to me by visiting some place in the neighborhood, by offering as pretext that you wish to speak about some scruple of conscience, or by saying that you wish to make a day's retreat. You are old enough and you possess common sense; you will surely find some way of coming to see me. You also know that in such cases when there is question of obeying the voice of God one must be courageous and do violence to one's self, and that it does not matter whether or not we displease our relatives, provided only we please God and secure the salvation of our souls.

I fear that my letter may be of no benefit to you, since having been advised to put off for a long time the step you intended to take, you have either changed your mind or you have allowed your fervor to cool. This will not matter, as my letter will at least recall to your mind the voice which Jesus Christ has made you hear, telling you that you should belong entirely to him, or these lines will enable you to perceive the desire I have to confirm you in your resolution. Moreover, if you cannot come at once, please send an answer to me in the same way that I shall employ in forwarding this letter to you, in order that I may learn whether you still persevere in your sentiments and whether I may not assist you according to my power. In the meantime I beg you again to recommend yourself in this matter to Jesus Christ in your holy Communions and in your daily prayers; for I have confidence that you have not given up the practice of prayer. If you have, however, omitted prayer you must again devote yourself to it with renewed fervor, especially in order that you may succeed in carrying out your design. Begin, besides, a novena in honor of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin that she may inspire you to do what will be conducive to your eternal salvation, and what will console you most at the hour of death.

I do not doubt that you will favorably receive this letter which gives testimony of the esteem in which I hold you personally, and of the great desire I have of seeing you belong entirely to God. I earnestly recommend to you to keep secret this letter and your vocation from every one, whoever he may be; because when such things are once manifested, the devil always finds means of opposing you or at least of cooling your ardor by beginning himself to talk by the mouth of others. O how many have lost their vocation in this way! God grant that you may not also relax in your fervor!

What I have written must suffice for the present. I depend upon receiving an answer from you as soon as possible. Should you be at Naples or at Sieti, you will please inform me which is the surest way to write to you and to answer you, and in which place at Naples I may address an answer to you when you write to me. Yet I would rather have you come yourself. Let this be enough! Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa! I remain

Your very devoted and very grateful servant,

Letter 59

TO THE SAME

He invites him to an interview.—Means that he should use not to lose his vocation.

Praised be the Most Holy Sacrament, and Mary Immaculate!

CIORANI, April 7, 1744.

Just this morning I received your esteemed favor, and I am happy to hear that up to the present time you have preserved the good sentiments with which you were inspired during the retreat. Had you spoken to me at that time, you would now perhaps have already left Egypt. It would be useless for me to say more; for in order to use the shortest way in this matter, we must have absolutely a personal interview.

We expect that by Saturday the passage of the Spaniards[16814] will be over. I therefore expect you here without fail during the following week. Come on some pretext or other by way of Salerno.

I see that your resolution is as firm as ever; it is, therefore, evident to me that your vocation comes from God. For this reason if you do not now follow it, you will have to fear a great chastisement; for the Lord punishes severely those that despise these extraordinary graces,—graces that are too precious to be given to everyone.

When therefore you receive this letter, you must again give yourself entirely to God, putting yourself wholly into his hands, and showing your readiness to do all that I may counsel you. Then you must come with the firm resolution of entirely submitting your will to mine, as well in regard to the substance of your vocation, as also in regard to the manner and the time of carrying it out. This determination is necessary for you in order to realize so important a resolution; otherwise you would furnish the devil with the means either to disquiet you for the future or to make you delay so long till you lose your vocation, as has happened to so many others. Come, therefore, as soon as possible; do not lose a moment. You will not be the first that has been admitted here as a secular without having yet received any of the Holy Orders, provided only the requisite conditions are at hand, together with the firm will of belonging entirely to God. A few days ago there were received among us several young persons who left their homes without saying anything to their parents of what they intended to do. We are by no means obliged to manifest to them such a vocation, because by such a communication we run the risk of losing our vocation, and without the special assistance of God our eternal salvation.

Tread, therefore, under-foot all tender affections for your parents, and become courageous. God calls you not to some earthly dignity, but he calls you to the great dignity of being a saint. You must know how to respond to this appeal, and you will soon see how the Lord, who is so generous and so faithful, will favor you with new graces, which he has already prepared for you. Courage, then! consider that for this God who is so worthy of being loved, and who has done so much for our souls, all that we can do, even the sacrifice of our lives, is indeed very little. Endeavor to take generously this step on which depend both your predestination and the plenitude of the favors that God has reserved for you in time and in eternity.

Here are a few things that I wish you to observe during the days that will elapse before you come: Do not cease to recommend this matter to God either before the Blessed Sacrament or before the crucifix in your room. Endeavor to avoid all conversation, and spend as much as possible all your time in spiritual reading and in prayer. Receive as often as possible holy Communion, for you need special strength in order to remove the obstacles that hell will put in your way. God only can give you this strength. If it happens that your resolution should grow a little weak, have recourse at once to the Blessed Virgin, and say to her: O Mary Immaculate! do not abandon me; obtain for me the grace to remain faithful to God.—Then address the following words to God: O Lord! I no longer belong to myself; I have given myself entirely to Thee; give me the needed strength.—If you act thus you will always surely gain the victory.

I hope that you will with pleasure learn from this letter the desire that I have of seeing you a saint and belonging entirely to God; and on your part, you must pray to Jesus Christ to make me what I wish you to be. I close this letter by informing you that my companions as well as myself are impatiently waiting for you. I am, etc.—Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Recommend yourself to St. Stanislas Kostka that he may obtain for you the strength to correspond to your vocation as he did. Live Jesus and Mary!

In order that this letter may arrive without delay I shall send it to Sieti. If you have not time to answer it, it will not matter. I shall be satisfied if you only receive my letter, and if you come to us with the same sentiments that you have expressed in your letter. Live Jesus and Mary!

Your very devoted and very humble servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

Rector Major.

TO CANON GIUSEPPE SPARANO, AT S. RESTITUTA AT NAPLES

He sends him a sketch of the life of the Venerable Gennaro Maria Sarnelli to have it printed.

Praised be the Most Blessed Sacrament and Mary Immaculate!

CIORANI, July 17, 1744.

Very Reverend and Dear Sir: Canon Sersale[16815] has requested me to write the biography of Don Gennaro of happy memory, and mentioned to me that the Congregation[16816] wished to have it printed together with the biography of Carace.[16817] I have already written it, and have sent it to Canon Rosa, the Father Superior. Sersale told me that you would take care of the rest; I therefore beg you to make corrections in the manuscript as appears best to you, and especially to correct the mistakes that may be found therein; for I had one of our lay-brothers to copy it, and the time for the courier to start is at hand and I cannot revise it. What I ask of you particularly is to urge the gentlemen of the Congregation to have the work printed. This is properly our duty, but God knows how poor we are and if Don Gennaro has left us his books, it is at the price of many legal encumbrances and expenses to us. I know that your Reverence has great influence; I earnestly entreat you to do whatever you can. This publication will not only serve to increase the honor of the Congregation, but it will be of great profit to many readers. Your Reverence loved Sarnelli when he was living; you should love him more after his death, since he died a saint. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa! Wishing you to send me an answer and to recommend me to Jesus Christ, I remain with profound respect,

Your very grateful and very devoted servant,
ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,
of the Most Holy Saviour.

Letter 61

TO THE SAME

He sends him the manuscript of the little book entitled Visits to the Blessed Sacrament and to the Blessed Virgin, and asks him to revise it.

Praised be the Most Holy Sacrament and Mary Immaculate!

CIORANI, August 10, 1744.

My dear Canon: I have requested Canon Torni to entrust the revision of this little book on the Blessed Sacrament and the Blessed Virgin to none but yourself, being confident that you would soon attend to this matter. I therefore beg you to lay aside everything else so as to finish the task, because a pious layman has promised to pay for the printing and I fear that if there is a delay the money destined for this purpose will be spent; and then there will be no more question of having the book printed. I believe that the little book will be very useful for those that wish to make a visit to the Most Blessed Sacrament and to the Blessed Virgin, and I must say that I have seen nothing like it, and this was the reason why I composed it.

I, moreover, entrusted it to your Reverence because it was badly copied, and I was so hurried that I could not have it again copied. You will have the patience to read it as it is. I shall say no more, and I hope that you will render me this service promptly. As for the visits that are still wanting, I will send them afterwards, because I am anxious that the printing of the book should soon begin; because that pious layman is so much interested in the matter. As to yourself, you will have to receive your pay from Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament and from the Blessed Virgin. I have written it in a very simple style. Your Reverence will please make the corrections that shall appear to you to be necessary, but do not trouble yourself about too much elegance.

I have sent you the biography of Sarnelli [Venerable Gennaro]. Recommend me to Jesus Christ; and tell the bearer of my letter on what day he may return to deliver the manuscript to be printed. Perhaps the royal approbation is not needed for this little book; but if it should be required, tell the printer to see that it be procured.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa! Believe me,

Your very devoted, very humble,

and very grateful servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

TO A MINISTER OF THE KING

A petition asking for his protection in favor of the house at Nocera (Pagani).

[1744.]

Your Excellency: Alfonso de Liguori and Cesare Sportelli, who with other priests are united in mutual cha rity, humbly represent to your Excellency the following facts:

Monsignor de Dominicis, Bishop of Nocera, having represented to his Majesty (may God preserve him!) that he had succeeded in introducing into his diocese the suppliants to labor for the salvation of souls, supplicated his Majesty to grant to the same priests the power of building a house and a public chapel, near Pagani at some distance from the city. His royal piety agreed to this project, and was moved to give his consent by issuing the subjoined copy of a royal decree. In the execution of the most revered orders of his Majesty those priests began in the past year, to build and have at present finished the said chapel and house, having in view the good of the diocese, and conforming themselves in everything to the instructions given. But evil-disposed persons are trying, we are told, to molest and to disturb them in their holy exercises, exhortations, sermons, and other spiritual works; they act against the orders given by his Majesty, as appears from the subjoined copy of the royal ordinance directed to the governor of Nocera.

The undersigned therefore, have recourse to your Excellency, and beg you to give orders that we may be no longer molested nor disquieted in regard to the before-mentioned house. Their request is so well-founded that the neighboring hamlets, containing about twenty-five thousand souls, are anxious to receive spiritual help, as may be seen from the annexed testimony of all the municipalities of Nocera united.[16818] And for this favor which you will grant them they will pray that God may reward you.

Letter 63

TO A GENTLEMAN OF INFLUENCE

Another petition in favor of the same house at Nocera (Pagani).

[1744.]

In the year 1732, Alfonso de Liguori, a priest and Neapolitan patrician, and other secular priests began to live together in Community in the diocese of Scala by the authority of the bishop and under the direction of Monsignor Falcoia, Bishop of Castellammare (of happy memory). Their principal aim was by missions and by preaching in their own church to devote themselves to the spiritual good of the people in the country, who usually are the most needy and mostly deprived of spiritual help. In the year 1736 they proceeded to the diocese of Salerno where, in a place called Ciorani, by the authority of Monsignor Fabrizio di Capua, at that time archbishop of Salerno, they built a house and a church whence the above-mentioned priests constantly went forth to give missions, not only in the said diocese but in many other dioceses, and whither to make the spiritual exercises the Ordinary always sends his clergy and those that are to be ordained either at the time of an ordination, or at other times during the year. For this reason the present Bishop of Nocera called the said priests into his diocese, assigning to them a small house and church in a place called Pagani. Here with the royal consent as well as with that of the citizens, they built a little church and a residence for their own use. In this city and diocese they consecrate themselves to the service of souls by preaching, by hearing confessions, by giving missions and other spiritual exercises, as may be learned from the above-mentioned bishop. Now some sons of iniquity, moved by various pretexts, are trying to hinder the aforesaid exercises, so necessary for the salvation of souls, and are striving by cunning and violence to drive away those priests from the above-mentioned place. This being against all reason and against natural and divine right, the petitioners have recourse to your eminent piety, zeal and protection, so that you may defend not only the cause of the said priests, but the honor of God and the salvation of souls.

TO CANON CASATI,[16819] AT ILICETO

He announces to him his approaching arrival.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph!

NAPLES, November 28, 1744.

Very Reverend and Dear Sir: Through Signor Andrea Calvini I have been informed of the very pious desire entertained by your Reverence. I am going to give a mission at Iliceto about the 11th or 12th of next month by request of the prince.[16820] I therefore do not say more, because we shall speak of everything when we meet. In the meantime, I devote myself entirely to your service, and beg you to recommend me to Jesus Christ! Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph! I remain,

Your very devoted and very humble servant,

Letter 65

TO FATHER XAVIER ROSSI,[16821] AT CIORANI

Details in regard to the new foundation at Iliceto.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

SANTA MARIA DELLA CONSOLAZIONE] December 19, 1744.

Let us thank Jesus and Mary for having deigned to conclude the founding of the new house, Santa Maria della Consolazione, within a space of eight days. Canon Casati made out this morning the donation inter vivos [among the living] putting us also in possession of the property that he gives us. The Bishop [of Bovino, the Venerable Antonio Lucci], has already ceded the place to us; and the Chapter, which here represents the parish priest, has given its consent together with the municipality.

The revenues from the donations given us amount to about three hundred ducats, in return for which we must say two Masses daily. We have also a fine apartment, suitable for a library, and the faculty of employing the revenues of this donation to establish two patrimonies for the members of our Institute.

The property that we have received consists of more than seven hundred acres of arable land, of a vineyard, and of some houses together with a grove of olive trees.

Moreover, Canon Maffei has promised us a free benefice with an annual income of twenty-two ducats.

Thus the house of our Lady has an income of about thirty ducats, and if at least a part of the soil be worked under the superintendence of a Brother, it might yield six hundred ducats. This would moreover not be inconvenient, as the property lies close to the house.

We were received here by all, by the bishop, by priests and by laymen as angels from Paradise; they continually thank Jesus Christ for our arrival. Canon Maffei in particular is overjoyed. There is therefore every hope that the Prince [of Castellaneta] on his arrival will assure us an annual income. I do not speak of a well-founded hope of having a fine revenue of three hundred ducats a year furnished by the inhabitants of the Abbruzzi.

The people here are very affectionate and docile; there are few houses of middle rank; nearly all are country people; they are inclined to be pious; few sins are committed.

The country is fertile and produces everything: wood, wheat, grain, vegetables, good wines, excellent cheese, and an abundance of good fruit. Here are cows, sheep, and goats, and a kind of cheese, the like of which I have never before tasted. The air is very good and very mild. In our place there is water that might be called water from Paradise, together with a fountain of the Madonna; surrounding the latter is a little fish-pond, by which we can always water our garden and keep it clad in bright verdure.

The founder has reserved to himself the usufruct of the property, but he has promised us fifty-six ducats a year on condition that we say a Mass daily. Then there are the benefice of Maffei and the profits accruing from the land of the Madonna. It is certain that you will have to live in the meantime on slender means. But God is ever near to assist us. Go on cheerfully. We shall always be beggars in this life.

Before the mission of Modugno, I shall go to Foggia to speak to the President and to the Bishop[16822] of Foggia to obtain permission to give a course of missions to the inhabitants of the Abbruzzi, for I have this very much at heart. I have been informed that the President expects us.

As for the missions at Mirabella, about which I wrote to you, I have learned that it will not be necessary to go there as the bishop is sending the Pious Workers who are at present giving a mission at Buellino. Don Andrea [Villani] and Don Cesare [Sportelli] can then devote themselves entirely to the missions that are given in this place.

Send thither Don Bernardo [Tortora], Don Ignazio[16823] and Brother Romoaldo with two measures of chestnuts and one measure of walnuts. They may take the mules of Bracigliano.

I am thinking of taking up my residence then in the house of the Madonna, at least for some time, until affairs are in order. Don Andrea is to be for the present Rector and Master of novices at Ciorani, and your Reverence, Minister and Econome. Have a little patience while there, for in a short time you have to be at Iliceto. As soon as matters are settled at Nocera—if God wishes to have them settled—Don Cesare, in compliance with the letter which I have written to him, will go as Minister to Iliceto, and Don Giovanni [Mazzini] will remain at Pagani as Rector; Don Carmine [Fiocchi] and Don Paolino [Scibelli] will also proceed thither. Don Lorenzo [d' Antonio] with Don Paolo [Cafaro] will go to Ciorani. It will be necessary for Don Paolo to remain here for some months; for he has won a great name here.

All with the exception of Don Lorenzo and Don Paolo will begin on the 1st of January to apply the intentions of the Masses for this house. This new foundation is beginning under the beautiful standard of holy poverty. All of us have already said a Mass for the house.

Let the secretary at Nocera preserve this letter. Tell Don Gaetano di Caro,[16824] that if he will be so kind as to assist us this Lent during the missions to be given to the people of the Abbruzzi, he will do us a very great favor.

Don Cesare writes me that Don Paolo will send him as soon as you ask for him.

May Jesus Christ bless us all! Pray for me constantly. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Send the plans also to Nocera. Live Jesus!

According to what the courier says, the Fathers can set out Saturday morning and arrive there Sunday evening.

Please send at once to the hamlets the enclosed letter of Signor Calvini.

Your humble servant and brother,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

Letter 66

TO FATHER CESARE SPORTELLI, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT PAGANI

Project of abandoning the foundation at Pagani.—Service asked for Iliceto.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

ILICETO, December 28, 1744.

I have received your very kind favor as well as the expression of your devoted attachment. At the beginning you write to me about making peace, etc., and the obstinacy of Don Francesco;[16825] but you say nothing of the last letter that I sent you in which I wrote you about giving up Pagani. We could, I said to you, abandon this house on the two following conditions: that Don Francesco becomes responsible for all the debts, and that before renouncing the donation the permission of the king and of the bishop of the city should be asked; in this way we should always be able to excuse ourselves if we do not relinquish our right. On the other hand, this negotiation appears to me to be necessary in order that we may free ourselves from the many disquietudes and come to a definite conclusion; for if things do not become quiet in some way, I should hardly think that God wishes any longer this foundation, which has become so troublesome and inconvenient to the Congregation. It is true, God has made us see wonderful things; but has perhaps had designs other than ours. I also write you that if in this matter you should meet with any difficulties you should propose them to me, and that we were not pressed to hurry the matter. Again, I beg you to write to me about your difficulties if you have any, or to carry out wholly or in part what I have expressed in my letter, since the same thought never leaves me.

I have, moreover, written to you that if the foundation is to be abandoned, it will be necessary that you should continue to assist me at least until affairs have become more quiet.

Here things continue to prosper; but as to the missions among the people of the Abbruzzi, the devil has begun to make efforts to hinder them. There are so far ninety thousand abandoned souls, but O God, how abandoned are they! If I had been able without detriment to the missions to free myself from the missions at Modugno,[16826] I would have arranged for the harvesting of this great crop, that is, the missions among the inhabitants of the Abbruzzi. But it did not seem to me to be proper to omit that mission at present after having made an arrangement in regard to it with the Archbishop [of Bari], the archpriest and the clergy. But on the other hand, by going to Modugno I cannot for a greater reason neglect the missions begun in the Abbruzzi, and therefore I have sent for Father Andrea [Villani] and Gaetano [di Caro] or Father Paolino [Scibelli] if Don Gaetano cannot come; because afterwards Father Andrea and another, with Father Lorenzo [d' Antonio], I think, will return here after we come back from Modugno.

I have not resolved to remain permanently in this house. When God wills, I shall return to Ciorani. But it appears to me to be necessary that I should not depart from this place for a considerable time, because there are very many weighty things to be adjusted.

I continue to write by another hand, because I am sick in bed with bronchial catarrh and fever. Here the good that can be done under the present circumstances is immense; more so than at Nocera and Ciorani. I omit writing to you everything. But when you come here, God willing, you will obtain every information. There is question of an extreme necessity.

I had hoped that the Prince of Castellaneta would come here to arrange about the annual support of this house; but our Lord has not wished that he should come. Hence it became necessary for me to write to him the enclosed letter telling him how things stood. Your Reverence may read it and then seal it. But it will also be necessary for you to go to Naples to speak to him and to give him my letter, because more can always be done by word of mouth, and the prince will always have less courage to refuse when he is face to face with you than when he writes you a letter. There is no remedy: we must strike the iron when it is hot; because if we allow the matter to grow cold it may perhaps become afterwards a difficult thing to obtain anything from the prince. But now it would be well to procure from the prince a hundred and fifty or a hundred scudi annually, to be derived from the income of the estate. Hence your Reverence should try to speak a few words with the prince; you will know how to do so. It will be necessary that on account of this matter you should lay aside everything else, because if a mistake is made now, nothing more can be done. Your Reverence, therefore, will please promptly finish the little mission, which is perhaps now on your hands, and go at once to Naples to speak to Castellaneta; because I am in hopes that after you have spoken to him he will I think write at once to Iliceto. Here the agent and Canon Maffei will give relief to our little vessel, and some good may be accomplished before the prince sets out with his regiment; this may easily happen in the midst of the political turmoil that now exists.

Depart then, dear Father; perpetual works should have the preference before those that are temporal. May your Reverence have patience, and may you take upon yourself this inconvenience for the love of the Most Blessed Virgin.

I embrace all in Jesus Christ. I have written to Ciorani that they should send to you the letters that I have written to this house. Read them and have them read.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

Don Bernardo [Tortora] and Don Ignazio arrived here on Monday afternoon about three o'clock, covered with snow from head to foot.

Your servant and brother,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

[P. S.] I inform your Reverence that after receiving this letter you should wait another week and then go to Castellaneta; because within this time I am anxious that he should receive a letter of mine which I sent him beforehand through Oliviero.[16827] Castellaneta's address is: Quarter of anime del Purgatorio, at the palace of the Duchess of Pesche.

TO SISTER MARIA GIOVANNA DELLA CROCE

He exhorts her to give to prayer all the time that she can snatch from her occupations.

Praised be the Most Blessed Sacrament, and Mary Immaculate!

ILICETO, S. MARIA DELLA CONSOLAZIONE, April 14, [1745].

My dear daughter: I am at present at Iliceto, in a new house that we have just established, and that is two days' journey from Ciorani. I have received here no other letter than the one that was probably the last that you addressed to me.

I know not the answer that Mgr. di Caiazzo has given to you; but I can well imagine it; I beg you therefore to be undisturbed.

That ray that has enlightened you in your jubilee confession I truly regard as a ray of light sent by God himself in order to give you a little strength to endure storms.

Since you have to give yourself up to the occupations of your employment, do so, and snatch all the time that you can for prayer, which is an occupation that will always be profitable to you. Recommend me without ceasing to Jesus and to Mary. Live Jesus and Mary. I remain,

Your very affectionate Father,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

[P. S.] To conclude, quieting you, you might answer Mgr. di Caiazzo that the five thousand ducats are destined for the good work; then think no more about it.

As to the widow, I have recommended her to Jesus. Tell her that Jesus wishes to have her entirely for himself; this is the reason why he has taken her son from her. Let her never omit to offer up to God this sacrifice, and give herself entirely to Jesus. Live Jesus and Mary!

As for the letters, send them to Ciorani. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 68

TO THE SOVEREIGN PONTIFF BENEDICT XIV

Petition to obtain the confirmation of the establishment of missionaries at Iliceto.

[May 3, 1745.]

Most Holy Father: Alfonso de Liguori, united with many other priests in the bond of mutual and fraternal charity, and prostrate at the feet of your Holiness expresses the following facts:

The undersigned having, in 1744, proceeded to the village of Puglia, that is to a place called Iliceto, in the diocese of Bovino, to give a mission there, the people and the venerable Chapter of this place requested him to labor among them in behalf of the many abandoned souls. To accomplish this they wished him and his companions to take up their abode in the convent of Santa Maria della Consolazione, situated upon a mountain, and at one time inhabited by Count D. Giovanni Appiani. He most willingly accepted the offer, since thereby there was opened to him a more convenient road to extend his labors through the Puglia, and to give assistance with the divine word and the administration of the sacraments to so many poor abandoned people, and among them to fifty or sixty thousand shepherds, who were absolutely deprived of all spiritual help. The acceptance of this foundation, moreover, makes it convenient for him to go about in the neighboring dioceses, as he has done and is doing at present in so many other dioceses, where the missions produce the most salutary fruits for the reform of morals, to the greatest satisfaction of the inhabitants.

This state of things being known to our most zealous Bishop of Bovino, Mgr. Lucci, he deigned by an ordinance issued in the said year 1744, to grant to the petitioner the permission to reside in said place to the great delight as well as with the express consent of all the people and of the venerable Chapter of Iliceto. And since now the petitioner desires from your Holiness, who is so great a lover and promoter of this work which gives so much glory to Jesus Christ, a confirmation of said place of Santa Maria della Consolazione, he therefore most humbly supplicates your Holiness for this favor, being satisfied that your Holiness will be rewarded by Jesus Christ and the Blessed Virgin, for the love of whom he asks it, and promising to pray and have the people to pray always more and more for the exaltation of the Church and for the welfare of the government of your Holiness.

Letter 69

TO FATHER GIOVANNI MAZZINI, THE NEW RECTOR AT PAGANI.[16828]

He begs him to put in force regular observance.

Live Jesus and Mary!

S. MARIA [DELLA CONSOLAZIONE], September 23, [1745].

I beg your Reverence, who are now in charge of this house, to introduce into it the faithful observance of the Rule. This regular observance has been hitherto very difficult on account of the condition of the place in which you live and on account of the law-suits that had to be carried on. Now, however, everything should be set in order, for otherwise the non-observance of the Rule will grow into a custom, and then it will be very difficult to bring the subjects back to a sense of their duty. I therefore charge your conscience with the care of this matter, since being at a distance I can not see nor know everything that is going on. Before God the Congregation will prosper so long as the Rule is observed and the subjects are solicitous about their own sanctification; for when inobservance is once introduced, all will end in smoke. We have now, thanks be to God! three houses and a sufficient number of subjects to attend to the work of the Institute. All that we have to do now is to do the will of God, and to labor earnestly at our own perfection; for then the Congregation will prosper, the number of subjects will increase, and much will be accomplished for the glory of God. If we do not effect this, God will abandon us and everything will go to ruin. Communicate, I beg you, these lines to all the Fathers. I embrace them all, conjuring them, to recommend me to Jesus and Mary. Live Jesus and Mary!

At the evening prayers recommend to the Blessed Virgin the missions that we are to give during this year, especially at Foggia and in the diocese of Troia. I remain, etc.—Live Jesus and Mary! I salute D. Biase [Biagio Amarante], etc.; send me the names, etc. Live Jesus and Mary!

Your brother in Jesus,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

TO CARDINAL GIUSEPPE SPINELLI, ARCHBISHOP OF NAPLES

Petition to obtain the faculties needed for the missions.[16829]

[December, 1745.]

Most Eminent and Most Reverend Sir: Alfonso de Liguori, Superior of the missionaries of the Congregation of the Most Holy Saviour, established at Iliceto, suppliantly declares to your Eminence that, being actually engaged in giving the exercises of a mission in the diocese of Troia, and having thence to go to the diocese of Cirignola, for the greater promotion of the glory of God and the sanctification of souls, he desires to be provided with the faculties and the indulgences that for this purpose have been granted to your Eminence by his Holiness, submitting himself always to the will of your Eminence; and if you deign to grant the favor that he asks, he will pray to God to reward you.

To this petition the Cardinal gave the following answer:

The better to secure the fruits of the holy missions and thus to promote the salvation of souls, we welcome your petition and we grant you, the Superior of the Congregation of the Most Holy Saviour, established at Iliceto, the powers that our most holy Pope Benedict XIV. has granted and communicated to us, by delegation to us especially as the supreme Director of the missions in the kingdom of Naples. But we desire you to use these powers only for the missions mentioned in the petition, in the exercises of the holy ministry, in the confessional, and by yourself and during the time of the missions only.

Wishing also to favor the piety and increase the devotion of the people, we grant the indulgences of which His Holiness the Pope has made us the dispenser, and willingly concede the seven years and seven times forty days to the faithful of both sexes who attend the missions in any city or place in the kingdom of Naples, or who not being able to attend them, on account of some lawful impediment, pray to God piously for the success of these exercises.

Moreover, to all the faithful who, truly penitent, having confessed and communicated, attend on the last day of the mission, or who lawfully hindered to do so, pray to God, as we have said, after having received the sacraments of penance and Eucharist, we grant a plenary indulgence and the remission of all their sins, available however only for the missions indicated in the petition.

Given at Naples, in our archiepiscopal palace, the 11th of the month of December, 1745.

JOSEPH Cardinal, Archbishop.

TO THE MOTHER ABBESS AND THE NUNS OF THE MONASTERY OF THE ANNUNCIATION AT FOGGIA

Explanations relative to the use of figured music[16831] and to the expenses contrary to poverty.

[Beginning of the year 1746.]

Live Jesus and Mary!

Very Reverend Mother Abbess and dear Sisters: Having had the honor, without any merit on our part, to give the spiritual exercises [16832] to your pious Community, we have heard that some of our assertions have been misunderstood and wrongly interpreted. For the honor of truth and to satisfy our conscience we have thought it proper to indicate here what we have said about figured music and about the special expenses incurred by the officials.

As for figured music, we say that it is by no means suitable for pious persons, and much less for virgins consecrated to God, as appears from the Rules of all saintly religious Orders; and if such a practice exists in any monastery, it is usually condemned as an abuse. If, then, we consider the circumstances that accompany it, we see that it is morally impossible to practise this kind of music without sin on account of the solicitude, the vanity, the distractions, the expense, the infractions of the Rule, and other disorders that inevitably result from it both inside and outside of the monastery. The fault is more or less grave according to the disorders that arise therefrom. According to what has been generally reported in Foggia and outside of it, the disorders that have occurred are not inconsiderable.

As for the expenses incurred by the officials,[16833] we have said that the letter of the Sacred Congregation of January 26, 1742, written by order of His Holiness to the Ordinaries, contains and expresses a formal prohibition for all religious in office to expend the least amount of money or to make the least present on feast days or in the discharge of their duties, whether in the monastery or out of it. The words of the letter are as follows: "His Holiness commands that this be inviolably observed by every monastery, even though it be exempt, etc., under pain, in case of infringement, of deprivation of office and of the power of voting and being voted for, to be incurred as soon as the deed is committed." Consequently His Holiness enjoins upon all the bishops "to impose, by a formal precept of obedience, upon all the officials, the observance of this ordinance, to assure themselves of its exact observance, and to report to him what has been done."

Also, on April 27, 1742, the bishop acting as the apostolic delegate for executing the holy and paternal ordinances of His Holiness according to the terms of his letter, prescribed the observance of them by a formal precept of obedience, with this explanation, that the above-mentioned penalties, if ever incurred, would last not according to his pleasure, since he is only the executor, but at the pleasure of the Sacred Congregation, as the Sovereign Pontiff expressly ordains.

After decisions so precise, we have said that the officials are obliged to conform to the orders of His Holiness under the penalty of a grievous sin. As it was objected that the Community could not make all the necessary outlay, and that there was not sufficient revenues to supply it, as has been prescribed by His Holiness, in the conference which we gave on the subject, we answered as follows: "In view of these circumstances it is necessary to report to the Sacred Congregation, and in the meantime, supposing that the before-mentioned expenses could suffer no delay on account of the current wants of the monastery, we putting a mild interpretation on the ordinance of His Holiness (for as there is here question of an interpretation, it should be made in a very strict sense), we may strictly permit the officials to make the necessary outlay, but not a superfluous one, as had been too often made in the past." To all this one could allege nothing else than the established usage. We replied that as to the past, good faith could furnish an excuse, yet for the present, since the matter has been made clearer, this practice can no longer be tolerated without sin, nor even without a grievous sin.

This we have uniformly said; besides, we do not presume to enforce our opinions, nor to set ourselves up as teachers. We have only spoken in order to relieve our conscience by rendering the obedience that is due to the Vicar of Jesus Christ.

Letter 72

TO HIS BROTHER D. ERCOLE DE LIGUORI

He complains to him about his conduct, which was anything but brotherly, in regard to certain temporal interests.

[February, 1746.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I have read your last letter in which you say in substance that when I am in distress you will help me.

My dear Brother, this is not the way to arrange the matter, but it is to force on a litigation; and I tell you again that I do not wish to litigate, and I could do so because I am claiming what belongs to me. Rest assured that I should hardly appear in court when it would assign to me the one hundred and fifty ducats with the rest of the money.

If at least you had said to me: I wish, dear Brother, that you would give up your right to such a sum. But to seek to bring forward reasons, and to say that the hundred and fifty ducats do not concern me, is very bad treatment on your part.

The two hundred ducats were given me by a legacy; what have they then to do with the portion that my father[16834] has also bequeathed to me in the last disposition of his property? Besides, the two hundred ducats he did not leave to me, but to the Congregation, namely, one hundred for the building at Ciorani, and a hundred which I might dispose of; and then as to the two hundred ducats, according to you my father meant that I should renounce my life-interest of one hundred and fifty ducats and be content with forty-two ducats! What have the two hundred ducats to do with all this? They arise from a legacy, and the one hundred and fifty were assured me by an anterior notarial act. Add to this that in making the bequest my late father did not mention anything about the rest.

You, moreover, tell me that I have not declared that I wished to have the one hundred and fifty ducats.—What obligation is there for me to make a declaration when I am in possession of the notarial act? I have always firmly believed that at the death of my father the one hundred and fifty ducats were due to me, and I firmly believed that you would give them to me. And this payment I always held to be assured, nor did I ever think that you could refuse it to me. Now that I am reading your letters I do nothing but make signs of the cross, and I offer to God what you write to me and the way in which you treat me.

You come out so boldly because you have to deal with me. If you had to deal with D. Gennaro Sarnelli who went to law with his own father and made him give up to him his portion, or with the sisters Marianna and Maria Louisa who in regard to our father had recourse to judiciary measures, you would not have spoken thus.

But I have waited and have borne with this up to the present time in order not to cause you any displeasure. You will however in the end force me to do what is so disagreeable to me.

You write to me that when I am in need and really in want of money and in great distress, you will not neglect me. My dear D. Ercole, is this the way that you should treat me? In what manner, then, should I persuade you that I am in such necessity, that I am, as you say, in great distress? How in future am I to prove to you whether or not my difficulties are serious? You have already disbelieved me, since you have not believed what I have written to you. How can I think that you will believe me hereafter? This is the treatment inflicted not by a brother, but by a barbarian, by an enemy. You really wish to make game of me. Your letter has so disturbed me that I have not been able to sleep. Alas! that then only I should have what belongs to me when I am in want and in great straits, so that for the future we should always have to quarrel with each other!

Now, my dear Brother, if you do not really desire to litigate, and if you do not wish to treat me as a bastard, tell me, finally, what you will assign to me every year so that I may be able to make up my accounts. I beg you for the love of the Blessed Virgin Mary not to ill-treat me anymore. See how I treat you with brotherly charity and how patient I am. After that, do not complain of me if I claim all that belongs to me, that is, more than one hundred and fifty ducats; there are fifteen hundred Neapolitan ducats invested in our house and it is from my property that they have been drawn. I could make you weep, but I will not do so, since I love you.

I thought in order to satisfy you to give up to you thirty ducats a year, and finally even forty-two of the one hundred and fifty. Does this perhaps appear to you unacceptable? I repeat, as long as I can, I wish to proceed only with you in all charity. But I see that you wish only to abuse my goodness. God and the world will however justify me.

Behold now the fraternal charity of which you speak to me. Your love, to tell the truth, consists merely in prattling and in making no account of me.

Now more than ever you make me know that there is no other than God who truly loves us.

And so, my dear Brother, I again beg you for the love of the Blessed Virgin not to write to me any more in this manner; but tell me what do you wish to assign to me every year till the death of Donna Francesca and Don Domenico, as you say? For pity's sake, do not ill-treat me anymore. If you have not the two hundred ducats, it will hardly do to borrow them at interest; arrange now for me the annual assignment; this is important for both of us in order to live quietly. . . . Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph! . . .

I send the bill and the receipt. Live Jesus and Mary!

Your very affectionate brother,

ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

TO THE SAME

He exhorts him to make the spiritual exercises.

ILICETO, February 22, 1746.

. . . . Now answer me at once, and I beg you to restore peace to my mind for the love of the Blessed Virgin. All is right, and do not omit to make this week the exercises[16835] in honor of the Blessed Virgin, and approach the sacraments. I make you that concession;[16836] but I wish you to be under an obligation to serve the Congregation when your personal services are needed for any business at Naples. The persecution against us has already begun here. It will be difficult for me to go again to Naples, and God knows whether we shall again see each other. . . . . .

HOLOGRAPH TESTAMENT OF THE SAINT

[March 5, 1746.]

Live Jesus, Joseph, Mary, and Teresa!

I the undersigned, Alfonso de Liguori, declare this to be my last will after my death. Although this my will may not be invested with all the required conditions of a testament, yet it has the best possible validity for dispositions ad pias causas [for charitable purposes] without detracting from the Falcidian or Trebbellian law.[16837]

I leave the holy Mother of God and my own Mother, and through her the Congregation of the Most Holy Saviour, as my universal heiress of all the goods that belong to me, and especially of the arrearage of the annuity of one hundred and fifty ducats a year, which is due to me from my family since the month of December 1745 after the death of my father. And although I was satisfied that my brother D. Ercole, in his present straitened circumstances and until his affairs improve, should pay me only seventy-two ducats a year, yet I desire that after my death all the arrears together with the balance of the one hundred and fifty, that is seventy-eight ducats, should all revert and be paid over to the Congregation. And furthermore, I bequeath for the benefit of the same Congregation the capital of three or four hundred ducats, or as much as it is, which I reserved to myself in the renunciation[16838] that I formerly made, as appears from the writing drawn up by the hand of a notary about the year 1725. . . . at Naples. I no longer remember the name of the notary; but my brother may remember it.

And all this is to be at the disposition of the subsequent Rector Major.

At the house of S. Maria della Consolazione, March 5, 1746.

I ALFONSO DE LIGUORI dispose, as above.

CARLO RICCIARDI, witness.

GIUSEPPE BONASISSA, witness.

Moreover, I leave to the same Congregation the portion left me by my father in his last will, made in regard to the property which he owned before his death.

TO DON FRANCESCO ANTONIO RICCIARDI, ADVOCATE AT FOGGIA

Nature and advantages of renewals of missions.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

S. MARIA DELLA CONSOLAZIONE, March 30, [1746].

My dear Don Francesco Antonio: Don Paolo [Cafaro] forgot to arrange with Mgr. di Troia in regard to the time when he desired that we should go to Foggia and to Troia for the Renewal. This exercise which we are accustomed to give in the places where we have given a mission produces the most salutary fruits.

I therefore send word to you expressly to do me the charity to go personally to Monsignor and to ask him whether it is pleasing to him that I should go with one or two other companions, to Foggia for three or four days and to Troia for two or three.

As for a dwelling and beds, tell him that he need not concern himself about them, since owing to your kindness we shall remain at your house at Foggia; and at Troia we shall stay at the house of the vicar Don Camillo. Let him understand that this will be only for a few days, and he should have no fears. This will suffice; but it will be necessary for you to go to see him personally, as he will riot say no to you.

You must, however, tell him that this Renewal, or this visit to Foggia, should be given soon, before the month of May and before the hot weather. I have, thought of going there on the Sunday after Easter with one or two others, because the other companions will have to go to Orsara to give a mission there, as has been arranged by the bishop. Let me know whether or not the bishop is satisfied as to the time at which we are to go. If he however, does not wish me to go any more to Foggia, I shall be pleased; for what an amount of inconvenience would not such a journey to Foggia cost me!

Inform me whether he wishes us to go at least to Troia.

See whether he will not say, What use of having so many missions one after the other? Answer him that this is not a mission. It only serves to remind the people of the mission, of the sermons that were preached, and of their promises. By means of this Renewal of the spirit many, are confirmed in leading a good life. Many times the Renewal does more good than the mission that was given. Thus you may answer him that it is not a mission, but only a reminder, a remembrance of a mission; hence two Fathers for a few days will be sufficient.

I speak on behalf of God's glory, for in regard to my feelings I should rather have-the bishop to say no.

You would oblige me if you would wr ite to some friend at Manfredonia to find out whether any mill-stones could be had there, because we have need of some. Please send your answer to me at this place. Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary! I remain,

Your very humble and very grateful servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

[P. S.] I have thought better of the matter: Please do not arrange the time of our arrival at Foggia for the Sunday after Easter, but for the Sunday following, that is, two weeks after Easter; because on the Sunday after Easter I cannot be absent. Live Jesus and Mary![16839]

Letter 76

TO FATHER ANDREA VILLANI.[16840]

Gravity of the decision of a General Chapter.—Precautions that should necessarily be taken.

[ILICETO, October 1746.]

Live Jesus and Mary!

My dear Don Andrea: I have a little complaint to make about your Reverence. I hear that you have brought to the consideration of others the question in regard to the novitiate of the Brothers.[16841] Your Reverence, it seems to me could have spoken to me about the matter in all confidence, and knowing the affection that I bear you and the liberty that I wish to see prevail in your relations to me, you could have, I say, told me secretly your idea on this point without undertaking to have the Chapter decide that the Rector Major cannot grant a dispensation when there is question of the novitiate. This is equivalent to overthrowing absolutely the powers of the Rector Major and to destroying the principal rule traced out by our Father [Mgr. Falcoia], which wishes a government by a single head like the government of the Church.

I for my part have desired, and I do now desire, at least under present circumstances, to keep aloof, occupied in looking on others acting and serving the Congregation. As for the government, I have accepted it through obedience, and it is only obedience that makes me retain it, for with the direction of the Institute and the thousand cares continually accompanying it, I can attend but little to the care of my soul.

But if I see that harmony is going to be destroyed, I would by all means resign, promising however to serve the Congregation with the same affection with which I have served it heretofore. If in fact one wishes to destroy what is even the very foundation of the Institute and make a rule against a rule, it would be better in order to avoid so supreme a confusion that I should resign and that a Rector [Major] according to your own ideas should preside over you.

I wish you not to mention this affair, which I have written specially for you. Only Don Saverio [Rossi] may read my letter, since to save time I do not desire to write again to him these same things.

And I secretly request you to bring about as prudently as possible the speedy dissolution of the Chapter; it should be put off to a later date. The devil had indeed based great hopes on this Chapter, and it has been a special grace given to us by God that no decree has as yet been made; for if the points just mentioned had been decided, I assure you, and I can assure you, that the greatest confusion would arise. But God has prevented this evil, in the first place, because I cannot go to Ciorani with my bronchial catarrh, and because affairs so grave require necessarily my presence. Hence if ever the Chapter is to be held, it would have to be held here; now to make you all come to Iliceto at this time would produce disturbance in many things, as, for instance, in the missions, in the houses, etc. In the second place someone must go to Naples,[16842] and lastly the order of the missions must be regulated.

Besides, there is question of affairs of vast importance, involving the establishment of new rules which are to last in perpetuum [forever]. All this will require many discussions and many explanations; and now in view of all this, so far separated as we are from one another, I myself being obliged to remain here, how could we desire to come to any determination in such a confused state of things, and when the voters are not even assembled?[16843] I therefore do not intend to give my consent for the holding of this Chapter so unlawful and so irregular. I thought that only those things would be proposed about which letters had been sent to me, which indeed were matters of little importance. But there are matters in regard to which we must discuss and confer with one another. Moreover, I believed that the votes given by the living voice could all be sent hither in writing; but this was found to be impossible, as it is against the Rule, and I am opposed to it.

Hence I declare that for all these just reasons the Chapter should be dissolved, and should afterwards be assembled in due time with all the necessary and essential formalities; otherwise it would be null and void and would only serve the purpose of causing disturbance. Do not doubt that I will take care that the Chapter be held without fail, but I and all the voters must take part in it.[16844]

Your brother,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

Letter 77

TO FATHER CESARE SPORTELLI

Prudence to be used in the proceedings of the General Chapter.

Live Jesus and Mary!

ILICETO, [October, 1746.]

My dear Don Cesare: Whatever I write to you I beg you to keep secret for the present, according as it may seem to be expedient.[16845]

These gentlemen submitted to your consideration those points that concern the Rector Major, instead of proposing them in Chapter for the purpose of making decisions about things already decided and established.

It seems that they are taking away from the Rector Major the faculty of dispensation; but such a thing is contrary to all rules, because it belongs essentially to human laws to be subject to dispensation. And will it not be sometimes necessary to give a dispensation, and especially in regard to the novitiate of the Brothers and the students? . . .

This point gives me more concern than anything else, because it involves a matter of conscience . . . but so I have regarded it before God.

Moreover, with God's help and in time I hope, and perhaps shortly, I shall put the Rule in force as I have intended to do; and since this point especially creates objections, I will hereafter endeavor to be more reserved.

As to the questions proposed, some refer to things of no importance; it will be sufficient if we speak about them, there being no necessity to have capitular decisions given upon them; for a multiplicity of decrees would in its time be the ruin of the Congregation. Others have reference to points already determined by the Rule; if they are found not to be clear enough, it would be better to comment on them than to submit them to the deliberation of the Chapter.

To come back to what I have already written to you: what is necessary for the present is, that you set out for Naples in regard to the affair of Caposele. As I have explained to you, it will suffer no delay, and we shall have the remorse of having failed in this foundation, as it may happen if we delay any longer. Your stay at Naples will very likely be prolonged, for I beg you not to leave the city be fore the affair is brought to a conclusion. You must moreover write to me from Naples; for if things are protracted too long, we shall let you know what is to be done. . . .

TO THE KING OF NAPLES

Petition for founding a house at Caposele.

[1746.]

The undersigned, missionary secular priests, humbly expose to your Majesty the following facts:

Having during this year given missions in the archdiocese of Conza, they have been most urgently asked by the Most Reverend Archbishop[16846] and by the people to establish themselves in this diocese, particularly in the territory of Caposele. Here there is a church under the title of Mater Domini together with a house containing a few rooms. These priests could thus help the souls in this vast archdiocese whom the distance from Naples deprives of many spiritual aids, especially of missions.

Prostrate, therefore, at the feet of your Majesty, who are so zealous for the welfare of your vassals, they humbly supplicate you to deign to give your royal consent so that the petitioners may live together in the convent of Mater Domini, and may also enlarge the house which is at present too small. In the meantime profoundly humbling themselves before the royal throne they promise that they will always pray more and more to the divine Majesty for the happiness of your kingdom.

TO FATHER GIOVANNI MAZZINI, RECTOR AT PAGANI

Various regulations in regard to studies.

Live Jesus and Mary!

[TROIA], November 27, [1946].

I write you in all haste this Sunday morning, the last day of the mission. The concourse of the people, as well as the praise that we have received, was truly wonderful. The people say that they never had such a mission. Soli Deo, etc.

As for the promised help, I have learned that my father placed at my disposal not two hundred ducats, as I thought, but only one hundred. Hence fifty ducats are for you.

I shall send the manuscripts, etc., to Don Francesco.[16847] But I wish that he should continue to compose his treatise on Scholastic Theology, and I require of him that he should consult no other books than those of Habert. Let him only put into it, but in a more abbreviated form, what is found in Habert, leaving out one or the other proof or useless objection. Tell him to obey without making a reply; and for mercy's sake let him attend more to clearness than to elegance of style.

I rejoice at what I hear about Don Nicola;[16848] let him apply himself to his studies but little, till he has entirely recovered. It is sufficient if he only listens without writing. Let Don Biagio [Amarante] go out, and point out to him, as you think best, the walks that he is to take.

Let all recommend me to Jesus and Mary.

Letter 80

TO SISTER MARIA CELESTE POPPA IN THE MONASTERY OF THE ANNUNCIATION AT FOGGIA

He points out what should be done in order to abolish the figured chant.

Live Jesus and Mary!

S. MARIA DELLA CONSOLAZIONE, January 30, [1747].

I answer your letter. You are not obliged to obey in that which regards the figured chant; [16849] for if it knew all, the Sacred Congregation would certainly forbid this cursed chant. But since hell is making so many efforts to reestablish its use, why should you not do something on your part for the love of Jesus Christ? I would advise you and Sister Crocifissa, or you alone, secretly to address another letter to the Sacred Congregation, in which you might state the facts as follows: "The figured chant has just been abolished in our monastery; from it resulted innumerable disorders in the monasteries of Foggia on account of the teachers who had to be employed, the meals and refreshments that had to be offered to seculars, especially during Holy Week, without speaking of the distractions given to the nuns, of the vanity that this chant provoked, of the expense, of the faults against the Rule, and of other inconveniences. Now we have heard that application has been made to the Sacred Congregation to have this prohibition removed. But perhaps no statement was made about all the abuses that we have just enumerated. Hence to obey the dictates of our conscience and to promote the honor of Jesus Christ, we have believed it to be our duty to point out the disorders that have resulted therefrom, and that have stirred up general murmurings at Foggia and outside of it; and this in order that your Eminences (the plural must be used) far from permitting what is asked of you, might formally and forever forbid it."

Finish the petition by these words: The undersigned, full of gratitude, will pray to God to reward you.

The petition should have at the beginning the words: Eminent Sirs.

It should end as follows: Sister Maria Celeste Poppa and Sister Maria Crocifissa Petitto, professed religious of the monastery of the Annunciation at Foggia, have the honor of exposing to your Eminences the following facts: The use of figured music has been lately abolished in our monastery, as above.

On the envelope you should write:

To his Eminence

The Cardinal Prefect of the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars.—Rome.

Send, then, secretly your letter to Sister Maria Celeste of the Most Holy Saviour[16850] that she may frank it at the post-office by paying two or three grains;[16851] tell her from me that there is question of an affair of very great importance to the glory of God.

This measure will cause you trouble; but do not hesitate to take it, and if you have to suffer on account of it, suffer for the love of Jesus Christ. If you neglect this matter, and the answer having once come from Rome and the crying abuse having been re-established, you will perhaps not be able to remedy it, and this would be for you a cause of continual remorse.

As for direction, continue freely to be guided by the advice of your confessor, and go on whether you are cold or not. It is well to have the holy fear of God, that is, the fear of displeasing him; but confidence should always overcome fear. Dilate unceasingly your heart by confidence in the infinite goodness of God and in the merits of Jesus Christ with the desire to become the first saint in Paradise, if such is the good pleasure of the Lord, not for your own good, but in order to render greater glory to God, and to love Jesus Christ more. Always pray to Jesus and Mary for me. I remain, etc. Live Jesus and Mary!

Acquaint your confessor with everything. As to Sister Maria Emanuella, if your confessor puts you under obedience to give her a reprimand, do so through obedience, but do not continue to treat with this Sister in a familiar way. Live Jesus and Mary!

Your servant.

TO SISTER MARIA CROCIFISSA PETITTO, AT FOGGIA

The same subject.

S. MARIA DELLA CONSOLAZIONE, [January 30, 1747].

All goes well. Continue in all security to follow the direction of your confessor, and desire once for all to become a saint. I have written to Sister Celeste what I wish you to do to prevent this cursed chant. Don Cesare [Sportelli] is not here. I will see, etc. Tell your sister that she is foolish to act thus. Pray always to Jesus and Mary for me.

Live Jesus and Mary!

Your very humble servant,

TO SISTER MARIA CELESTE POPPA

The same subject.—Utility of persecutions.

Live Jesus and Mary!

S. MARIA DELLA CONSOLAZIONE, [March 10, 1747].

I have received your letter, full as it is of fears and human considerations. A fine spouse of Jesus Christ is she who is afraid of being persecuted for the love of Jesus Christ! You have performed a good action, [16852] and now you repent of it! Do you not know that it is a fault to repent of the good that one has done?—But you say, I shall be persecuted.—Amen. You should rejoice at this, even desire it, and not fear it. Beati qui persecutionem patiuntur, propter justitiam. [Blessed are they that suffer persecution for justice sake.—Matt. v. 10.] I would like that, for the love of Jesus Christ, you would be without ceasing exposed to the persecutions of the world. You very well know the disturbances that have been created; and if you do not know them, I know them and all Foggia knows them. For pity's sake, do not exhibit again such pusillanimity; if not I shall almost lose the hope of seeing you one day in heaven. I say the same thing to Sister Maria [Crocifissa]. Do what I have written to you, and pray for me. I also ask the prayers of Sister Maria [Crocifissa]. Live Jesus and Mary!

Confidence of the saint in the Blessed Virgin.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES,[16853] June 25, [1747].

In reference to the affairs at Nocera our opponents announce that they will be victorious. I firmly hope, however, that through the protection of the Blessed Virgin this will not be the case.

The exequatur for Caposele is already in my hands, and without conditions. Live Jesus and Mary!

Offer in the evening a special prayer to the Blessed Virgin; for we wish to make an attempt to obtain from the king the approbation of our Rule. Have also Communions offered for this purpose. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO THE PRIEST GIROLAMO FERRARA, NOVICE OF THE CONGREGATION AT CIORANI

Vocation and family affairs.—Examination of a particular case.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

[NAPLES], July 1, [1747].

May the will of God be always done! My dear Girolamo: The news[16854] about your brother's death has made me make a powerful act of resignation.

To be short, if your two sisters had sufficient means to live at home, I should not hesitate to counsel you to remain in the Congregation; for there is morally no danger in regard to their virtue; in fact even in case you should die, this danger would not exist, since one of them is already old enough to take care of the house.

The only difficulty is that, as the revenues consist of rents, I do not know whether women without the help of a man would succeed in collecting the dues; but you know the people and the customs of the country, and may be able to settle this question better than I.

As for placing your sisters in a convent, my dear Girolamo, this is a matter that seems to me to be very difficult, and even morally impossible. At first, it would be difficult to find a convent that would be willing to receive persons so aged; and besides, they would reluctantly give their consent to be shut up there (this would require a divine vocation), in order to permit you to retire among us. Moreover, if no one remains at home, who will take care of the rents, and would pay what would be owing to the convent? You must, therefore, think no more about your plan in regard to the convent.

It would be more easy to admit that your sisters could quietly live at home without you; and even if this would now appear to them impossible, yet if they knew that you have decided not to leave the Congregation, and if they become convinced of this by experience during a certain time, I should think that they would then find means of subsisting by exacting the payment of what is coming to them, just as they would have to do if you were to die. The archpriest[16855] seems to hold for certain that you are obliged to return to your family. There is no doubt that in a similar case Rome would grant even to professed religious the permission to leave the convent and to return home. But we must observe that it is one thing to have the permission to live in one's family, and another thing to be obliged to do so when there is no danger to morals, and there is a way of subsisting without being there to give assistance.

However, I can see no difficulty in allowing you to spend some time in your family in order to regulate the affairs, and especially to settle the pretensions of your married sister by arranging everything as well as you can. But I do not wish you to interfere too much in other disputes for fear that you might furnish an additional reason for being obliged to remain with your family.

I see with pleasure the affection that you bear towards the Congregation; but I prefer to have you yourself in the Congregation rather than your property.

The archpriest wishes, he writes, that you should hasten to come to the assistance of your family; but I think that there is no need of hurry; perhaps it would even be better for you to remain with us to see how things will end, and to write that you are bound by the vow of obedience, etc.,[16856] that your sisters are grown up and reasonable, that they have enough on which they can live. Try this means first, and you will see what will be the result. I do not doubt that at first sight such an answer will create a great stir; but I believe that in time people will persuade themselves that you are not disposed to return home, nor to leave the Congregation, and then they will become reconciled; and as vexatio dat intellectum [vexation gives understanding], I believe that your sisters will consent to see to the revenues themselves and find means to live comfortably without you.

The Doctors of Salamanca[16857] say with Sanchez, Castropalao, Suarez (and Bonacina is of the same opinion), that it is only in case of extreme necessity, either of poverty or of danger of prostitution, that the brother is obliged to come to the assistance of his sister by leaving the Community, especially if he is bound by a vow or an oath. Now such a necessity does not exist here.

However, my dear Girolamo, in order to be able to give you a decided answer I should have to speak to you orally; but I desire that the Rector [Father Andrea Villani] and Fathers N. and N. should first hold a consultation about this matter, and that then they should write to me what they think; for the case is so complicated.

Why could not your sisters retire to the house of your married sister and live with her? In order that they might be received there, I should not make any difficulty if you would make a present of your share, etc. I repeat that we need not be in too great a hurry. Let the affair first be maturely discussed with the Fathers; then communicate to me the opinions, and we shall come to a decision; for if you go home, I know not what entreaties the archpriest and the Archbishop [of Conza] may have in reserve for you, so that you will no more be able to extricate yourself.

Let us have recourse to prayer, and let us hope that God will enlighten us to know surely his will; this is all that you desire, and this is all that I desire. I remain, etc.—Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 85

TO A FATHER OF THE CONGREGATION

Course of action in order to save the vocation of Don Ferrara.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

[NAPLES], July 4, [1747].

Father Andrea writes to me from Ciorani what Don Girolamo says.—I am decidedly of opinion that he should not depart from Ciorani, as I have written to him; and if he departs, I shall impose it upon him as a matter of conscience. I positively say that his sisters stand in no need of his assistance. As to matters in litigation and to other necessities, let the sisters take care of these things themselves as they did before: Mortui sepeliant mortuos suos. [Let the dead bury the dead.] And if something has been overlooked, or if a suit has been lost, what matters it? Don Girolamo should not on that account lose his vocation, or expose himself to lose it. I regret to see by his letter that he inclines somewhat to go to Teora; but he has finally left the matter to be decided by me.[16858] I have recommended myself to God, and what I have just said is my decided opinion. Now you will notice that the archpriest [of Teora] will still write to him, or send him word, etc. Father Andrea [Villani] should then take care not to let him read the letters of the archpriest, as he let him read the last letter. This was wrong; it would have been sufficient had he told Father Girolamo about the affair, because the archpriest caused him to have scruples, and you know that Don Girolamo is naturally scrupulous. This scruple I am willing to take upon my own conscience. As much as possible prevent him from seeing anyone that has come from Teora. Moreover, if a letter should come from the archpriest or the Grand-Vicar, and the letter might renew his scruples, let Father Andrea keep him in ignorance of it; send me the letter, and I will answer the archbishop.

I remain, etc.—Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa! Recommend me to Jesus Christ and to Mary.

Letter 86

TO FATHER GIOVANNI MAZZINI, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT PAGANI

Solicitude of the saint to obtain the royal approbation of his Institute.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

[NAPLES], July 4, [1747].

Send this little document at once to Father Andrea at Ciorani, so that on Friday without fail he may return it through Angelillo. It is an abridgment of the Rule which I composed with D. Cesare [Sportelli] and which is to be presented to the king. I wish, however, that Father Andrea should see the manuscript before it is copied, so that he may make some remarks; and if your Reverence before sending it to Father Andrea would look it over and note whatever you think needs improvement, I should be greatly pleased. But there must be no delay, as in every case, it must be forwarded to Ciorani on Friday. Send, therefore, this letter to Father Andrea. You will notice that we have written only what is most necessary, and that we have purposely omitted matters of little importance. In reference to that most important affair about which Don Cesare has spoken to you I yesterday called upon Brancone,[16859] who told me that he had forgotten it. It will be necessary that we again apply to him. In the meantime, continue the prayers, since this affair is of the greatest importance to our Congregation. Hence the necessity of offering many prayers.

You will remark that we have purposely inserted oath instead of vow of perseverance, in order to take away the fear that people have of seeing a new Order established. The fact is the oath from the obligation of which the bishops cannot free any one, is more solid than the vow, in regard to which they certainly can give a dispensation.

My purgatory at Naples still continues, and will continue, I do not know how long. I remain, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Recommend me to Jesus and Mary. Send me from Ciorani a pair of white stockings. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 87

TO ONE OF THE GENERAL CONSULTORS OF THE CONGREGATION

He complains to him of the difficulties raised against the project of obtaining from the king the approbation of the Institute.

[NAPLES], July 4, 1747.

To tell the truth, if it were not for the sake of the Congregation, I would leave everything and would shut myself up in a cell at Ciorani without busying myself about anything; but my conscience will not permit such a thing. I imagined that your Reverence and the others would have referred to me this affair in which I proceed so carefully, or at least to me and D. Cesare [Sportelli] as the Fathers of Pagani have done; but your letter filled with scruples conditions and fears has caused me greater trouble. You leave me in this disturbed state so that I know not what to do. I do not wish however to hear more complaints in the Congregation; I have heard enough of them.

Remember well that in regard to the affairs we are in great hopes; for Brancone takes an interest in them, the king is favorable; the more so since Father Pepe[16860] has spoken to him; the Grand Almoner wishes to help us; later on things will change and evil impressions will be dissipated. Does it therefore seem prudent to protract things? I assure you in the presence of Jesus Christ that if this great affair miscarries there will be no longer any remedy. I say this great affair, because on it depends the stability of the Congregation. All your fears are frivolous: the greatest fear that we should have is that the Congregation, deprived of the king's approbation, may never have true stability and may perhaps end by being dissolved.

Now, this being said, I decline all responsibility before God; it is sufficient for me if the affair does not fail through my fault. I do not speak thus because I wish to play the part of a founder and of a despot. You see how I am seeking counsel in my doubts and how I have been seeking it from the beginning. When one sees that things are done with maturity and discretion, do you think it praiseworthy to wish to thwart them? I pray to Jesus Christ to close his eyes to my sins and not to destroy on their account this work which is his own. You should also have the prayers continued.

Why should you put before me so many difficulties which you see in this union?[16861] I am myself so much opposed to it that I will never give my consent, for the reason that you give and for other reasons, except in a case that is morally impossible, since this affair could not be brought about except causa cognita [the cause being known] and with your consent . . . [The rest of the letter is wanting.]

Letter 88

TO FATHER GIOVANNI MAZZINI

Request for counsel in a difficult affair.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES, July 22, [1747].

If the affair had gone on as I wished it, it would have gone on too smoothly; but now it will go on with many embarrassments and much labor; but the case is not desperate.

This morning I received the answer. Our friend [Marquis Brancone] has spoken with great force. The king has conceived a high idea of our work, but he is a little afraid of new Institutes. Hence he desires the affair to pass through the hands of the Grand Almoner and the Royal Council so as to find out what views are held by them. The king, however, has so high an opinion of our work that he himself has thought that we should write to the Pope to ask him to give up one of the many convents that exist, and to put into it members of our Congregation. To-day the royal ordinance with a copy of our Rule is to be sent to the Grand Almoner, who will make his report.

I also spoke this morning to the Grand Almoner, who repeated to me more than once: "Unite with Mannarini, and come together to see me." I positively refused to entertain the idea of union, because such a thing would be impossible, as the Institute is different from ours, has schools, and prefers cities, etc.[16862] This I said and will always say. But a thought has come to my mind which has agitated me in a thousand ways. I thought within myself: "Let us secure now the king's approbation on which depends that of Rome, and consequently all the rest; and then Deus et dies [God and time]. The partisans of Mannarini will attend to their own affairs and we to ours." Wherefore I regard this as certain: the Grand Almoner is favorable to Mannarini, and would not like to see our Congregation approved, while to the Congregation that is protected by him the approbation is refused. Hence if we wish both Congregations to be approved together, he will be in our favor; but if this is not done, the contrary will happen, and the affair will be a failure, because the king wishes to depend on his Council.

Here are then my considerations: On the one hand, I consider that by obtaining this approbation, the establishment of the Congregation would be secured; but which Congregation is to be approved, ours or theirs? our Rule or theirs? These are the differences that would have to be settled, and it appears to me to be most difficult, because we do not wish to change our Institute nor are they willing to change theirs.

Come together, talk over the matter, reflect upon it; and then on Monday or Tuesday let D. Cesare be so kind as to come to me at Naples and report to me what have been the views expressed. Send someone to Ciorani to-morrow with this letter, and let them also tell you what is their opinion. The case is very embarrassing. I do not write to Ciorani so as not to be obliged to repeat the same thing. Every evening let all our houses say the prayers for the king; and let this be done if possible at Mass.

As for the suit,[16863] information will be given at the beginning of next week.

Letter 89

TO MGR. CELESTINO GALIANO, GRAND ALMONER

Considerations in view of the memorial that is to be presented for obtaining the royal approbation of the Institute.

[Month of July, 1747.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

For the report that is to be presented we ask to subjoin the following reflections:

1. Experience has already proved how useful and even necessary the missions are for the rural districts, especially of the kingdom of Naples, where the hamlets are so numerous, so thickly settled, and at the same time, so destitute of spiritual help. Although the city of Naples is well provided with such help, yet this is not the case in the remaining part of the kingdom; and although from the city of Naples and other populous cities of the kingdom every year various missions are given, these labors nevertheless correspond only in a feeble measure to the immense want that exists, so that many places remain from twenty to thirty years without a mission. Hence this is the cause why so many people are found there without even knowing the necessary mysteries of faith. It, therefore, seems to be very necessary that there should be more houses of this Congregation of missionaries of the Most Holy Saviour, who devote themselves to this exercise and to the spiritual culture of these country places, for which the missions are so useful and even necessary. They could then spend their time as well in instructing in divine things so many poor people that live in these places, as in remedying the bad confessions that are made, especially in the kingdom of Naples where the rural hamlets are as numerous as they are populous.

2. Moreover, this work is known to be most useful on account of the continual assistance that it furnishes to the places where missions have been given. The missions do certainly a great deal of good; but the misfortune is that, if after the missions have been given, the people do not see the missionaries and are not able to go where they live, they fall back into their old evil ways. This Congregation has for its aim not only to go through the country, helping the people who mostly need spiritual help, and going in search of them in the most abandoned places and in hamlets, but it has, besides, for its chief rule that its members must return from time to time to the places where the missions have been given for the purpose of preaching, of administering the holy sacraments; and thus they renew and preserve the fruits of the missions. And for this end the Congregation has as its fundamental rule to establish its houses outside of the inhabited places and in the centre of the dioceses, for these reasons: that they may better attend to this duty of travelling continually through the country; that the country people round about may find it convenient to have recourse to them as often as they wish in order to see the missionaries in the church and settle the affairs of their conscience; and finally, that in these dioceses an opportunity be given to ecclesiastics and priests to make their retreat while remaining in the houses of the missionaries.

TO FATHER PAUL CAFARO, HIS DIRECTOR

The king of Naples, after the death of Mgr. Domenico Rosso, Archbishop of Palermo, wished to promote to the archbishopric our saint, who thus expresses his dislike for such a dignity.

[End of July, 1747.]

. . . . .Now we must use entreaties, we must pray, because I see myself exposed to a grave persecution and in the greatest distress. The king has resolved to select me to be archbishop of Palermo; but I would rather hide myself in the woods than accept such a dignity.[16864]

Letter 91

TO FATHER GIOVANNI MAZZINI

Difficulties that the saint meets with at Naples on account of the approbation of the Institute.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

[NAPLES], August 1, [1747].

I write in haste a letter for all, as I have but little time. I have your letters and those from Ciorani. You must now pray to Jesus Christ to give me strength and light, for I have lost sleep, appetite, etc. Yesterday morning the Grand Almoner almost absolutely refused at first to take our affair into consideration; afterwards, however, it was taken up; may God grant that the report may not be adverse! The Blessed Virgin can obtain for us success; hence continue and have others to continue the prayers. To-morrow I must return to the charge.

This morning I came to a successful understanding with Mannarini and spoke to him decidedly on a certain point. He has acquiesced in a few things.

These are not things that should be written in a letter, either because it is not expedient to confide them to paper, or because we need each time ten pages to say everything.

In the midst of this confusion and embarrassment the news from the novitiate consoles me; especially do I rejoice to hear that Don Girolamo [Ferrara] is so happy and cheerful.

Father Cesare[16865] may now set out for Caposele with God's holy blessing. Father Andrea has thought fit to put me to shame with all his humiliations, which are but subjects of confusion to me. But it is impossible at a distance to confer with one another by letter.

Father Cesare should speak to the Archbishop of Conza to find out in what way it might be brought about at Rome that a Cardinal be appointed by the Pope to interest himself in having the Congregation approved. For if the Blessed Virgin would help us to succeed with the king, etc., we should take care that at least the cause of the approbation may be introduced at Rome.

Recommend me to Jesus and Mary. Perhaps I shall send you a priest who is already a missionary. I must however maturely examine this matter which is rather a delicate affair and needs a dispensation. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO A GENERAL CONSULTOR

Trials and annoyances that the saint has to endure at Naples.

[August, 1747.]

. . . . Continue to pray for the Congregation and for me who am here pining away at Naples while treating with those ministers who are making life a burden to me. My heart is filled with bitterness; I cannot endure this any longer; I should like to run away, and yet I cannot leave Naples. I must assist in bringing our affairs to a close as soon as possible.

A consultation is now going on, and our affair has been proposed in the Royal Council. The king has thought of adopting a plan which will perhaps be more useful to the Congregation.

D. Vincenzo [Mannarini] is going about trying to effect a union; but I always put forward the excuse that such does not really appear to be the will of God. It is my firm conviction that this union cannot be accomplished, nor shall I ever give my consent to it. . . . .

TO FATHER D. CESARE SPORTELLI

A power of attorney in regard to the founding of a house at Caposele.

Not being able to be personally present to transact the affairs of [Conza and Caposele], and confiding in the fidelity and integrity of the Very Rev. Father Cesare Sportelli, my companion, who although absent is just as if he were present, I appoint and constitute him my procurator [attorney] and that of my companions, present and future, with all the sufficient and necessary power, even with the clause ut alter ego [another self] to make as it will seem best one or more agreements, with the Illustrious Monsignor D. Giuseppe Niccolai, Archbishop of Conza, with the Reverend clergy of Caposele and with all other benefactors, who intend to co-operate in the establishment of those Fathers, priests of Caposele, and especially in the place or monastery, called S. Maria Mater Domini, where there is question of conveying to them the church and the house situated there, with the actual annual income of four hundred ducats to be assigned for their maintenance, that is, a hundred and fifty ducats from the Reverend clergy, and the rest from the Most Illustrious Monsignor, the archbishop and other benefactors; with all the agreements and conditions that will appear to be suitable, and about which agreements have been made by the said procurator appointed by me, promising to ratify and confirm them all and again to ratify them should it be necessary.

TO THE PRIEST FRANCESCO MARGOTTA[16866] OF CALITRI

He admits him into the Congregation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, December 7, 1747.

My dear and much esteemed Francesco: I must inform you that last evening we read, first, the letter that contained the news of the new foundation [of the house at Caposele]; then your letter in which you make known to us your resolution. But I really do not know which gave to all a greater joy, the news of the foundation or the news of the resolution that you, my dear Brother, have taken. I use the title my dear Brother, because, in accordance with what I herewith communicate to you, I receive you to-day into our Congregation as a brother and as a dear companion, so that your novitiate begins to-day even though you may be obliged to remain at Calitri for some time in order to settle your affairs. You have given to the Congregation all that of which you could dispose; but know that our Congregation and each one of us love you in such a manner that even if you had brought nothing, we would gladly have admitted you. The reason of this is because in you we shall receive a confrere that really wishes to become a saint. I am quite confident that you will attain the object of your desires, especially after you have maturely considered the matter, free from all excitement or passion, and your director, as well as the archbishop, has fully concurred in all your plans.

Remain, therefore, dear Brother, at Calitri without the least uneasiness as long as it will be convenient to you to arrange your affairs. It is true, we are all impatiently awaiting your arrival; yet I wish that you should settle matters in a quiet way. Such is your ardent spirit that you will need no motives to induce you to enter solitude as soon as possible. I can imagine, and am convinced, that your heart is sighing for the moment in which you may be able to enter the asylum that God has destined for you from all eternity that you might sanctify yourself. I would be delighted to see you here before my departure for Naples whither you know I must go either the day after New Year or after Epiphany to attend to the business of the Congregation. But I repeat, I do not wish that you should become disquieted on this account; for if I have not this consolation I shall offer it as a sacrifice to Jesus Christ. Be assured that all are expecting you with open arms. Above all have Fathers Paolo [Cafaro] and [D. Girolamo] Ferrara heard the news with inexpressible joy. To-day all the novices will go to Communion for you in order that Jesus Christ may bring to a speedy conclusion all your most necessary affairs, and you may be enabled to come among us as soon as possible.

From this time forward you must pray for me, but in a way different from that in which you have done heretofore, since from this moment I impose upon you this duty of praying for me by virtue of obedience, because you are now one of us. Hence every morning at your Mass and during your thanksgiving recommend me to Jesus Christ that he may bestow upon me a love for him and a love for his Mother Mary, and that I may accomplish the divine will in a perfect manner. I point out in a precise way my intention, so that you may always have it impressed on your mind what prayer you must say, and may not forget it.

On my part I shall in return do you the same favor. Therefore, in the name of the Most Blessed Trinity, of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament, and of Mary Immaculate, I admit you, receive you and bless you, that you may belong entirely to God, as such is doubtless his holy will. As soon as you write to your director, Don Angelo, I enjoin upon you the duty of expressing to him my thanks for the permission that he has granted you, and of telling him at the same time that the whole Congregation will always owe him a debt of gratitude. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 95

TO FATHER ANDREA VILLANI, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT CIORANI

(This letter was written in the name of tbe saint by Father D. Celestino de Robertis.)

The saint consents to the making of a new agreement with the founder of the house at Ciorani but on certain conditions.[16867]

Praised be the Most Blessed Sacrament and Mary Immaculate!

NAPLES, February 4, 1748.

In reference to the affair about Nocera, our Father [D. Alfonso] does not think it well to have anything done at the present time, because there would be too much risk on account of circumstances which cannot be mentioned in a letter, and the loss of this case might be for us the loss of other foundations. The Father wishes to have your opinion and that of Father Saverio [Rossi] about this matter.

As regards the letter of Don Andrea [Sarnelli], let him know immediately (for this purpose Father Saverio should go there at once if he can, or your Reverence should go, because he [Don Alfonso] wishes to receive an answer by Saturday) that our Father entertains the greatest affection and veneration for him who with so much love has brought us to Ciorani. Hence in order to comply with his desires, he consents to the incurring of some loss, but not so great a loss as would give him scruples of conscience. For the rest, he will do what he can to please him. In short, let him know this in these or similar words, according as you think best. Tell him, therefore, that of the one hundred and fifty ducats, which he now wishes to give us annually during his life, we cannot put ourselves under any obligation of spending a part for the benefit of the church. We shall do what we can, as he has seen us do in the midst of all our miseries; hut we must not be put under any obligation. He knows the straits in which we are, and so for pity's sake, he should not oblige us to do such a thing.

In regard to the establishment of other houses, of which he speaks in his letter, it is well for him to know that we have had hints given us by the ministers not to accept any more houses. Our Father, therefore, plainly says that he will not have the boldness to ask for new foundations. He [Don Sarnelli] sees how many subjects we are, how poor we are; therefore, he who loves us should help us as much as he can. He has already seen that we have always held him in high esteem. Tell him that when he wishes to make the contract, our Father will be ready; but inform him that Father Alfonso himself wishes to draw up the minutes of the contract so as to avoid all litigation, which may afterwards be begun by the relatives of Don Andrea who, he already knows, can hardly look at us. For this reason it will be necessary for him to give us all the papers, or at least an abstract of them, so as to be able to protect ourselves.

All this you will say to him, and send an answer by Saturday. Our Father also says that it will be necessary to write this new contract in words other than those in which the first contract was drawn up. We have lately received information about certain points that cannot be entrusted to paper, and that make it our duty to ask Don Andrea to write out this agreement. The foundation of Ciorani has not the express approbation of the king. The brother of Don Andrea has uttered the threat that when the latter dies, measures will be taken to drive us at once from Ciorani. This, besides other things, is what we know from a good source. Hence should Don Andrea wish to give us less than one hundred and twenty ducats, it would still be necessary to make a new contract; but I repeat, it must be worded differently, and state that the donation is destined, not for the Congregation, as was mentioned in the first contract, but for us, priests of the Most Holy Saviour, as private individuals. It might also be well, by way of greater precaution, to add to this donation the obligation of saying, for example, one Mass every month; but it must be remarked that this new contract does not depend at all on the first contract; for if ever the first should be annulled, the second would also be annulled. It is necessary to say that the first contract has become null and void, and that regard should be had only to the second, in which it is mentioned that a donation is no longer made to the Congregation to found a house at Ciorani, but that it is bestowed upon us who are named in the contract, and to the priests, our companions who live and who will live in the house at Ciorani, and who are engaged in the care of souls, with the obligation of saying those Masses, of performing the exercises on Saturdays in honor of the Madonna, or otherwise, according to the wishes of Don Andrea. Thus we must insist with prudence on the point that we ourselves have to plan this contract. As for Don Andrea, it will surely be sufficient for him if he has substantially all that he desired. Try then to see him immediately and to conclude the affair without delay, for Don Andrea is changeable.

Preserve this letter, for it may be useful for the object that we have in view. In case Don Andrea wishes to make the contract at once, send us the paper that he has drawn up, and add to it a copy of the beginning of the document that concerns Caposele, for our Father wishes to ask more advice. But try your best to bring the matter to a speedy conclusion. Believe me, my dear Father,

Your servant and brother,

CELESTINO DE ROBERTIS,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

Letter 96

TO THE PRIEST D. FRANCESCO MARGOTTA, AT CALITRI

Solicitude of the saint in regard to the observance of the Rule.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES, February 7, 1948.

My dear Francesco: I am still at Naples to finish the affairs of the Congregation, and I hope to finish them soon. However, it seems to me that a thousand years have still to elapse before matters can be concluded. We are all of us praying continually for you that you may soon come among us.

The Archbishop [of Conza] was very much displeased with me since for what I believe to be very good reasons I did not allow Father Cafaro to preach the Lenten sermons at Calitri. Father Paolo [Cafaro] must during Lent direct the theological studies at Iliceto; and this cannot be done except by him as he is the author of the text-book that is used. Father Cafaro will not therefore preach the Lenten sermons. Besides, as he has no Lenten sermons prepared it would be undertaking great and unnecessary labor since the preaching of Lenten sermons is foreign to our Institute. This last was my principal reason; for the preaching of Lenten sermons is an occupation altogether against our Rule; and if I permitted it on this occasion, I could no longer refuse the same thing to other bishops who have our houses in their dioceses. Moreover, the archbishop has promised, in a letter which is preserved, that he would treat us as other bishops do; and in the contract it is expressly mentioned that he is to employ us in accordance with our Rule.

As for yourself, if you do not speak earnestly with the archbishop by telling him that you have been already received, etc., you will never be able to tear yourself away. Represent to him that it is a matter of conscience with you in regard to your vocation. This is enough, for you are not wanting in judgment or prudence. After all, what must we do? We must be patient; perhaps our regret in not seeing you among us is greater than yours.

Recommend me to Jesus Christ that I may soon be able to leave Naples. It seems to me that a thousand years are still to pass by before I finish with these blessed ministers who fill my heart with bitterness. If it were not for the Congregation I would have nothing to do with them.

If the archbishop complains of me, he does so unjustly. I believe that up to the present I have served him as well as I could; and to oblige him I have even been unmindful whether or not I pleased other bishops. God knows what I was obliged to do in order to send him now the Fathers that are to give missions to his people and retreats to his clergy. And if he wishes that Father Fiocchi who has been sent to give a retreat to the priests, should stay, as I have heard, to preach the Lenten sermons I shall even then give my consent, although this Father is destined for Nocera where he is much needed and where the bishop is greatly dissatisfied. I really do not know what more to do to satisfy him. But to trample upon the Rules and Constitutions in the very beginning, I cannot allow. When an occasion presents itself, communicate what I have written to the archbishop. I remain, etc.—Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 97

TO THE PRIEST DON ANDREA SARNELLI

He gives his consent to the making of a new contract, but under certain conditions.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph!

NAPLES, February 10, 1748.

My dear Don Andrea: I have already written two long letters to the Rector at Ciorani about the affair concerning which you wrote to me. Now I am answering your letter, and I say in substance that I am ready to do what you have written to me. I should however be pleased to have the contract renewed for the benefit of this house; because this new contract would now have to be drawn up in other words in order to render this foundation more firm. But at present I shall not write the words of the new contract. But when you have resolved to write it, it will be necessary for me to let you know everything. The contract will have to be worded as that one was worded for the founding of the house of Conza [at Caposele]. And if you are desirous of knowing its contents, I will make no difficulty in letting you know them. Let the Rector of Ciorani know your wish, for I have written to him all the particulars; let him see this letter, and he will tell you all.

What before all I recommend to you is secrecy, so that your relatives may not learn of this affair, and may not involve us in a law-suit after the death of the Baron,[16868] as has already been said by them. I have no fear of the Baron nor of Don Nicola, because both have always favored us, and both are inclined to piety. I am however afraid of Don Domenico who, I know not why, cannot bear to see us at Ciorani, and when near the Chinese College these or similar words were used by him: Only let my father die, and we shall see what will become of the Fathers at Ciorani. As for the other brother Don Francesco,[16869] I know not whether he inclines towards Don Nicola or Don Domenico, and for this reason I should not like that anything should be known by Don Domenico in regard to the new contract.

This is sufficient. In regard to yourself I hope that there will be no difficulty (since you will have attained your end) in modifying the old contract, so that the house at Ciorani may be firmly established, and all danger of having lawsuits may be removed.

I beg you to give me at once an answer for my own guidance, and I ask you not to change your mind in reference to what you have written to me. Recommend me to Jesus Christ. May the Blessed Sacrament and Mary Immaculate be praised! I remain,

Your very humble and very grateful servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

[P. S.] My dear Don Andrea, excuse me for not answering your letter immediately, because I have been ill at Naples; it is now seven days that the weather has been very wet and I have been suffering from my chest. Recommend me to Jesus and Mary.

Letter 98

TO THE KING OF NAPLES

Petition to have his permission for the legal existence of the four houses of the Institute.

[February, 1748.]

Sire: The priest Alfonso de Liguori, together with his companions, missionaries of the so-called Congregation of the Most Holy Saviour, humbly presents to your Majesty the following petition: Your Majesty not having thought it well to sanction with your royal permission the project of uniting their society to that of the priests of the Congregation of the Most Holy Sacrament so as to form only one Congregation[16870] the suppliants ask you, Sire, to deign at least to recognize their four houses (and only these) in order that your royal authority may serve as a support to another work founded in favor of the poor people in the country, as your Majesty well knows. These houses are situated in the dioceses of Salerno, Nocera, Bovino, and Conza.

The undersigned declares that there is no desire of founding more houses but only of seeing established those that exist. And as for the purchase of property for the maintenance of these houses and of the work of the missions, he is satisfied with what your Majesty may think fit to arrange; provided he sees this holy work organized with the authority of your Majesty he will be satisfied with whatever is prescribed; because he does not wish that these houses should become rich, but only that they should have what is sufficient to maintain the work, for the propagation of God's glory and the profit of your Majesty's vassals.

If ever it should happen (may God forbid!) that the subjects of this Congregation should become faithless to their Institute, and the work should fail, the petitioner in his own name and in that of his companions will be content, and they even pray your Majesty that the Sovereign Pontiff he requested, to disband and suppress not only one or the other of the houses but the entire Congregation. Henceforward, the petitioner, in the name of the members of the whole Congregation, present and future, binds himself that they will not defend their conduct in any juridical way, but will submit in all things to whatever your Majesty shall see fit to arrange. The undersigned and all his companions desire nothing else than that this work may be pleasing to the zeal that inspires your Majesty for the good of the abandoned people in the country. The petitioner also hopes that in future this condition that is now made may also serve as a check on all the members of the Congregation and prevent them from being relaxed, and as an incentive to preserve the right spirit and continue the work as it has heretofore been carried on. If your Majesty deigns to favor this petition the undersigned will pray to God to reward you. May God grant that we receive this favor!

Letter 99

TO THE SOVEREIGN PONTIFF BENEDICT XIV

The saint asks him for the apostolic approbation of his Congregation.

[March 30, 1748.]

Most Holy Father: The priest Alfonso de Liguori, a Neapolitan, and with other missionaries, his companions, having become associated under the title of the Most Holy Saviour, humbly supplicates and exposes to your Holiness what follows: Having for many years been giving missions as a member of the Congregation of the Apostolic Missions, erected in the cathedral at Naples, the undersigned observed how greatly abandoned are the poor people, especially in the country, of the vast territories of the kingdom. Since the year 1732 he has associated himself with the said priests, as his companions, under the direction of the late Monsignor Falcoia, Bishop of Castellammare, for the purpose of devoting himself to aid by missions, instructions and other exercises, the souls of the poor in the country, who are mostly destitute of spiritual help, since they are frequently in want of those that may administer to them the sacraments, and to preach to them the word of God. Indeed, many of them for want of laborers approach death without even knowing the necessary mysteries of the faith, since there are few priests that devote themselves earnestly to the religious education of the poor country people on account of the expenses and also on account of the inconveniences that they have to suffer from such a task.

The undersigned have therefore since that time given assistance to the poor people by giving them missions, by going through the country visiting the most abandoned places of the six provinces of the kingdom. Their success was so great and universal that his Majesty, the king, having heard of it, and especially of the labors so profitable to a great number of shepherds in Puglia, deigned to make an annual appropriation for the maintenance of this holy work, recommending it as most useful for the general good of his kingdom.

His Eminence, the Archbishop of Naples, who governs his church with so much zeal, has also deigned to call the petitioners to render him services, and they have done so by giving missions in many villages of his diocese.

For this purpose, the petitioners, with the canonical approbation of the Ordinaries and also with the permission of the king, have united to live together in certain houses or secluded places, situated away from towns and villages in different parts of the kingdom. These houses are in the dioceses of Salerno, of Bovino, of Nocera, and finally, in the diocese of Conza, in which with the apostolic consent of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars there has been ceded to the petitioners the church of S. Maria Mater Domini with the adjacent house, together with an income derived from a benefice given them by the clergy of Caposele, and other kinds of income assigned by certain benefactors, especially by the archbishop of the said diocese. Besides the missions to which the missionaries are constantly devoting themselves, there are given in these houses opportunities for the people who have had missions, to visit the missionaries so as to renew their confessions and became re-established by means of sermons. Moreover, in these houses are given more than once a year private spiritual exercises to the candidates for ordination, to the pastors and priests sent by their bishops, as well as to seculars. This has been a source of great profit both to themselves and to others, since by such exercises the priests come forth reformed, and are made worthy members of the sanctuary, to the benefit of their flocks. And all this work is continued, and is always increasing the concourse of the people and conferring spiritual benefits upon them.

The Lord has then greatly blessed this work, not only by the conversion of many abandoned souls and to the profit of the country places where the petitioners have been laboring, but also by an increase of subjects who have joined this Congregation, so that they number about forty members.

Most Holy Father, this is the state of the above-mentioned work. But if your Holiness does not vouchsafe to grant the apostolic approbation, the work will not continue to meet with success. Prostrate, therefore, at the feet of your Holiness, the petitioner and his companions beseech you, by the love that your Holiness entertains for the glory of Jesus Christ and for the salvation of so many poor country people, who are the most abandoned children of the Church of God, to grant your apostolic consent, that the aforesaid members may constitute themselves a Congregation of secular priests, under the title of the Most Holy Saviour. The Congregation would always be subject to the jurisdiction of the Ordinaries of the places, ad instar [like] the Congregation of Fathers of the Missions and of the Fathers called Pious Workers, with this difference that the members of the Congregation must always live outside of inhabited places, and in the centre of the most needy dioceses, so that they may be better able to devote themselves to the care of country people, and to be also more ready to give them assistance. May your Holiness also deign to approve the Rules that will in time be placed at your Holiness's feet. We hope that your Holiness, who has so much zeal for the salvation of souls, especially for the souls of poor country people (as has been proved by your Holiness's letter sent to the bishops of the kingdom of Naples that they should give all possible spiritual aid to the people by means of holy missions), may vouchsafe to establish by your supreme authority a work not only useful but also necessary for the many poor souls in the rural districts of this vast kingdom, who are living destitute of all spiritual help. For this favor they will pray to God to reward your Holiness.

TO A PRIEST

He gives him some salutary advice.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

CIORANI, April 26, 1748.

I received your letter, and I read your reasons which convince me that by your resignation you would derive greater quiet, but not the greater glory of God and the greater profit of souls. You flee from one cross, but you will find that you must carry another. I think that you should withdraw and make privately the spiritual exercises, in order that the Lord may help you to decide what will be for his greater glory. At this house at Ciorani the exercises will begin on the 27th of next May; hence if you wish to make them here, you are now informed of the time when they begin. I recommend myself to your prayers. Praised be Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament and Mary Immaculate! I remain,

Your very devoted and very grateful servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour.

TO A FATHER OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS

Affection and veneration of the saint for the Society.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, May 31, 1748.

I received your much prized letter together with the pious and magnificent present. I have been much confused thereby, and with sentiments of confusion I thank you most cordially for it. As a sign of my gratitude and of the affection that I bear towards the Society of Jesus and towards every one of the Reverend Fathers, I beg you to accept a few small books of devotion, together with some pictures which we have had engraved. I also send you the Pratica del confessore[16871] [Practice of the Confessor] which I lately published, and which in substance is a compendium of the large work on Moral Theology which preceded it. I beg your Reverence to accept it in the right spirit.

News about the Society I have not yet received, because Father Centola scarcely left the box when he continued his journey, and I did not see him; but I shall meet him at Salerno on Friday. I am as anxious about this news as if it concerned our own Congregation, since there is question of an Order that has, one may say, sanctified and continues to sanctify the world. Above all do I thank you for the cordiality with which your Reverence writes to me; and I beg you therefore to recommend me most earnestly in your holy Mass to Jesus Christ, at least for three days. Humbly kissing your hand, I remain most respectfully . . .

Letter 102

TO THE BISHOP OF AVELLINO AND FRIGENTI, MGR. FELICE LEONI.[16872]

Request for a favor relative to ordination.

May Jesus and Mary be our life!

CIORANI, August 25, 1748.

Your Lordship has had the kindness to promise the deacon Salvatore Gallo, your subject and a member of our Congregation, the favor of promoting him to the priesthood at the coming ordination in September. I send therefore a Father, the bearer of this, to receive the favorable rescript and also to render many thanks to your Lordship for the very great favor that has been conferred. Encouraged by such extreme kindness, I make bold to ask you to deign to grant to this our Congregation the favors which many bishops, and especially the Archbishops of Salerno and Conza, as also the Bishops of Bovino and Nocera (in whose dioceses our houses are situated) have bestowed on similar occasions when an ordination of our subjects was to take place, namely, to refer to the Rectors of the said houses, or to me who unworthily hold the office of Rector Major, the examination of these candidates. So particular a favor will be a special proof of the most courteous love and affection that you bear towards our Institute. It will be for me and for the whole Congregation a motive for placing ourselves under a lasting obligation to you, and will be an incentive to retain continually a memory of it in our poor prayers to the Almighty for the preservation and happiness of your Lordship, of whom I remain,

Your most humble and devoted servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Saviour,

Rector Major.

Letter 103

TO CARDINAL GIUSEPPE SPINELLI, ARCHBISHOP OF NAPLES

Notes written by the saint to the aforesaid Cardinal who was to draw up the report requested of him by the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars for the approbation of the Institute.[16873]

[September, 1748.]

It will be a matter of surprise when it is made known that after so many Orders, Congregations and Institutes have been founded in the Church, the approbation as well as the confirmation of this new Institute is asked of the Holy See; for some say that it would be better to dissolve or reform the old Institutes rather than institute new ones. But the surprise will cease when people understand the end and aim of the Institute and the blessings with which the Lord has favored it. Moreover, it must be remarked that all the Institutes established during several centuries have met with the same opposition. Thus were opposed the Theatines, the Jesuits, the so-called Congregation of the Mother of God, the Pious Workers. Nevertheless the Holy See inspired by the Holy Ghost did not hesitate to approve them, and experience has shown of what great profit each one of these new Institutes has been to the Church of God.

But all these Institutes, it is said, began with great fervor, and then became relaxed. This will be the case with the new Institute.

In answer to this we say that in many Institutes fervor has been and is maintained; and although it is not the same as that with which the first members began, yet it is such as has heretofore been of great advantage to God's Church, as well on account of the examples of regular observance as on account of the works that have been done for the good of their fellow-men.

Then it is said that it is impossible to expect human nature to change; according to the present condition of men they begin with great fervor, but afterwards they grow cold. The farther water is removed from its source, the less limpid and the more turbid it becomes. But we see that God, who loves his glory above all things, and certainly was the author of so many Institutes which have been founded, has thought it well to govern his Church in such a manner that from time to time new Institutes should be established, not only that the garment of his Spouse might be adorned with various colors, but that, should the fervor of the ancient Institutes fail, it might be supplied by the fervor of new ones, which usually begin in this way. This fervor generally speaking endures for many centuries to the immense profit as well of the members of the Institute as of the people. If in a vineyard new plants are not substituted for the old ones, what will happen? The old ones dry up, and if new ones are wanting, the vineyard will come to an end.

But now, some say, so many Orders, so many Congregations have sprung up that finally they will become more than enough for the religious education of the people.

O would to God that these were enough! Messis quidem multa! [The harvest is great.] Whoever is somewhat familiar with the care of souls knows how scarce is the number of laborers who truly seek the salvation of souls, and he also knows how many souls are lost for want of spiritual aid. And it is certain for several reasons which any one may find by himself here, that this is the case especially in rural districts.

To this end so many zealous priests have sought to engage in giving missions, which if useful in cities are altogether necessary in country places; since in these latter there is for the most part a want of good priests who break to these unlettered people the divine Word, and give them the needful instructions. Besides, the missionaries are necessary in these rural places for the reason that there are few priests there, and these are natives of the country; hence many souls make sacrilegious confessions on account of the repugnance that they feel in confessing to one who knows them. It, therefore, happens that if these souls who have thus fallen into sin have not the convenience of a mission, so as to be able to manifest their consciences to strange priests, it may be said with moral certainty that they will continue to live in disgrace with God, and will surely be damned. Experience has proved that the greatest benefits are derived by souls from the missions which, as has been seen, have sanctified the entire population.

But would to God that the fruits of the missions were lasting! There would not be seen this corruption of morals as is seen even after the missions, and few souls would be lost. But the misfortune is that after some time the people grow cold and return to a still worse state on account of the light that they received during the missions.

Now, it is the aim of our most humble Institute to make permanent the fruits that have been gathered on the missions. For this purpose it is required by its Rule that the houses be located in the centre of dioceses so that the poor people may not only visit them in order to be helped in their spiritual wants, but may be otherwise aided by instructions, novenas and other exercises which the Fathers give, now in one place, now in another of the dioceses in which they live; and thus the fruit that has been derived from the missions is seen to continue among the people.

Such aid is of the greatest consolation to the people, because when in the small country places there is a scarcity of confessors, and in many districts scarcely a parish priest, it happens that very many hardly ever receive the sacraments; or if they go to confession, many through shame and repugnance make sacrilegious confessions. Confessors who go about know what comfort this help is, and how much the people are thereby consoled.

And in order that the subjects of this Congregation may be entirely free from all the cares in which are usually involved those laborers that live in inhabited places, it has been established that their residence should be outside of inhabited places in order to attend better to the spiritual care of the country people.

This Congregation, therefore, performs a work that is for the benefit of the people in the country, which is performed by no other Congregation of missionaries; hence it is hoped that the approbation and confirmation of it may be obtained.

The aim and purpose of the Institute is to form a Congregation, under the title of the Most Holy Saviour, of secular priests, living in common, subject to the jurisdiction of the Ordinaries of the places, ad instar [similar] to the Congregation of the Fathers of the Mission and of the Pious Workers, with this distinction, however, that its members are to live in the centre of the most needy dioceses, and outside of the inhabited places, in order that they may the better devote themselves to the abandoned people of the country, and be more prepared to offer them assistance by missions, instructions and the administration of the sacraments.

They observe moreover the following twelve rules. . . . .

TO SISTER MARIA GIOVANNA DELLA CROCE

Obligation of a religious to sustain observance, especially in regard to the admission of novices.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, September 15, [1748].

I have just received your long letter. You have done well to maintain the observance of the monastery in regard to the first point as well as the second about which you have written to me. We must prefer the common good of the monastery to every private good; otherwise the monastery would become an abode of worldly-minded women, instead of being a sacred asylum of spouses of Jesus Christ. In this matter be firm, and do not yield.

Omit one of your ordinary Communions as a penance for the weakness you have shown in the last case by giving your vote out of compassion. In future do not commit the same fault; otherwise I shall have to command you to abstain from Communion for a whole month without speaking of the scruple of which you would have to purify your conscience by confession. Certainly, we should be very scrupulous in admitting to the monastery a person who has not given signs that she has really entered it in order to serve God. In this manner the convents are ruined through the fault of those that give their votes through human respect In future, therefore, be firm, and encourage your companions to show the same firmness; they will thereby acquire great merit with Jesus Christ; above all, if on this account they have to suffer persecution: Beati qui persecutionem patiuntur propter justitiam. [Blessed are they that suffer persecution for justice sake.—Matt. v. 10.] Always act thus, enduring persecutions with joy, without being disturbed; and answer that you act thus not out of passion, but because you think that you should commit a sin if you acted otherwise; and say nothing more.

Recommend me to Jesus and to Mary. I am, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Pray every day to the Blessed Virgin in behalf of our affairs; for just now the question of our approbation is before the authorities at Rome. This I enjoin upon you as a matter of obedience. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 105

TO A SUPERIOR OF HIS CONGREGATION

Two important regulations; one in regard to the health of the subjects, the other about the protection of their vocation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, December 26, [1748].

O my God! how dreadful was yesterday's weather for travelling!—I was at the altar; but you might have said one word to let me know that it was raining, and I would not have let you go. This inordinate eagerness for missions does not please me. When afterwards a subject becomes sick, the evil would be greater than if we had omitted giving ten missions.

Henceforward, for the rest of my life, I establish a general rule, that you shall read to all those that are with you, and which you shall afterwards communicate to the Rector of Caposele and to all the rest; for I recollect the great haste that was exhibited at the departure from Cirignola.[16874]

I declare then that it is my express wish, which must not be interpreted, that no one, at least of the chorists, should ever set out in the rain, unless it be in summer time, or the journey be a short one, or when some extraordinary emergency arises. I mention these exceptions for the greater tranquility of the Superiors. Hence I wish that no chorist shall ever set out on a journey in the rain, even though there were question of giving a mission at Paris. Preserve this letter so that you may remember this rule.

Another thing to which I intend never to give my consent is that permission be given to the Fathers or to the Brothers to visit their families because a relative is either sick or dying. This is permitted only when the father or the mother is seriously ill; and in this case I should be better satisfied if even then one did not go there. I also except any very extraordinary case, in regard to which I leave it to the Superiors to decide.

The first of these measures aims at preventing the health of the subjects from being endangered; the second, at preventing the loss of vocation and of the salvation of the soul.

Also in respect to any other case than sickness, I leave it to the Superiors to examine whether the case is extraordinary, or whether there is question about the wants or the affairs of the Congregation.

I send you again twenty carlini[16875] to help you. After the mission of St. Michael send Father Criscuoli to this place. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO SIGNOR D. POMPEO SCIBELLI, AT LEONI

He asks him to do him a service.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, February 15, 1749.

My dear Don Pompeo: Please have the enclosed letters forwarded to their destination.

As to the young man,[16876] I have already written that, since the Bishop [di S. Angelo de' Lombardi] does not wish to register his patrimonial title in the episcopal chancery before his ordination, you may send him to us. But as I have said, you should at least examine his patrimony and his papers, so that I may be assured that there is no mistake in regard to this matter. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your Reverence already knows that we have received the Pontifical approbation;[16877] thank Jesus Christ for us. Live Jesus!

Letter 107

TO D. GIUSEPPE MUSCARI, PRIOR OF THE MONASTERY OF ST. BASIL AT ROME

Various communications relative to the affair of the approbation and of privileges.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, March 20, 1749.

Last evening I received your very kind favor in which you inform me that Father Villani set out for Loreto[16878] on the 7th; by this time I think he has already reached the place. In regard to the faculties of the Penitentiary, I have written to him several times that he should use greater despatch so that the whole Congregation may receive them. How astonishing! By the grace of Jesus Christ we have received the approbation; a favor so immense that I can hardly believe that it is so; and then a matter that is as easy as the obtaining for the missions the faculties which are possessed by so many Congregations, the Congregation of the priests of the archdiocese, the Congregation of S. Pietro at Cesarano, which are few and not approved;—these faculties I say which I believed could certainly be obtained, we should not be able to obtain!

As for the attestation, Don Andrea did not write to me that he wished the attestation of the Ordinary; he told me that the attestation was necessary, or that I might give him leave to speak. And I have sent it to him.

Now from your letter I learn that the attestation of the Ordinary is required; I have, therefore, written to Salerno, and when the attestation arrives, I will send it to your Reverence, or to another whom you may mention; because after Father Villani has come from Loreto, it seems to me that he will be able to return to the kingdom, so long as he has not on his hands any other important matter about the settlement of which I shall look to him.

I have also written, and I do so again, that he should not fail to procure for us the favor of the privileged altar. As to other privileges, there is no more need of speaking of them at present. It is certain that it has been an important matter to obtain the approbation for which, as we know, your Reverence has done so much. May God reward you for what you have done; and for which I give you a thousand thanks. As for that affair,[16879] we shall not omit to pray to the Blessed Virgin. I also thank you for the trouble, which you took in superintending the printing of the Rule.[16880] As I have already decided and written to Father Villani in my last letters, this Rule I shall have carefully printed at Naples in small form. If Father Villani should be obliged to defer his return among us, you might send one of the Briefs with the Rule.

I do not now write to-day a special letter to Father Villani, because your Reverence may allow him to see this letter; and as for other things he will find them written in my other letters that I have sent by post.

Tell him that I have received ten ducats from P. D. Lorenzo d' Antonio for that transaction of which he knows; if he wishes me to send them by a bill of exchange, I shall do so.

In regard to the Office of the Most Holy Redeemer[16881] there is question, I hope, of the Office with the octave. But I do not see what would have to be suppressed and what would be proper for Venice; for we have examined it, and it contains nothing that might not suit for all places. For the rest I shall acquiesce in what is right.

Recommend me to Jesus and Mary, as we all do not fail to do for you. May Mary the Most Blessed Virgin obtain for us this favor. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa! I bless the journey made by Father Andrea and Brother Francesco to Loreto; I bless their journey home. Tell Father Villani that when he arrives at Naples he should go to the house of Don Giovanni Olivieri; he lives in the street of the Monastery of the Madonna, a little beyond the convent, opposite to the parlor, at the portico that is always closed. There he will find a letter from me, which will tell him what he has to do at Naples before returning here, that is, he is to make a visit to Marquis Brancone and to the Grand Almoner. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I the undersigned, Rector Major of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, accept the oblation and the oath, made by the Very Reverend Father Abbate Don Giuseppe Muscari, of the Order of St. Basil, of persevering in our Congregation by virtue of the permission obtained by him from His Holiness our reigning Pontiff Benedict XIV., so that he may pass from his Order to the said Congregation. And by the power that I possess, as Rector Major of said Congregation, I dispense the same from the year's novitiate, and I now receive him as a member[16882] of our house of St. Michael at Nocera di Pagani this (the date is wanting).

I have already written to you in another letter about Father Bianchi's work against Giannone.[16883] You willl find Brother Francesco opposite the church of the Annunziata of Aversa.[16884] But if perchance you do not find him, as you will perhaps travel at night, leave the book with the priest Don Francesco Romano, confessor of the Annunziata of that city, and tell him that Brother Francesco Tartaglione will call for it, and that he should not give it to anyone else.

Remember that we are ardently looking for you. I embrace Don Giuseppe Rosa.[16885] I hope that now by your religious profession you are entirely ours. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER FRANCESCO MARGOTTA, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT CAPOSELE

The saint expresses his regard for the Archbishop of Conza.—Various affairs.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CARIFI, November 13, [1749.]

I received the letter of Brother Gennaro [Rendina] containing the news. I am happy to hear of the success of the mission. Gloria Patri!

What is to be done about the mission of Caposele? Have patience; give the mission in order to please Monsignor, whose hand you will please kiss for me. Let Fathers Villani and Cafaro remain to give the mission; afterwards they are to set out for this place. It will be necessary to send Father Robertis to Sieti, where a mission is to be opened next Sunday the 15th; otherwise, I will have to leave the place; for God knows what complaints his sisters would make.[16886]

Here is Father Villani writing me for another mission to be given at Conza. What is to be done in the end? If Monsignor really desires the same for Conza as for Caposele, I shall be well satisfied. Tell him that I cannot say no to his wishes. I had already marked out a great number of missions; but on account of the great love we have for him I will postpone them.

We shall give here the exercises to the candidates for ordination. It is necessary for you to go to the mission of Sarno, which is to begin the day after Christmas.

Let Fathers Villani and Cafaro go to Conza and Caposele; if you need the assistance of another Father, let me know immediately. But if you can do without him, so much the better. In this case, let me know this in time.

I am delighted to hear about [Fr. Don Gerardo] Grassi; let him write to me immediately. Please see whether [Fr. Pasquale] Amendolara cannot receive subdeaconship. Tell Monsignor that I take the ordination upon my conscience; meanwhile I am making Amendolara study diligently, and am very watchful. Let him be without fear; if this subject were not capable, I myself would feel a scruple in thus advancing him.

I am giving a little mission at Carifi; I shall have to leave the place Saturday, for I have to set out for Cava where a novena is to be held in honor of Our Lady of the Elm; the picture is to be exposed in order to stop the ravages of the pest prevalent among the cattle at present.

I have just received an excellent priest of Ischia;[16887] he is a good confessor, a good preacher and an excellent scholar. He is about forty years of age; he will be a good subject, for he has the reputation of a saint. He has left us to settle his domestic affairs; he will return within a month. Two others have come from Ischia; one of them is in his twenty-fourth year. I have not even examined them, for they seem to me to be in poor health. Later on we shall see. I embrace and bless all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO THE SAME

He congratulates Father Margotta on the success of certain apostolic labors.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CAVA, November 19, [1749].

I am here at Cava, crippled though I am, giving a novena in honor of our Lady to implore the cessation of the plague. The place is crowded and I shall likely remain eight days longer to give the exercises to the monastery of S. Giovanni.

I received from the archbishop a most courteous letter, which I shall answer. Gloria Patri for your success, for the good will of Monsignor, for the hundred ducats, for Grassi, for Amendolara, and for everything else.[16888] Digitus Dei est hic. [The finger of God is here.] Father Villani writes to me that Monsignor has given the faculties for all the Fathers that go to Caposele; but he does not say for what purpose they are given. I allow you to give those missions up to Christmas; for the day after the feast the mission of Sarno must be given.

I have settled matters with Father Garzilli; I expect him to go to Foggia to have an interview with Fazzioli. If Fazzioli wishes us to take the schools, we must answer that it is impossible.

As for [Don Gerardo] Grassi, let us wait for the Brief; as for Amendolara, let us wait till Lent.

I am expecting the young candidate from Calitri.

As for the others, tell them I will not receive them without the consent of the archbishop; hence after testing their vocation, let them obtain his consent.

Affairs are going on well at Nocera.

With regard to the mission of Melfi, I understand that [Vincenzo] Mannarini's subjects[16889] are to give it. Write me what you know about this affair. I embrace and bless you all in Jesus and Mary. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 112

TO THE SAME

He gives Father Margotta various orders with regard to the sale of his books; he speaks of the reception of novices and of the new building at Caposele.

[End of January, 1750.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I was under the impression that the books[16890] had been delivered at Conza two months ago, and now I hear that not a single book has been sent thither; hence it is necessary for you to send them immediately together with the other works that were asked for; write at the same time to the archpriests to tell them that they can obtain a copy of my book at the price of a certain number of Masses; the moment is favorable; for in a short time I shall have no more Masses. Have patience; be kind enough to do me this favor.

Now, as for the young men, speak frankly to them; tell them that the Consultors here wish to examine them and more rigorously than heretofore; if they do not stand the examination, they have to return whence they came. In the case of that boy who has not attained the required age, I am satisfied [here a few words are missing] with the ten ducats which will be better for him to leave here. The other young man, the notary's son, can also come. It is necessary that they have their patrimony accepted and registered at the episcopal chancery; otherwise what happened to de Angelis,[16891] may also happen to them; difficulties now arise about his patrimony, and he cannot make his profession.

To please Monsignor, tell him I will send the Fathers to give the mission at Auletta,[16892] the first week of Lent; they will, I think, set out on Wednesday from Salerno in a coach which goes to these suburban places, to Selvitella, or Buccino, or Auletta. Six Fathers will be sufficient. As it will be necessary for me to send Fathers from this place, I shall send Fathers de Robertis, Scibelli and Giovenale.

Oh, what difficulties surround me? Mgr. di S. Angelo wishes Father Cafaro to give the exercises to his clergy; and Mgr. di Nocera would like to have two missions during Lent. May the Madonna come to our assistance? Spiritual exercises at Ciorani and spiritual exercises at Iliceto! The Fathers are nearly exhausted.

If you should have no means of communicating with the nephew of the archpriest of Muro, have patience! Poor young man! I pity him sincerely. He wrote me a letter expressing his ardent desire to come to us. I am told that he is an angel, and moreover a very bright and able youth; but his parents are opposed to the step he wishes to take. Well, see whether we cannot help him in some way.

We are expecting Don Benedetto;[16893] we are praying for him.

Your Reverence will please see that the building be completed for this summer, so that it may be occupied in September; and for this purpose I beg you to purchase sufficient lumber and all the required material. Lime you have already. Do not forget what I say. It appears to me that a thousand years are yet to pass before I shall see the house ready and the exercises given. When I visit you after leaving Melfi, I hope I shall find everything in good order.

I am somewhat troubled about the Masses that are in arrears. I beg you to settle the matter quickly with the priests of Caposele, Calitri, Teora, or elsewhere. Tell them to say a hundred or at least sixty-two Masses according to my intention, during the month of February. Please do me this favor to relieve me of my scruples; let me know how you have settled the matter.

If you receive their promise to say the Masses during the whole month of February for the eight or nine books, you need not trouble yourself about the other matter.

Ask permission of the archbishop to give the mission at Melfi; I wish to have you with me on that mission which I shall open the Sunday after Easter. Do not forget poor Amendolara.[16894] I embrace and bless you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Send me the books immediately, and let me know. I have already made the intentions with regard to the books marked below. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

of the Most Holy Redeemer,

Rector Major.

Letter 113

TO THE SAME

He tells him to remain more at home, and to moderate his mortifications.—Details relative to novices.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

[CIORANI], January 23, 1750.

I have received the last letter that you wrote me from Atella.[16895] I have felt some displeasure in hearing that you are still in this place. A sojourn so prolonged outside of the house annoys me. Remember that you are now Rector. In future, endeavor to keep yourself free from similar embarrassments. I have already answered the Bishop [of Melfi] that in regard to the exercises to be given at Melfi, such a thing is not possible at present. When the Rector is absent from home all things go wrong. Resolve in future to stay at home as much as possible except when one or the other mission is to be given, or there is some real necessity.

I imagine that on his part the Archbishop [di Conza] is complaining that I am sending you hither and thither. This would be very disagreeable to me if it were the case.

I hear besides that your health is shattered. For mercy's sake, take care of it; retrench all those mortifications in eating, etc.—Now it will be better for you to practise obedience.

You have embarrassed me by that other mission at Auletta. The Fathers are exhausted. In short, on the return of Father N. for Lent, we shall speak to him about it, and make arrangements. In future dispose things in such a way that you may avoid giving missions in Lent.

Father Villani has written to you about Frater Amendolara; I also recommend him to you myself. Make out the memorial as regards the requisite qualifications, and endeavor to spare him a journey for the examination. Assure the archbishop on my conscience that he is a capable subject. I have always directed his studies; he is capable of being not only subdeacon but priest.

I also recommend to you to write to N.—You undoubtedly know that he wished to return, and was only awaiting my consent. I have written to him to come to me, since his conscience was at rest in regard to the wants of his family; but I have not as yet seen him. Perhaps my letter may not have reached him; write him again the same thing in my name.

O what a trouble to me is the mission that is to be given at Auletta; so much expense, and so much fatigue for the Fathers at this time, and with such roads! why? for the sake of a mission. Think at all events of the means of conveyance, since at least six missionaries will be needed.

The son of N. has again been examined, and in the same way has been found incompetent; besides to judge him by what he says, I should think that he has no vocation. He has also not yet reached the proper age, and his father is inclined to do but little for him; this would be at least a pretext for dismissing him.

As for the other young man,[16896] I adhere to what I have written you. Let his uncle at least contribute as soon as possible the twenty ducats that he has promised. This is little enough for one year and so many months during which he is to stay with us before entering the novitiate; but we must try to obtain at least this sum.

As to the two young men of N. and of N.,[16897] I have already written to you about them. N. may come; for as he is obliged to escape secretly, we cannot, at least for the present, exact the twenty-five ducats. In regard to the young man of N. he may also come; he is capable; since after having examined him, Father N. and the archpriest, who is his uncle, I believe, tell me that they are satisfied with him, and that his affairs are in a good condition. See to it, therefore, that his patrimony be settled, that we be assured of the twenty-five ducats, and then let him come.

Gloria Pairi! There is such a concourse of young men that we can scarcely receive them all; provided however, they be good, I shall not lose confidence.

For mercy's sake go to bed in the evening immediately after the ringing of the bell; I have been told that you sometimes sleep on the floor. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 114

TO THE SAME

Grave exhortations.—Duties of a Rector.—Necessity of dying to one's self.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, February 1, [1750].

I beg you to read this letter with attention and to preserve it, because in future it may be of service to you.

Before all, to speak freely to you, I say that I do not think that you would wish to be treated with delicacy and consideration in reference to matters concerning obedience, as if you were a weak subject and a man of no good will. This, between you and me, is the case with some members of the Congregation. I have a different idea of your Reverence; for I am convinced that you wish what is most perfect and agreeable to God.

Let us now come to the point. You know that I have always esteemed you and that I still esteem you; facts have proved this. I should regret if anyone would recall vividly to my mind what has already been told to me, namely, that you are a saint, but that you are not fit to be Rector, perhaps for the following reasons: That as Superior you are but little at home; there is wanting the necessary order in all that regards the house and regular observance; that your Reverence takes upon yourself the care of a multitude of useless things, piglia tante gatte a pettinare,[16898]—so many letters, so much correspondence, so many unsuitable occupations, etc., especially, however, so many devotions to which you appear to be attached, to the detriment of regular observance.

We are all convinced that you do not go out, that you do nothing unless it be for God; but, ne quid nimis [not anything too much]. Now that you are in the Congregation, above all as Superior, you should think that the greatest glory that can be given to God is, that you watch over the maintenance of observance and the good of this house, which is one of the best, and even, I may say so, the best that we have. It is true, as at present your number is small the order of the day, etc. cannot be entirely kept; but why not adhere to it when it can be done conveniently? Hence in regard to sleep, be kind enough to listen to me. I beg you to go to bed at the time fixed by the Rule, at least for the night. All that I permit you is the half hour that I have granted you; nothing more. After that, if you have to attend to some necessary affair, you may do so in the morning by omitting prayer at the time of rising, and you may act thus only in some other very rare case that may present itself at the most once or twice a year. But this half hour you must measure by your hour-glass, so that you must be in bed as soon as the half hour has elapsed; and this is to be understood only when you are at home; for when you are on missions, charity towards your companions requires that you should go to bed when the others do.

As for going out, you have already noticed that when the head is wanting everything gets out of order. I do not however forbid you to go out when there is question of some affair that concerns the house or the Congregation, or the glory of God in a matter of importance; but if for the glory of God you wished to avail yourself of every occasion that presents itself to you every day, in every part of this diocese, you would not be able to be at home for a moment. The greatest glory of God and the will of God require, I repeat, that you watch over the interests of the house, of the church Mater Domini, and of regular observance, so that there may not be verified in you what others have suspected.

I write to you with all affection, because I esteem you and esteem you much; I have a high idea of your merit, and I hope that you will be one of those who in the Congregation wish to sanctify themselves like Fathers Cafaro, Villani, Mazzini, Fiocchi, Ferrara, etc., who are dead to their own will, and you would not wish to resemble certain others whom I must treat with great consideration. I will treat them in this manner; but I see that they will not become saints like those whom the Superiors can, according to my usual expression, cut to pieces. You see that I speak to you with sincerity and for your advancement. Why have you given yourself to God with all that you possess? In order to sanctify yourself. What misfortune would it then be for you if now you should not attain this object! God has wished and wishes, as you see, great things of you; but what he chiefly desires is, that you should be dead to your own will and to your own gratification. You know better than I that this is the essential point, and merely by entering the Congregation, you have made a sacrifice of your will; beware lest you take back the least part of it; for this would surely hinder you from attaining sanctity. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO THE SAME

Joy at seeing him humble and resigned.—Different details.

CIORANI, February 7, [1750].

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your letter, so expressive of humility and of resignation, afforded me the greatest consolation. I expected this, and for this reason I took that liberty with you. You know now how I esteem and love you.

I agree with your Reverence with regard to the young men of Morra; it will be very difficult to induce the bishop to accept the patrimonies presented; he may give the same answer that he gave in the case of Niccolò. Now, as soon as the patrimonies are settled and signed before law, you may send the two young men, but with the understanding that they are to undergo an examination.

Try to send Don Paolino [Scibelli], as I told you in my last letter. I shall be satisfied if he arrives at the beginning of the mission. I am also asking Don Angelo[16899] to render some assistance.

If [Don Pasquale] Amendolara does not go to the archbishop in person, he will not be able to effect anything.

I know the debts contracted in the building of the new house.[16900] But remember that the archbishop after giving one hundred ducats of his own money and contributions from other priests, wishes to see the building erected. Act with your usual prudence, and do all that you can to have those rooms that were lately planned, finished as quickly as possible. That arrangement about the books in return for the Masses is working admirably, as you wrote to me; however, I ask your Reverence to see whether others who have not taken the obligation upon themselves, are saying the Masses.

Only ten requests for books, as I wrote to you, were sent in from the diocese. Now do not send more than this number, and do not send away any in future without letting me know, and then I shall write to you. It is true that I have certain other Masses; but still I wish first to be informed. For these ten copies they will have to say Masses during the month of May. I have already made the intentions; you may give the Masses to whomsoever you wish; with regard to other books please write to me first. As for those ten copies destined for the diocese, I wished to say that if now you can dispose of eight or nine of them for Mass-intentions, it will not be any longer necessary for me to procure an exchange of intentions. But this is with the understanding that the Masses in payment of these eight or nine books be celebrated during the month of February; for if they should be said during the month of May, it would be necessary for you to obtain for me an exchange of intentions, and I should repay you in May.

It will not be necessary to have one hundred Masses said on a loan; seventy-two will be sufficient. Mind well, seventy-two are sufficient. Remember this, no more, otherwise I shall find myself in trouble. Please then tell me when, and on what day you give or have given the aforesaid books, either to persons in the diocese, or in any other place where you can also give them if you wish.

I have already received the twenty carlini together with a list of twenty Masses from Brother Gennaro [Rendina].

I embrace and bless you all; salute for me Don Angelo [Latessa].

He rejoices to hear that he is in better health,

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, March 11, [1750].

I feel sorry about Father Tannoia, and I am glad that your Reverence is better, and that I have before me your letter. In regard to the saying of Mass, you must be obedient to the doctors. Here the news was received that you were worse, and we have therefore begun a novena to the Blessed Virgin for your Reverence.[16901]

Tell Father Rector [Don Carmine Fiocchi] that this morning, at a late hour, the Fathers will go to Santa Maria Maggiore.[16902]

Propose to the doctors whether it would not be better to send as soon as possible Father Tannoia to Iliceto to inhale the air of Puglia.

On Monday when Angelillo returns let him bring me all our books on Moral Theology, namely, those of Busembaum that are there. I have to send them elsewhere. Those books only need remain that are in plain binding. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa! I embrace and bless you all.

Send to me Angelillo every Monday, and on Sundays and Wednesdays as soon as the carrier from Nocera brings the manuscripts. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 117

TO FATHER FRANCESCO MARGOTTA AND TO HIS CONSULTORS

J.M.J.

Orders left after the canonical Visitation made in the house of Mater Domini in Caposele, May 16, 1750.

The present state of this house for want of a dwelling suitable for our Institute induces us to urge upon the Superior the necessity of making some improvements in it, so that regular observance may be established.

We further ordain that a door should be made from the church leading to the well, as also that a lock should be put on the door of the sacristy, and finally, that there should be appointed a secular procurator who is to collect what is due to the house.

This is what we have thought well to ordain for the present Visitation, confiding for the rest in the prudence, piety, zeal, and rare qualities of the Superior of this house, which are well known to us.

TO CANON D. GIACOMO FONTANA, AT NAPLES

He sends him his book "The Glories of Mary."

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, October 12, [1750].

I send you my work on the Madonna. This poor book has met with many contradictions;[16903] it was finally published after many difficulties, and a labor of many years employed in condensing what it contains.

I have been suffering from a catarrh of the chest, but at present I am better. We shall see each other at Naples, shortly. In the meantime recommend me to the Madonna, and believe me,

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] I send you two copies of the work. One is for you, the other is destined for Don Matteo Testa[16904] who, I am happy to hear, is better; be kind enough to send it to him. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I have already sent two copies to Signor D. Giacomo Martorelli.[16905] He will have received them by this time, I hope; if not, he will receive them soon. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO A GENTLEMAN OF VITOLANO.[16906]

Arrangement about a mission.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES, November 7, 1750.

I received your second most esteemed favor here at Naples where I am engaged in giving a mission at the church of Spiritu Santo. I have already answered Signor [name illegible], and the mission has already been arranged. I cannot go myself, but my companions will serve you and the gentlemen of Vitolano to whom I have also written. After the mission at Gesualdo,[16907] they will go to Montefalcione, and from Montefalcione[16908] they will send word to those gentlemen of the day of their arrival. So I have written to my companions and they have written to me that they would act accordingly. Everything is now arranged [some words illegible]. Live Jesus, Mary!

Letter 120

TO SISTER MARIA DI GESÙ, A CARMELITE, PRIORESS OF THE MONASTERY AT RIPACANDIDA.[16909]

Answer to a difficulty in regard to holy Communion.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 30, [1750].

I answer your letter briefly. As for continuing to be guided as you were before according to the advice of your old director, I not only think this to be good, but it is even necessary; otherwise you could not know with certainty the will of God.

In regard to the union with God which your soul experiences after Communion, you should be without fear; you do not commit an act of idolatry; for it would be idolatry if you adored yourself.[16910] It is an effect proper to this sacrament to transform the soul into Jesus Christ so that the soul may say with St. Paul: Vivo ego, jam non ego, sed Christus in me. [I live now not I, but Christ liveth in me.] Endeavor therefore to check yourself so as to allow nothing to appear in the presence of your Sisters; but for the rest, abandon yourself to God, and do not put any obstacles in the way of the divine operations. All that you have then to do is, to annihilate yourself before God, and to offer yourself to him without reserve to the end that he may dispose of you according to his will.

I am pleased with what you tell me about the newly professed, and especially about the daughters of Don Benedetto:[16911] let them pray for me to Jesus, their divine Spouse. Now tell me what I can do at the bishop's to be useful to you and to oblige the Community which is so dear to me. You are all of you in my eyes more than my own sisters; for I know that you love Jesus Christ, my Master. Recommend me without ceasing to Jesus Christ—me and the Congregation, and let the Sisters do the same. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

ALFONSO,

TO CANON GIACOMO FONTANA, RECTOR OF THE URBAN SEMINARY OF NAPLES.[16912]

He asks him for information in regard to the studies at the seminary.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 28, 1951.

My dear Canon: Be so kind as to tell me in a few words what rule is followed in the seminary in regard to the study of theology. I should like to know how much time is devoted in the morning to study in the rooms, and how long the class lasts. What is done after dinner? When do the theses, conferences, repetitions take place? What is the occupation in the evening?

I should like to know, moreover, whether during their course of theology, the students also follow another course either of the study of languages or of another science. Please furnish me with these details and recommend me to Jesus Christ. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Believe me, my dear Canon,

Letter 122

TO FATHER FRANCESCO MARGOTTA, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT CAPOSELE

He complains of a lay-brother and of Father Margotta himself.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, March 7, [1751].

I hear in regard to Brother N. that by his bad conduct he renders himself disagreeable, not only to the Community, but to strangers, especially by his disrespectful way of speaking to the Fathers, by his rudeness and his stinginess. I draw your attention to this last point: for pity's sake, if the food given by the Community is simple and frugal let the Fathers and the Brothers at least not suffer in this respect. What good does it do to build within and to demolish without? If anyone loses his vocation through our fault, we shall make ourselves accountable to God. It will be necessary that I withdraw this Brother from your house and send him to Ciorani to be the assistant of the cook. Give him a severe reprimand, and tell him if he becomes incorrigible and does not conduct himself as a lay-brother should, I shall be obliged, notwithstanding the interest that I take in him, to expel him from the Congregation. After what has happened in Father N's case I am resolved to be no longer indulgent. For him that does not wish to live in the Congregation as he should, the door is open; I do not wish to lose my soul for the sake of any one. I beg you to tell him all this word for word.

As to what your Reverence writes to me, namely, that I should not give you any command, because it would place you in an embarrassing position and make you run risks,—I must say to you, my dear Francesco, that I give you no command, but such language is displeasing to me. Consider, my dear Francesco, that in this way you will surely never sanctify yourself, and if you wish to live in the Congregation in such a manner that the Superior may not give you any command for fear of embarrassing or making you run risks—grave words which your understanding did not dictate and which have caused me singular pain—your interior trials[16913] will always increase; for then you take back your will which you have given to God; then the Lord will leave you to be a prey to your own troubles of conscience, and I know not what will then become of your eternal salvation. I beg you to reflect on this before the crucifix, and to write to me in regard to this matter so as to remove my anxiety.

I moreover hear that you have perhaps changed your director by leaving Father Paul [Cafaro]. This I should very much regret; for if that is the case, I should think that you have left him without a good reason, simply because he does not enter into your views. It seems to me however that this is not the right way. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 123

TO A NUN OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER, AT SCALA

She should allow herself to be guided by obedience.—The way of desolation is the way of divine love.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, May 30. [1751?]

Gloria Patri! You say that you have been brief, and it is almost a memoir that you have sent me! Yes, to oblige you, I answer you, although my first letter should have sufficed; I answer you in order that you may become still more tranquil, and before writing I recommended myself to the Blessed Virgin. I assure you that you are in the state of grace, and that God wishes to sanctify you by means of these tribulations. You should not desire that the Lord should conduct you by an easier way; allow yourself to be guided as it pleases him. I see with satisfaction that you often invoke God and Mary; but I desire that you should ask him for the grace of always doing the divine will, by always offering yourself to God and by praying to him that he should treat you as he pleases. You pray for consolation, and such a prayer will help you but little, because there is too much self-love in it. Ask our Lord for the grace of loving him; but it does not matter whether he makes known to you that you love him. You write to me that you have confidence in w hat I may enjoin by obedience. But upon whom, think you, should I enjoin anything by obedience? Upon God? I cannot give any command to God; and if I could, I would not do so, because the road on which he conducts you is the best road for your salvation, and I clearly see that God is thus surely conducting you to his love. If you wish that I should give to the devil the order that you desire, I must declare to you that I do not wish to have anything to do with that beast. I therefore give you the order if you have confidence in me; for if you have no confidence in me, of what use is it to lose your time in writing to me and to make me lose my time in answering you?

Hence I tell you in the name of God, and repeat what I have said, that you are in the state of grace, and that he certainly wishes to lead you to sanctity on the road on which he keeps you. If you depart from this road to withdraw yourself from the sufferings and tediousness that you experience, I do not know what will become of your eternal salvation. Continue to move onward as you are doing; offer to God all this anguish; pray to him that he may give you strength to bear it, that he may not deprive you of it, and do not ask for consolations. Why should you speak of exorcisms, possessions, and visiting holy sanctuaries? In the name of obedience, think no more of them, and drive from your mind every thought against your vocation. If you lose your vocation you will lose your soul and your God. But you will say, How shall I be able thus to hold out? Have patience; such is the good pleasure of your Spouse, who very much loves you; yes, believe me, he loves you much, and does everything for your good. It would be to you sweet consolation to know that in all that you suffer you give pleasure to God; now suffer for God, even without knowing this; this will be far better.

If you answer me that it is possible for me to be deceived, I would then say to you that it will no longer be necessary for you to write to me; seek another director in whom you have confidence, come to an understanding with him, and let there be no question about me.

I command you, moreover, in a formal manner, never, never, never to confess these temptations, even if you believe to have consented to them. I say this and take it on my conscience. Do not do so even if you were at the point of death; for there is no sin in all that, as far as you are concerned. The sentiments of which you speak are apprehensions, fears; but they are not sins.

But you will say that just the contrary appears to you to be true.—But I say to you, you have not to believe what appears to you to be true, but what the ministers of God say to you.—And when I shall die? If I die in this state, with these temptations, these sentiments, this affection for sin?—I say to you that if you die in this state, your salvation is sure.

Well then! I repeat, preserve this letter, and when new trials assail you, go in search of Sister Maria Angiola, and give her this letter to read. Then, I impose it upon you as a matter of obedience, that you do all that she tells you to do, that you believe all that she tells you, although it may appear to you that new circumstances have supervened.

Recommend me always to Jesus Christ, especially now when I have to go to Naples. This will be in the month of July, and God knows how many months I shall have to languish there on account of our affairs. Here we are in a house full of sick people; recommend to Jesus Christ so many young men who are thus sorely tried.

I send regards to Sister Maria Raffaella, Sister Maria Angiola, Mother Superior, and other Sisters; let them all recommend me to Jesus Christ. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO FATHER GIUSEPPE MUSCARI.[16914]

Immense wrong that he has done to the Congregation.—Entreaty that he should no more bring the Institute into disfavor.

[CIORANI, October 16, 1751.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

It is now two nights, my very dear Father, that I have not closed an eye. It is impossible for me to find peace when I recall to mind the disaster brought upon our poor Congregation, which was once so dear to your Reverence, and which has become so odious to you since you have entered it. I could not at first persuade myself that you took any part in the loss of vocation of these unfortunate young men; but now I am convinced that you did both by what they have told me themselves, and by what I have since learned from others. I do not here enter into any details; it would be useless and you would grow only more incensed. You know, my dear Father, that I loved and esteemed you before you had co me among us. You also know since you entered what I have done for the purpose of honoring you as much as is possible to do in a poor Congregation such as ours is. I confided to you from the very beginning what I would call our most precious treasure, our young men. I conferred upon you at once the title of Professor, Prefect and spiritual Father of these interesting young men. In order to prevent all ill-feeling, I sent away from Nocera Father Mazzini an estimable and edifying member of the Congregation.[16915] This was done not without fear; you understood it well.

You will say, my apprehensions are groundless. Alas! experience has but too well proved that they were not without foundation when we see the ruin of four young men, who were truly angels, and who yesterday morning presented themselves before me like so many furies. I began to entreat them with the most tender affection; I went so far as to throw myself at their feet, begging them to put off at least for three days their departure, which they wished to take at once. Poor children! I loved all four of them as the apple of my eye, because they had been real angels, who had particularly distinguished themselves by their sincere humility, edifying all the rest. Yes terday, however, you would have been scandalized yourself had you witnessed their violent agitation, the arrogance with which they spoke to me, the tone of contempt and menace in which they cried out against the Congregation, going so far as to say that they would have recourse to his Majesty and denounce me as trying to keep them back by force, because I refused to grant them the dispensation from their vows and their oath. Good heavens! it was they that bound themselves to Jesus Christ, and they accuse me of holding them back by force! And why then did I not grant them the dispensation for which they had asked? Was it not because I loved them, because I had compassion on them, and because I saw them sacrifice their vocation on account of a mere temptation of the devil?

But enough of this. I do not wish to give you more annoyance; for I very well see that every one of my words must give you pain. Yes, enough of this. Yet neither I nor the Congregation has deserved such treatment from you. I forgive you, and I beg Jesus Christ to forgive you; because I still esteem you, because I love you, and because I entertain the hope that if now you do not open your eyes to your present condition, a day may come when the Blessed Virgin will make you know and deeply deplore an error that has been so fatal to the Congregation and to these four young men. Nothing can dispense you from the obligation of acknowledging this; for the public loudly accused you of having betrayed the Congregation; the very stones can attest this.

You have written that you would not do the Congregation any harm, that you would even try to be useful to it; well! I conjure you to-day not to inflict any injury; for you would thereby outrage Jesus Christ himself. We are only in this world to suffer and to labor in order to gain poor souls for Jesus Christ; no one knows this better than you. But I tremble to think that hereafter at the very name of the Congregation, the devil may recall to your mind the object of your greatest hatred, and that he may persuade you that you have no other means of justifying your conduct than to defame us. Do not follow this suggestion, my dear Father. I write to you in all sincerity and with tears in my eyes. I entertain the hope that when the passion that actuates you against us and against our wise counsellors has subsided, you will by facts show that the love that you once bore towards our Congregation has again entered your heart.

As for your effects and your books, have no anxiety. It was your person that we have loved and desired, not the objects that you have brought with you. Now it is only your person that I regret to lose; I disregard all the rest. Once more; it is you that I love, and you are not ignorant of my affection and my esteem; as for anything else be without fear; you will be perfectly satisfied.

I remain, yours most respectfully, etc.

TO THE VICAR-GENERAL OF BENEVENTO

He asks him to do a service.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, November 4, 1751.

Very Reverend and dear Sir: I recommend to your charity our Frater de Angelis, who is truly an angel of virtue. He will call upon you with a letter[16916] in reference to the settlement of his patrimony.

At the beginning of the month I will send our Fathers to serve his Eminence[16917] and your Reverence in certain places of the diocese of Benevento, and if I can render you any other service, I shall be at your command. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 126

TO THE FATHERS AND BROTHERS OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

Means of preventing the loss of vocation.—Various ordinances regarding the missions.

[November, 1751.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph!

My very dear Brethren: Know that I am not afflicted to hear that any one of my brethren has been called by God to another life. I am touched by such a thing, because I am a creature of flesh; yet I am comforted because he has died in the Congregation; for then I hold for certain that he is saved. Nor am I afflicted when any one among us, because of his faults, ceases to be a member of the Congregation; on the contrary, I am happy to see that we are delivered from a sickly sheep that might have infected others. Far less am I afflicted because of persecutions; for they inspire me with courage, because if we conduct ourselves well, I am sure that God will not abandon us. But what alarms me is, to hear that there is among us any one that is negligent, that obeys little and pays no attention to the Rule.

My Brethren, you well know that several who have been with us are now out of the Congregation. What their end will be I know not; but I am sure that they will lead a life of continual misfortune; they will live in trouble and die without peace for having abandoned their vocation. They have left us to live more happily and contentedly; but the thought that they have abandoned God to live according to their own caprice, will never leave them one day of rest. They will practise with difficulty the exercise of prayer, because in prayer they will be harassed by remorse of conscience for having left God; and thus they will abandon prayer, and God knows where they will end.

I beseech you to avoid deliberate faults, and above all those faults for which you have been reprimanded. If correction leads the delinquent to amend, the fault will be nothing but when he does not amend, the devil will employ every artifice to make him lose his vocation. It is by this means that he has already caused the loss of so many others.

By the grace of God, whenever we go on missions we perform wonders; people say that they have never had a mission like ours. And why? Because we go by obedience, we go in poverty, we preach Christ crucified, and each one is attentive to acquit himself of the charge that has been imposed upon him. I have, however, been deeply grieved to hear that some among you when on missions have been desirous of obtaining the more honorable employments, such as preaching or instructing. But what fruit could he produce who preaches through pride? This is something that I view with horror. If this spirit of ambition enters the Congregation, the missions will do little good, or they will produce none at all.

I have also been informed that some of you have begun to preach in a flowery style. I repeat that the familiar style is that by which the missions, novenas and spiritual exercises are made successful. In all the sermons, even for the festivals of the saints and other special occasions, I wish that everyone should speak familiarly without a studied tone of voice or choice expressions. When one preaches to priests or before a select audience, one should not use in the discourses phrases so popular as those that one uses when preaching to the people composed of educated and ignorant persons; one should however always speak familiarly; and I pray to Jesus Christ to chastise in a signal manner whoever wishes to introduce a figurative style. Let us take care; for it is certain that pride has driven many out of the Congregation.

On missions pay attention to the food. What aids us to make our missions give great edification is, that we are satisfied with the little that the Rule permits in accordance with what has been our practice heretofore. During the time of the missions I absolutely forbid the eating of chicken or of other things forbidden by the Rule; I will hardly allow in case of accidental sickness the eating of chicken when such a thing has been prescribed by the physician. It would be better to find some other remedy. The same prohibition extends to the case in which one stays at a house in passing from one mission to another, because this time still belongs to the time of the mission.

I also forbid[16918] all the Superiors and Ministers without my express permission to allow women of whatever rank to enter our houses, to go to the refectory or the kitchen. I moreover forbid the Superiors to give subjects permission to procure certain special things for their own personal use; if they need these things, let the Community furnish them. I forbid the subjects the keeping of money that is at their free disposal.

My Brethren, let us conduct ourselves well before God, and God will aid us in all the persecutions that men and demons may raise against us. I pray every day, and several times a day, for you all and for each one of you, and I desire each one of you to recommend me in a special manner to Jesus Christ. I conclude by blessing you all, one after the other.

BROTHER ALFONSO MARIA,

Rector Major.

TO MOTHER MARIA DI GESÙ, AT RIPACANDIDA

The interest taken by the saint in the Community at Ripacandida.

[December, 1751.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Be without fear; I have punctually received your two letters, and I thank you for your charity. As for going to see you, my dear Mother, the thing is not possible at present. My health will not allow me to make such journeys; besides, I am very busy having a work printed for the use of confessors. I have therefore not a moment to spare this year, and I never leave the house. Later on, who knows? If God wished the foundation,[16919] nothing is impossible before God. Mgr. [di Melfi] is much in favor of it; but the difficulty is to receive the king's permission. Pray then for this intention. Who knows what will happen?

But if I do not go to Ripacandida personally, be not disturbed. To give the retreat I will send you a Father with whom, I hope, you will be satisfied. In the meantime tell me what I can do for you with Monsignor to be useful to you and to oblige your Community which is so dear to me. You are in my eyes more than my own sisters, for I know that you love Jesus Christ, my Master. Write me the request that I might make of Monsignor in regard to the confessor and the procurator, and always recommend me to Jesus Christ.

In regard to the servant, I have spoken about the matter to Father Fiocchi, and I see no difficulty; the more so as she had already entered; and if she went away it was on account of health. Besides, the other servants are all a little sick.

As to the chorists, I beg you to be firm and not to allow the number to go beyond twenty-one. I have told Father Fiocchi that if he ever uttered a word to the contrary, he should take it back and write to you.

TO FATHER PIETRO PETRELLA,[16920] AT ILICETO

Obedience to Superiors is the most essential thing in the Congregation.

Live Jesus and Mary!

NOCERA DE' PAGANI, January 5, [1752].

I have been informed that in your house the new Superior, Father Gallo,[16921] is not much respected, perhaps because he is young. Let all the Fathers and Brothers who are members and will soon be members of the Community, understand that it is my wish that every Superior whom I send (even though I should send a stick) should be respected as if he were myself; and I wish that he should be esteemed and obeyed like myself. Should anyone not wish to do this, your Reverence should promptly inform me, and it will then be my duty to inflict upon him an exemplary penance, and in the end if there be no other remedy, I shall be obliged to expel him from the Congregation, even though he were my own brother. If you take away from the Superior all esteem and obedience, of what use will then be the Congregation? If the Superior does something that appears to be wrong, let the subject write to me; in the mean while obey, and do not murmur among yourselves. Read this letter to the members of the Community, and from time to time your Reverence should send me a report about this matter; this I expressly enjoin upon you. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

TO FATHER CARMINE PICONE.[16922]

Request to sound the disposition of the Archbishop of Conza on one point.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 15, [1752].

My dear Carmine: Now that you are there, if any one of you should have an occasion to see the archbishop, as is probable before your departure, let him ask him what we should do with the nephew of Father Ferrara[16923] who is doing exceedingly well and who declares that he would rather die than go away.

Do not show that you take the affair too much to heart; but recommend to the archbishop this poor young man, who gives great hopes. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 130

TO MOTHER MARIA DI GESÙ, PRIORESS OF THE CARMELITES OF RIPACANDIDA

How she should behave in the absence of her director.—Various counsels.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 27, 1752.

I answer you in a few words. Although I sympathize with you in your sufferings, yet I am consoled in seeing you and your companions placed on the cross; but I regret to hear of the disquietude of your Sisters,[16924] which appears to me to be excessive. It is true, you tell me, that they are resigned; but the resignation is not perfect when it is accompanied with disquietude. Ask them for me whence comes this disquietude; perhaps because they do not find such a director as they would desire? But when God wishes this to be so, why should that which pleases God displease them? It is certain that God wishes this to be so, because it is thus commanded by the bishop. It is useless to say that the bishop has been misinformed; for though the bishop may have been deceived in this matter, yet it is certain that God wishes this of you. Besides, I hold for certain that the bishop had good reasons to act in this manner, either to put an end to the talk, etc.

But you will say, What shall we do without a director? What! is God no longer here? How many souls have sanctified themselves in grottoes, in deserts, in which they had no other companions than birds and trees? When we have a director that is suitable, and do not wish to avail ourselves of his services, God will give us no assistance; but when such a director is wanting, as is frequently the case outside of Naples, to the great regret of many good souls, then God takes charge of everything. The Lord will not fail to assist those that seek him with their whole heart.

Read this letter to your Sisters, and after some time write to me again; console me with the information that you and your companions have thrown yourselves into the arms of the amiable Jesus, who allows himself to be easily found by the soul that seeks him.

Have no scruple, neither now, nor later, for having written to me without permission. It is sufficient that I tell you this, and do not try to find out the reason. But tell your Sisters, who are also my sisters, to keep this a secret from everyone, from the confessor, and even from the bishop.

As for the supernatural graces, recommend to the Sisters never to speak of them to that confessor, and I give you the same advice in regard to whatever may concern you; tell him only your faults in order to receive absolution from time to time. Let the Sisters make known all the rest to yourself; and you, as a general thing, after having heard them, will answer that those things are dreams and effects of the imagination, and that the important thing is to wish only what God wishes, to embrace and to love sufferings, contempt, poverty, and contradictions. Take care that the Community observe in a perfect manner obedience, prayer, and poverty; with these three things perfection will always increase in the monastery. In your familiar discourses, in the Chapters, chiefly revert to these three points.

The fears that you experience console me; I tremble for souls that rest too securely in their spiritual affairs. However, I do not wish any disquietude; the true fear of God produces not disquietude, but peace and joy. For myself, I assure you that God is with you; what more do you wish? and as for the things that concern you and that you have communicated to me, I regard them, for the most part, as the things of God. That is enough. In all your fears, say: My God, I wish only Thee. Then be calm, and banish all uneasiness; for after what you have written to me, I have also discovered a certain excessive disquietude, which does not please God.

I pray for you and for your Sisters. But do not fail, you and your Sisters, to pray in all your Communions for my soul, for the Congregation, and also for the foundation at Rionero, on the subject of which I fear that the bishop has grown indifferent. Impose this upon your Sisters in all their Communions. We have on our hands an important affair concerning the Congregation. Moreover a Father who is very useful to the Institute is sick.[16925] To my intention make a novena of nine Hail Marys every day to obtain these favors, and ask for them during the nine days in holy Communion. Remain in the hearts of Jesus and Mary. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 131

TO FATHER SAVERIO ROSSI, MINISTER OF THE HOUSE AT CIORANI

Penance which he imposes upon a lay-brother for having committed a grave fault.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, 10, [May, 1752].

Brother Francesco deserves no compassion; however as he has spent many years in the Congregation, and has humbled himself, we desire to be indulgent towards him; but he must accept a penance that will be long and severe.[16926]

Take the habit from him, and let him wear the secular dress, since he no longer belongs to the Congregation, having been dismissed, and his condition is like that of an ordinary postulant. In this point we cannot be indulgent. Let him remain secluded in the novitiate; he should not come to the refectory, to recreation, and should not go out. In regard to meals, impose also some mortification upon him, which I leave to your prudence. Help him or have him helped as to his spiritual wants. He may receive Communion once a week.

Tell Don Angelo Antonio[16927] to come some day to see me, for I wish to instruct him what and how he should study.

Send me again a little roasted coffee. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Tell Brother Francesco that it is to me that he owes this indulgence, because I wish him well. I hardly think that another Superior would have done all this for him. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

BROTHER ALFONSO.

Letter 132

TO FATHER FRANCESCO MARGOTTA, PROCURATOR-GENERAL OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

He begs him to regard the poverty of a house of the Congregation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, June 2, 1752.

A Mass-intention should not be taken from Iliceto, for Father Fiocchi (I did not think of telling you) celebrates Mass for this house at Pagani, which has no other revenues than those derived from Mass-stipends. In fact it is impossible in view of the circumstances which you know to force the debtors to pay at the present time. They give you threats for an answer. Patience then, for pity's sake. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Oliviero writes to me that when he called upon the book-seller of whom you spoke, Tournely had been sold. I have told him to look for it elsewhere. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER PIETRO PETRELLA, AT ILICETO

He grants him various permissions.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, June 7, 1752].

Yes, I received your second letter, which it was not necessary to answer. When you are not well, obedience in regard to study is not necessary; when afterwards you are not using medicine, you may apply to study during the hour that I have assigned to you. Tell this to the Superior and also mention to him the obedience under which I have put you, and then do what he says.

Yes, go to take the baths, and be guided by your Superior.

Blasucci[16928] is at Caposele: we are going to see how he will get on there, and afterwards we may think of what is to be done. As for Andretta, go there with a companion. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 134

TO MGR. BORGIA, BISHOP OF CAVA

Details relative to the vocation of a young priest.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, June 7, 1752.

I have received your last most esteemed letter, and at the same time another letter from the house at Ciorani in which it is stated that the parish priest of N. and another relative of the said priest had arrived there. They made a new assault upon the latter so as to make him set out for his home, etc. I am, however, informed that Don Antonio strongly insists that he will on no account return home, because he fears that he will lose his vocation in the midst of so many temptations that he foresees will assail him. My dear Monsignor, under such circumstances, I do not dare in conscience to dismiss him, and to order him positively that he should return home. I should feel a scruple if I did so, after what the young man has himself told me, and according to the letter which I sent your Reverence yesterday, which I hope you have already read. God knows what remorse I felt when I suggested to him the other day that he should go to his own home at Naples. In order to satisfy his relatives and not to see us disquieted by what his father has threatened to do, if he remained in our house, Don Antonio is at present ready to go to some monastery of monks until the tempest has subsided and the danger that threatens to disturb us has ceased. I have, therefore, written to the Fathers at Ciorani to favor this design and to send this subject to some religious house other than ours outside of Naples; because it would be inexpedient to have him stay at Naples, under the present circumstances. After this has been done, I do not know what else the relatives could claim, since no other order could come to us from Marquis Fraggianni, or from the Palace, than that he should be sent to a neutral place. This once happened to Father Fiocchi, who obeyed the order, and afterwards returned to the Congregation. I urge this the more, since I hear that the mother is already beginning to be more tranquil, and the father will hardly carry out what he has threatened to do. For the rest, my dear Monsignor, do not doubt that I will not receive the above-mentioned priest into the Congregation unless you have given your consent. I remain, very respectfully, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 135

TO FATHER ANDREA VILLANI, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT CIORANI AND MASTER OF NOVICES

Various details concerning the novitiate and the house at Ciorani.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, 14, [June, 1752].

As for Don [Angelo] Antonio, I have no doubt that he will succeed, since his father himself says that he has always been an angel of virtue. But we must wait and try to satisfy Mgr. Borgia. This is sufficient; later on you may shorten his novitiate by adding this time to it.

As for the young man of Riccia and as for Pietro Picone, they may begin their novitiate.[16929]

In regard to Melaccio and Cimino, do what your Reverence thinks best.[16930]

I am glad to hear about the altar, and I give my blessing for artificial flowers and candlesticks.

When recited privately it seems to me that it is not forbidden to use the usual formula.

For your guidance, a letter has been written [to Naples] to Don Giovanni [Oliviero], and the latter writes me that he is going to open the subscription without delay.[16931]

I have appointed the consultors for Iliceto; but write again to this house: they are Fathers Ferrara and Carbone. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Tell the Vice-Rector [Father Saverio Rossi] about what [D. Andrea] Sarnelli writes, that he should do what he says, and procure some alms; at least let him endeavor to satisfy Don Andrea and to inform him that what has been ordered has been done. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Let Father Saverio come to an understanding with the Baron [Nicola Sarnelli] in regard to the place where the church[16932] is to be. Live Jesus and Mary!

BROTHER ALFONSO.

[P. S.] I send the prospectus of the subscription, Oliviero writes that in October the first volume will be issued.

Send me your manuscript copy of the exercises of the missions; and if yours cannot be found, send me at least that which Father Buonamano has copied. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 136

TO THE SAME

Various affairs.

[June 19, 1752.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I have received the writing. As for the ambrette-flowers;[16933] you may send them later, if there is no risk in the delay.

As regards the lot it is sufficient to talk about the matter and come to some agreement; and so, in regard to the demand of Don Andrea Sarnelli, it is enough if he sees that something is done.

I am glad to hear about Father Corpo;[16934] do what you think will be best.

After the morning and the evening meditation, say a Salve Regina with the prayer Defende for the house at Iliceto which is passing through great misery. The people of Iliceto have become our opponents, saying that they wish to have there a seminary.

To-morrow, Tuesday, I must go to Salerno on account of Sarnelli's affair.[16935]

Don Angelo Antonio has informed us that his infirmity is but too true, that he cannot apply his head to anything, and that during these past few days he was quite ill. He himself has doubts about his vocation; hence I plainly told him that the Congregation was not the place for him. He at once started this morning for Cava. I gave him a letter addressed to Monsignor. I wish him a safe journey!

He was a good young man, but he had not studied, nor could he study, nor be confined to the house; I therefore would have been troubled with scruples had I received him. As to the watch, I spoke to him about it; but when I handed it to him he said that nothing further need be said about it. He said Mass for Ciorani up to Friday.

On Thursday send me Father [Gerardo] Grassi, if he is there, or another Father to be the companion of Father Lorenzo [d' Antonio] for the novena at S. Matteo.[16936] Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

In reference to Father D. Antonio [Tannoia], yes; do as you think fit; you may send him to Pagani. It will also be necessary to send to the same place Father Celestino [de Robertis] if his chest-trouble does not become better. But try, if possible, to send a little help to Pagani. Letter 138

Humility, but profound humility, is the true safeguard of perseverance.

[July 27, 1752.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

My dearest Fathers and Brothers in Jesus Christ:

I pray God to drive out quickly those proud spirits who cannot and who will not bear in the Congregation any reproof or slight, not only from Superiors, but even from their equals and their inferiors. And I beg of the Lord to drive me out the first if ever I should be led by this spirit of pride. See how this cursed spirit has driven Father Tortora[16937] out of the Congregation: and I thank Jesus Christ for this, because such subjects ruin the Congregation and keep back from us the blessings of God. He that is not determined to be as earth, and to let himself be trodden under foot by all, let him go, and go quickly. Our Lord will be more pleased with the perseverance of two or three that are really humble and mortified, than with a thousand such imperfect subjects. And what have we come to do in the Congregation, if we do not wish to bear even some slight for the love of Jesus Christ? How shall we have the face to preach humility to so many people, when we ourselves have such an abhorrence for humiliations? But since we are all miserable creatures, I beg each one of you—and that your Reverences may the better remember what I now say, I even give you the obedience, to ask of the despised Jesus, every day during the meditation or thanksgiving, the grace to bear contempt with peace and cheerfulness of spirit; and the more fervent shall positively pray that Jesus may let them be despised for the love of him. And let him who will not make this prayer from his heart and with the desire of being heard fear lest his pride drive him out of the Congregation, in the same way as pride has already driven out more than one.

Next, I earnestly recommend you never to talk among yourselves of the affairs and of the proceedings of the Superiors. Those that are led by this spirit of indiscreet zeal do much more harm than good to the Congregation. Those that are really zealous, when they perceive some disorder or want of observance, should tell it privately to the Admonitor of the house, or even inform the Rector Major of it; and if they perceive that even the Rector Major neglects to remedy it, they should speak or write to his Admonitor. Let all pay attention to this point, otherwise they will cause me great displeasure, and will oblige me henceforward to mortify them severely. And let us be careful to guard against small faults, because the devil makes use of these little foxes to destroy the Spirit of God, and even our vocation. Therefore, my dear Brethren, let us always strengthen ourselves by meditation and prayer, otherwise we shall succeed in nothing.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very affectionate confrère,

ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] I, the undersigned Rector Major, impose upon all the professed members of our Congregation or Society and give the formal precept of obedience to them not to leave any of our houses without the express permission of the local Superior, except when any one wishes to speak to the Rector Major or the Sovereign Pontiff: in this case he is yet obliged to ask the permission of the local Rector; but if he does not obtain it, he may set out, without however staying at any other place.

He congratulates him on the detachment that he showed in regard to his relatives.

NOCERA, September 16, [1752].

Your letter to Father Pentimalli has given me much consolation by acquainting me with the beautiful sentiments with which you are animated in regard to your relatives; I wish all were so disposed. I permitted Father Pentimalli to send you to Ischia, because I thought that you perhaps desired to go there; but as your Reverence is unwilling, I repeat, I am consoled, and I do not tell you to go there. TO A FATHER OF THE CONGREGATION

A great trial to which the Congregation is exposed.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES, Saturday 23, [September, 1752.]

I am to remain here till Saturday a week. Next Thursday our affairs will be transacted. Let us pray to God that at least the houses may be left to us. Marquis Brancone has insinuated to me that I should give up two of them. However, if the houses are left to us, we shall be obliged in looking for revenues to abandon ourselves to the will of God; for things will then go badly. But if we had not had Brancone we should perhaps be now dispossessed; for in the last council the king spoke perhaps most strongly against us. Let us, therefore, be satisfied with the things as they are, and with the decrees of divine Providence.

Communicate this to the other chorists according as prudence may dictate, in order that they may pray fervently during these days in which we are not yet out of danger. This morning I had a lively dispute with Brancone, and I am astonished that he is not tired of our affairs. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 141

TO THE KING OF NAPLES

Petition to obtain the exequatur of the Apostolic Brief Ad Pastoralis dignitatis fastigium—a Brief given in confirmation of the Institute of the Most Holy Redeemer).[16939]

[September, 1752.]

Alfonso de Liguori, a Neapolitan priest, and his companions, missionaries of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer humbly represent to your Majesty, that it is already nineteen years that they are devoting themselves to the spiritual culture of the abandoned people in country places. They travel over the mountains, visit the huts of the shepherds and places most destitute of spiritual help, to instruct these poor people by missions, instructions and other devout exercises. They have now succeeded in giving about forty missions a year, in the space of at least nine months in the year, during which they consecrate themselves to this kind of work. The great and general good that is seen resulting from this work in many provinces of this kingdom where the missions have been given, has stimulated the zeal of some bishops and has induced them to introduce said Institute into their dioceses; thus it is established in the diocese of Salerno at Ciorani; of Nocera at Pagani; in the diocese of Bovino at Iliceto; in that of Conza at Caposele. In each of these places the missionaries have their own house where they live together, and this is done with the consent of your Majesty who has even deigned by several royal decrees addressed to the civil tribunal to approve the great benefit of this work by applying to it the superfluous income of the laic chapels, an aid that could not be procured, as there was no income over and above the expenses that were incurred by them.

Then the number of the subjects having increased in this Congregation, in order to establish in perpetuity so great a good, a petition has been addressed by its members, as well as by the bishops of the dioceses above-mentioned, to the present Sovereign Pontiff, to obtain through his apostolic authority the confirmation and approbation of the Institute and of the Rule of this Congregation. And now after the information gathered by the Sacred Congregation of the Council, to which His Holiness entrusted this affair, there have been obtained, conformably to the wish of the examiners, the apostolic Brief of confirmation, which begins with these words: Ad Pastoralis dignitatis fastigium. No use, however has been made of this Brief, hoping that your Majesty would deign to grant the exequatur, as we hope to obtain by this petition.

This is the reason why the undersigned humbly have recourse to the royal clemency, and beg your Majesty to grant them the favor of the said exequatur in order that in this kingdom may remain established this work which concerns so much the glory of God and the spiritual good of those subjects that are most abandoned. The latter are ignorant even of the most necessary things of faith, especially the shepherds who live in the territory of Puglia, belonging to the royal patrimony of your Majesty. The undersigned missionaries have also taken a house in this last mentioned Province in order to bestow every care upon those poor shepherds, the number of whom is about forty thousand.

Confiding, therefore, in the great piety and zeal of your Majesty, the petitioners humbly present the Apostolic Brief and hope to obtain the favor that they solicit.

The saint recommends to her prayers Marquis Brancone on account of the resolution that the latter had formed.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 12, [1752].

We have run a great risk of seeing the Congregation completely dissolved; but by the grace of God the king afterwards honored us with a very favorable decree. Marquis Brancone has strongly sustained our credit; please, my dear Mother, recommend him to God. I also beg you (this in confidence) to make a novena to his intention. He is filled with uncertainty; there is question whether or not he should renounce his charge in order to devote himself to his own salvation by leading a private life. I have dissuaded him from this project; for the good of the Church requires that he should not give up his post. After the novena let me know with what the Lord[16940] has inspired you. Recommend me to Jesus Christ.

Let the Carmelites, the Dominicans, etc., and others, whoever they may be, come; do not deviate from that which I have written to you. Write to me about the doubts that you have; but abridge your letter as much as possible. I knew that the Carmelite Father had forbidden you the daily Communion. I have created a noise about this with Monsignor (but say nothing about this). I know not what he will do.

He thanks him for the interest that he takes in the Institute.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 25, 1752.

I have received your very dear letter, and I thank you for the great affection that you bear towards this poor little flock of Jesus Christ in the midst of persecutions. The tempest that hell has raised against us is not a small affair; but the Lord has turned it all to a good account; for the king who was at first somewhat against us, is now in our favor. It is true that in the decree some restrictions have been placed upon us; but we are satisfied with the result, because the work is now approved and established; and this is most important. For the rest, if we remain poor, it is sure that as long as we conduct ourselves well, God will not fail us. I know that you have always been our protector, and I hope that you will ever be so. I recommend myself to your prayers, and I wish you a happy, new year, that is a year full of love for Jesus and Mary. I remain, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER BERNARDO APICE,[16941] AT CAPOSELE

He refuses to grant him permission to change his abode and tries to quiet him.

[1752 or 1753.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I received a letter from Father Paolo [Cafaro] that I should send you to Iliceto. But I see that this is not the will of God, but a temptation of the devil who sees the good that you are doing in the place where you are. If you go to Iliceto what good will you do there? Father Paolo says that all things appear to you to be black at Caposele. But if you give yourself up entirely to obedience, they will all appear to you to be white. Hence I beg you to devote yourself to the doing of God's will, otherwise you will everywhere be full of disquietude. At least write to me what it is that troubles you in that house; it may induce me to make a change; for so far I do not see what can be a sufficient reason for altering my views in your regard. My dear Bernardo, know that I have always wished, and do now wish, well to you. Be calm, for your disquietude will also be mine. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Confidential letter in regard to the ordination of a subject.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, February 10, 1753.

Right Reverend and Dear Sir: I ask your Lordship to read this letter privately, and then to destroy it.

Don Angelo Antonio Grazioli[16943] is anxious that I should ask your Lordship to confer upon him during this Lent the last two sacred Orders. In regard to the interstices, he would himself, he says, ask the necessary dispensation at Rome. I therefore write to you on this subject; but for the rest, your Lordship may do what you think will be best before God.

As for the foundation,[16944] I beg you, Monsignor, not to take any steps before we have had an understanding with each other; for a favorable moment must be chosen if we do not wish to risk ruining both the foundation and the Congregation.[16945]

With respect to Don Angelo Antonio, be so kind as to write me a letter which I may give him to read; but do not say, I beg you, that I wrote to you so dryly. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Begging your blessing,

I remain your Lordship's,

Letter 146

TO MOTHER MARIA DI GESÙ, A CARMELITE AT RIPACANDIDA

He refuses to allow a Father of the Congregation to be extraordinary confessor, and exhorts her to remain firm in the defence of regular observance.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, February 23, [1753].

I answer your two letters. I rejoice that you are laboring to re-establish regular observance. Continue, and be firm. In reference to your doubts, recommend yourself to Jesus Christ, and go ahead.

As for your request that you make to me to grant you Father Fiocchi as extraordinary confessor two or three times a year, how can I consent, since that is expressly forbidden by our Rule? What! do you wish me to be driven out of the Congregation? If the consultors hear that I am introducing such an abuse against the Rule, they may expel me. I highly esteem your monastery and your Rule; but I cannot do what is against our Rule. You know how difficult it is to remove an abuse when it has once been introduced; I hope to be able to die with the consciousness of never having permitted any. If I should grant to your monastery what you ask, I could not refuse it to others, or at least, the Superiors that come after me would grant it after my example; and thus you see the Fathers would give up the missions in order to become extraordinary confessors and to give retreats to religious. I should be very glad if you would make this clear to the bishop, whom I very much esteem, and to whom I regret to be obliged to refuse anything.

The answer that I am now giving you will appear without doubt very harsh; but I should wish that you were in my place. If you were Rector Major you would speak as I do. I know by experience what fine things I have been obliged to hear from my confrères when I have given any permission that was against the Rule, though there was question of matters by no means so important as this. You may also write to Father Fiocchi; you will see that his answer will be like mine. May this, however, not prevent you from recommending me to Jesus Christ, just as I do not omit to pray for you and for all your Sisters.

I do not answer separately the letter that Sister Maria Cherubina has written to me; but as there are no secrets between you and her, I here say to her as well as to you, and to all the other fervent religious: Be firm like a rock; answer resolutely the bishop, the Carmelite Father, and all the others, that you have made profession according to the Rule of St. Teresa; that you wish to observe it punctually, ad literam [to the letter]; and that no one can exempt you from it. The Carmelite Father will speak perhaps in this manner, because the Rule has been mitigated for the nuns of his observance; answer that you do not wish to follow the Rule of these religious, but the Rule of St. Teresa. Remain firm; Jesus and Mary will sustain you.

You should do this yourselves, because Father Fiocchi cannot place himself in opposition to the bishop; but you yourselves can well do this when there is question of defending regular observance. You have scarcely begun, and you already wish to have your Rule mitigated! But if the Rule is now mitigated, what will become of the Rule fifty years hence? Indeed, poor religious are those that ask for a mitigation of the Rule! I pity them; for they will have to render an account to God not only about themselves, but about all the others. I pray you, be firm! If you think fit, you may communicate these my sentiments to the others. If you were to inform me that the rigor of the Rule has been relaxed, you would make me lose all the affection that I entertain for this monastery, which I at present esteem so much. Tell Sister Maria Cherubina that she should incessantly raise her voice against the Carmelite Father, who is trying to bring about a mitigation; let her have no scruple in this respect. Of what use is it to look for directors and to ask for Father Fiocchi? It is your Rule that should direct you; keep your Rule, and you will all become saints.

As for me, I will see what I can do in this matter. At all events, banish from your mind the idea of having Father Fiocchi twice or three times a year as your extraordinary confessor: that is impossible; it is forbidden to us to exercise this function even once, outside of the time of the mission.

Write about this to Father Fiocchi, and tell him also to write to me about it. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 147

TO THE SAME

Signs of illusion.—How to act in reference to extraordinary graces.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, March 28, [1753].

I have received your last letter through your brother. Relatively to the direction by Father Fiocchi, I am satisfied with the sensible and holy answer that you have given me; for you may rest assured that what I do not do for your soul, I would certainly not do for any other. Moreover, I cheerfully permit that Father Fiocchi should answer all your doubts, and I shall also allow him to call upon you sometimes.

As regards what you add, namely, that you are in great fear and uncertainty, and that several Fathers tell you that you are laboring under an illusion and that you are in error, I am more glad to hear this than that you raised ten dead persons to life. All this gives me the assurance that you are not under an illusion nor in error. Persons that are led astray by illusions fully believe in their errors; but you fear illusion, and this is a sign that you are not deceived. Pray therefore to Jesus Christ to preserve you in this fear, if it contributes to his glory. I moreover, in the name of Jesus Christ, command you to dilate your heart towards God, and act as you did before, with liberty and great confidence. I assure you that you are neither deceiving yourself nor are you deceived. Receive with affection and without fear the lights and the marks of tenderness that the Lord gives to your soul; and in future banish all fears as temptations, whatever others may have said and still say to you.

Those directors had the best intention in speaking thus to you, since they have followed the general rule which requires that favored souls should be humbled and kept down lest they fall into pride. This rule, however, does not apply to your soul. You are not going to boast of ecstasies or of prophesies. You are not going to publish to the first one that you meet what concerns you, as others do, whereby they certainly give rise to the suspicion that they are under illusions, and that they are deceiving others. I know that you do not speak except in case of necessity, when you ask aid and counsel.

On the other hand, God gives you enough light to know what you are, and what you merit because of your defects and your miseries. Is there, then, any reason why you should be deceived by the devil? What! the devil! No, no; it is God who keeps himself near you and around you, because he wishes you to belong entirely to him. Hence when he removes the veil to speak to you by communicating to you his lights, begin by humbling yourself when you see him granting such favors to so ungrateful a soul; abase yourself by considering your nothingness; then, confiding in the mercy and infinite goodness of the Sovereign Good, abandon yourself as a dead person to his tender arms, and receive with gratitude and affection all the lights and all the other favors that he lavishes upon your soul. May they cause you to humble yourself still more, and to redouble your zeal and fidelity in his holy love. I also recommend to you, when God leaves you alone and does not bestow upon you any caresses, not to complain either interiorly or exteriorly, not to become disquieted on account of their absence, nor to seek them, because there may be some illusion in this search. Henceforth, I repeat, do not be disturbed about what is said of you; as an answer, say within yourself: I wish only God,—and then remain quiet. Uneasiness suits only the soul that seeks everything else but God.

Preserve this letter in order to derive strength from it when others again disturb you. If anything particular happens to you write me briefly the substance of it; I shall then steal a moment, as I do now, to answer you; yet only in a few words, as I have not a moment's time. Furthermore, I beg you not to raise so many doubts, and not to wish to know in everything whether or not it is God that speaks, as this solicitude may injure you. With God, with this infinite Goodness, we must walk quite simply and honestly. Do therefore what you think is best, and move onward.

In meditation, if you experience dryness, always sustain yourself by prayer and by continual offerings of yourself to God; but as soon as the Lord speaks to you, abstain from speaking, and open your soul to receive all that he has to communicate to you. In all your prayers remember my soul. Never forget to recommend the souls in purgatory and poor sinners. Pray especially for Naples, where it is said there are many atheists who deny the existence of God; remember them as well as our Congregation. Take courage! God is with you. Dominus illuminatio mea et salus mea; quem timebo? [The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear?—Ps. xxvi. I.] May Jesus be our love and Mary our hope! I am having printed a little work on the "Manner of Conversing with God:" I shall send it to you.

[P. S.] One word more. I have written to the bishop to ask him to give you permission to answer Brancone. If he gives you permission, answer the Marquis that you do not forget to recommend him to God without ceasing, in order that the Lord may give him the necessary light and strength to walk on the right road by defending the interests of the Church in the position that he occupies; and you must encourage him. It matters little that his letter was lost; for it contained nothing more than a request that you should recommend him to God. Answer him then, as I have indicated, if you receive permission, without saying that his letter was lost. You may say without scruple: I answer your letter, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER CARMINE FIOCCHI[16946] IN LACEDOGNA

He speaks to him about some missions that he wishes him to give.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, April 2. [1753?]

Mgr. [Antonio Manerba, Bishop] of S. Angelo wrote to me for a mission to be given after Easter; I wrote back to him that I would serve him; but his nephew again wrote that the affair would be spoken of when Monsignor returned home. See therefore that the time of this mission be fixed for the Sunday in Albis [Low Sunday]; because if the date is not acceptable, we shall have to go to Frigenti and then to Fontanarosa, as I have promised Mgr. [Felice Leoni, Bishop] of Avellino. And then in Avellino itself; that is, in the diocese of this name, we should have to proceed to Villamaiana and S. Stefano.

We shall have to repair to Trevico and Flumari, which have also been promised. Take as many subjects as you can from Caposele and Iliceto, and I will send you others from this place; you most divide them between Trevico and Flumari, since the spring is short. You must, therefore, write at once and appoint the time, so that all may be prepared when you arrive. The first mission will begin in Dominica in Albis [Low Sunday]. Give my regards to Don Michelangelo Colabella, and tell him that I have recommended him to the Madonna. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

At Naples I have obtained important favors for the Congregation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 149

TO THE NOVICE PIETRO ANGELO PICONE,[16947] AT CIORANI

He consoles him and admits him to religious profession.

[The beginning of June, 1753.]

Live Jesus and Mary!

My Son: I have learned from your letter and I had already heard before, that the doctor has said that your native air may do you good, and I have acquiesced in the desire that you have in regard to your health. For the rest, you have not given me any cause for complaint, and since you do not care about going to your native country, I am satisfied if you go for a change of air to any one of our houses. I have already ordered that you should be sent to our house at Caposele whence if the air does you no good you may pass to the house of Iliceto; and I desire nevertheless (tell them about it) that about July or August they may allow you to take the waters of Monticchio. I am moreover satisfied that on the feast of St. Louis you should make the vows, since you so ardently desire to do so. You see now whether I wish to drive you out of the Congregation.

During your illness do not apply yourself much to study. Take care of your health, go out walking in the mornings, do what the doctor says, and pray every day for me. I will not make you stay either here or at Ciorani, because the air of these two places has not benefited you. Let us see what other climates will do for you. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO A SUPERIOR OF THE CONGREGATION

Change of abode of two subjects.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

June 25. . . .

Write to Signor Nicola Santoriello at Caposele and ask him to send to Iliceto the young tailor Nicola, as I learn that he has recovered. Then write to Iliceto that they should send to Pagani either Nicola or Brother Romualdo, whichever of the two needs most to go there for his health. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa! I remain, etc.

Letter 151

TO MOTHER ANGIOLA OF DIVINE LOVE,[16948] A CARMELITE AT CAPUA

He asks her to use her influence with the Queen of Naples to obtain the approbation of the Institute of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, July 4, [1753].

I have received your most esteemed favor, and I first thank you for the remembrance that you have kept of me, and then for the recommendations that you have made for me. You are right, my dear Mother; it is not prudent to present the Brief if circumstances are not favorable.

I have suffered from pains of the body, especially from headache; yet I have never forgotten to recommend you every day at Mass. On your part, I beg you, continue to recommend me to our Lord that he may make me entirely his. That is the important thing. For the rest, and in regard to the approbation, God will provide.

However, my dear Mother, when the Queen arrives at Caserta, do not forget what I wrote to you in my last letter.

The whole difficulty rests upon the acquisition of property. His Majesty the king may do in regard to this whatever he wishes; we shall accept anything. If the king wishes that we should never be allowed to possess anything and that the bishop should only be permitted to furnish us with some alms, he has but to command, and we will obey. It is sufficient that he gives us the approbation and that he does not thus leave us in suspense. If the king knew that we were making this proposition, I believe that he would be appeased, seeing that we do not wish to possess anything. But who will make this proposition to him? If I could speak to him, I would do so; but the king grants no audience. I have tried to have an interview, and the thing was impossible. But the Queen can speak to him if she wishes. Enough. When the moment comes I beg you to submit to the Queen this proposition.

I continue to hope, my dear Mother, that our dear Lord will use your intervention to establish this work destined to save so many abandoned souls. Who knows whether God has not disposed this favor of the Queen not only for the benefit of your reform, but also for the success of all that is undertaken for his glory! However, if you think that the glory of God is not concerned in our approbation, I will not ask that you should any more speak of this affair. Now I think, and I always say, that the Lord wishes to mortify my pride, and that this approbation will not be obtained before my death. Dominus est: quod est bonum in oculis suis, hoc facial. [It is the Lord: let him do what is good in his sight.—I Kings, iii. 18.] May Jesus and Mary not cease to diffuse over us their blessings.

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO,

Letter 152

TO SISTER ANNA CAMILLA DE' LEONI, IN THE MONASTERY OF THE MOST HOLY SAVIOUR AT ARIANO

He exhorts her to bear her interior trials courageously, and writes out for her a rule of conduct.

NOCERA, July 5, 1753.

Modicæ fidei, quæ dubitasti? [O thou of little faith, why didst thou doubt?—Matt. xiv. 31.] It is nothing, it is nothing, it is nothing. I even assure you that God loves you now more tenderly than ever. You fear on account of the things about which you speak to me; and I fear that the Lord, to punish your pusillanimity, will not make the trial cease to which he has put you in order to make you entirely his. I assure you on my conscience that you are in favor with God, you love God and God loves you. If you could see, while you are reading my letter, the love which he who is the infinite Good bears you, you would die with joy.

I see from the tone of your letter that God in his goodness wishes to raise you to a sublime state of love. Do not place any obstacle in the way. And do not believe that the obstacle comes from the multitude of sins which frighten you, as you say, and which you call the sins of hatred of God and of the Sisters who speak of God, the displeasure of being a Christian, the desire of being damned, the wish of calling the devil to your aid. Do not positively make any account of those thoughts, desires, temptations against faith or against any other matter; do not by any means confess them, and always receive Communion, notwithstanding all those incitements to despair, and however horrible may appear to you those desires; for in all this you commit no fault. If you had not committed any sins in the past, you would be at this moment as innocent as a child. In order to commit a sin there must be full pleasure and the full consent of the will; you, on the contrary, detest these things, although the darkness, the trouble, and the aridity in which you are make you believe that you are giving consent. The obstacle which in my opinion you can put in the way of your spiritual progress is your importunity in praying to God to deliver you from these troubles. You do not feel the love of God; but thank God that you have it; if you did not possess it, God would not make you feel the pain that you have, I wish to say, the fear in which you now are of offending him or of having lost his friendship. The more desperate you feel, the greater confidence you should have. Honor this infinite Goodness by taking as the measure of your confidence in him the greatness of the chastisements of which you acknowledge yourself to be worthy. Nullus speravit in Domino, et confusus est. [No one hath hoped in the Lord, and hath been confounded.—Ecclus. ii. 11.]

I send you this little work. Keep a copy of it for yourself; give one to the abbess; put another in the choir for any one that may wish to read it. Read a little every day out of this book. But let us proceed to what you should do in the state in which you are.

First, humble yourself before God, and acknowledge yourself worthy of every chastisement. Then, as I have told you, far from asking to get rid of this state, offer yourself to remain therein your whole life and through all eternity if so God wills. Ask him only to help you to avoid every fault, particularly tedium and little resignation to the divine will. Cast yourself like one that is dead into the amiable embrace of Jesus, your Redeemer, by assuring him unceasingly that he can do with you what he pleases, provided you love him and are pleasing to him. Say to him: O Lord, here I am! I no longer belong to myself, I belong to Thee; do with me as Thou wishest. I care not for pains, provided they procure Thy glory. I do not desire consolations; it suffices if I belong to Thee and love Thee. Then, rejoice and be consoled by remembering that the infinite Good, the object of your love, is infinitely happy.

Secondly, while in this state guard against giving up your exercises, and particularly Communion. Even ask your confessor, under the pretext of making some novenas, to increase if possible the number of your Communions while you are under this trial. As for the apprehensions of which I have spoken, namely, the hatred of God, despair, incredulity, etc., do not confess them. And when you call upon your confessor, let not this be in order to seek for consolations, but only to obtain strength in your trials. In the state in which you are, take care to obey punctually, and show the same obedience to the Superiors of the monastery. In this kind of trial all must be done forcibly and against one's will; but in this is found the good Measure of God.

Thirdly, have recourse to the comforter of the afflicted, the Blessed Virgin by saying to her: My good Mother, have pity on me! As for prayer and thanksgiving after Communion, do not trouble yourself if you find yourself distracted, sick and tired, and if you think that by your thoughts you are displeasing God rather than pleasing him. It suffices that you simply say from time to time: My God, my Jesus, it is Thee alone whom I wish, and nothing more. And it is sufficient if you say this with the superior part of the will, without any sentiment; say it by the glance of the eye at the crucifix, at heaven, or at the Blessed Sacrament; and that will be sufficient.

Fourthly, do violence to yourself so that you may not show melancholy in the presence of the Sisters. Try to appear joyful as much as possible, and be obliging to every one; and if some impatient words should escape you, do not trouble yourself; for in the state in which you are God will have greater compassion on you.

In the midst of these trials, recommend my poor soul to Jesus Christ, for these trials render you dearer to his heart, and he most willingly hears your prayers. Courage! be without fear. God wishes you all to himself.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

TO THE MASTER OF NOVICES

He should employ kindness and discretion towards the novices.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I beg you to treat N. with great kindness. He must remain in the novitiate like a novice; but he must accuse himself with the other professed. Tell him that he is a member of the Congregation, because this is a sore temptation to him. Endeavor to encourage him.

Now that the hot weather is coming, moderate the exercises of the novices; let them go out often and diminish their application; for we see how all become ill. Let them gradually copy the exercises of the missions, and see to it that they learn by heart at least two or three exhortations, Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER ANDREA VILLANI, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT CIORANI

The saint acquaints him with the serious illness of Father Paolo Cafaro, and asks his prayers for the latter's recovery.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 5, [1753].

Gloria Patri! Father Paolo Cafaro is very ill. Read this letter and return it to me. There is great need of fervent prayer. I have asked for prayers at Scala and at all the monasteries of this part of the country. You and all the others will please say ten Masses for Father Paolo; I shall do the same here; beg in a novena with a litany. Please say for nine evenings three times the Our Father, the Hail Mary and Gloria Patri, in honor of the Most Holy Trinity for the favors granted to the archpriest of Ripacandida,[16949] and to solicit the recovery of the sick man through the merits of this servant of God. Please send immediately the same request for prayers to the monasteries of Solofra, Saragnano, S. Giorgio, and Penta, as soon as you can do so conveniently, but it would please me very much if you wrote to Solofra immediately.

Write to Iliceto to tell them to begin the novena together with the ten Masses; let them make the novena also for [Marquis] Brancone.

I wish you could come here to-morrow, or Wednesday or Thursday, to settle several points.

Letter 155

TO FATHER FRANCESCO GIOVENALE,[16950] MINISTER OF THE HOUSE AT CAPOSELE

Prayers prescribed for the recovery of Father Cafaro.—Triple obedience imposed on the sick man.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 6, [1753].

May God be ever blessed and may his holy will be done! You did well in sending for Cappuccio[16951] and also for Boegio.[16952] This sickness is probably a coagulation of blood and the effect of an epidemic that is perhaps prevalent among you; hence I think a cold water treatment would be beneficial. For the rest, I frankly admit, I am not a doctor. The illness is becoming very serious. Prayers are needed. I have already requested prayers to be said at the convent at Scala and at different monasteries of the neighborhood. Please ask the monastery and the town of Calitri to say the litanies of the Madonna; you might also ask at Guardia and at Pescopagano, where Father Paolo [Cafaro] lately gave missions. Besides the novena to the Madonna (which you are to say also for Marquis Brancone, as I promised him) you will also say ten Masses for Don Paolo's recovery; I have ordered the other houses to do the same; and during nine days, recite three times the Our Father, Hail Mary, and Gloria Patri in honor of the Most Holy Trinity, in order that Father Paolo may receive his health through the merits of the archpriest of Ripacandida, Giambattista Rossi, who works so many miracles. If perhaps you have some relic of this holy priest, apply it to the sick man; if you have none, try to procure one at Pescopagano.

As for Father Paolo, as soon as he has recovered from his stupor, please read to him these three points which I give him:

"I, Alfonso, as your Superior, taking the place of Jesus Christ, give you the obedience and command you to calm yourself and to believe with all confidence that you are in the state of grace, and that God in his infinite Goodness loves you dearly. If the Lord calls you to the other life, do not forget to recommend to him the Congregation and my own miserable self.

"In the second place, I command you to ask from God your cure, if it be for his glory, in order that you may serve him with greater fervor and zeal.

"In the third place, I give you the obedience from our Most Holy Redeemer to get well if it be for the glory of God."

This is for Father Paolo.

I am writing to-day to Naples and am telling Father Margotta to go to your house.

I should gladly send Father Mazzini but I will not do so, for I fear the epidemic which I think is at present prevalent there. It is not good to risk the life of this good Father, who God knows is in a poor condition and is using remedies.

Please tell Father Paolo when he is well to let me know what he saw and heard in that dream of which Father Picone spoke.

You may easily imagine the affliction in which we are; hence I ask you to let me know how Father Paolo is getting along after the obedience that I have given him.

You and all should earnestly pray to Jesus Christ and to our Mother Mary; say the litanies in the church, morning and evening.

I bless you all; let us resign ourselves entirely to the will of God, if we wish to obtain graces.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 156

TO FATHER FRANCESCO MARGOTTA, AT NAPLES

He informs Father Margotta of Father Cafaro's illness.—He asks him to return to Caposele.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 6, [1753].

Blessed be God forever! We are plunged into new afflictions. A messenger came yesterday from Caposele with the sad news that Father Cafaro has a very malignant fever accompanied by a certain stupor, so that they were obliged on the second day of the attack to blister him. They wrote to me that they would like to have your Reverence return to them. I say that you for the present may regulate your movements according to the business that you have in hand.[16953]

I say, for the present, for if Father Paolo grows worse, it will be necessary for you to go to Caposele.

Let the Brother [Francesco Tartaglione] take with him to Don Giovanni Oliviero the enclosed fifteen ducats which I am sending him.

May the divine will be ever done! Judge how much concerned we are for Father Paolo. Pray and have all prayers possible said in one or the other monastery.

TO FATHER FRANCESCO GIOVENALE

Recommendation in regard to Father Cafaro's illness.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

[NOCERA], August 9, [1753].

May God's will be always done! If God calls Father Paolo to himself you will have to govern the house, and in the mean time I shall be thinking of sending you another Rector.

If Father Paolo should die, put off his funeral oration until we are able to gather from Cava[16954] and other places the necessary particulars. However, I have not ceased to place my hope in Mary, my good Mother. I hear that water has been given to him, but I did not yet learn that oil of almonds had been administered to him.

You may imagine how great is our affliction; I am, especially so afflicted, that I have become like one stupefied. Yet I have not lost all hopes that our Mother will leave him among us for the glory of her Son.

If he dies, tell Apice[16955] to send me the particulars that he has gathered. I shall afterwards send him the rest. If the sick man should happen to become better, send me at once a messenger. I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

If Father Paolo is still alive, tell him from me to hear with submission what I impose on him in the name of obedience; then, whether he regains his senses or not give him the obedience that I have sent you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 158

TO THE SAME

Sentiments of resignation to the will of God inspired by the death of Father Cafaro.[16956]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 14, [1753].

May the divine will be adored and fulfilled forever! God's will is our will. Father Paolo will assist us more in heaven than on earth. We must now be resigned; God wishes this of us, and we must obey.

You may bury him apart from the other graves; you may also deliver the funeral sermon if you think fit. Send out invitations that there may be many present. After Father Apice[16957] has finished the funeral oration, please send it here that we may also deliver one.

Let your Reverence, as I have already said, act as, Superior for the present; I shall send a Rector afterwards. Send me all Father Paolo's manuscripts for safe-keeping. If then you should wish for any one of his sermons, you may write to me and I shall then send it.

As for Father Paolo's picture, if you are not able to procure one that is well done, we have a good one here. We could then take this for a model.

Send me, I repeat, all his manuscripts and memorandum books and a small piece of his habit. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I have already determined the Rector for your house; it is Father Giovanni Mazzini, and God knows what pain it causes me to send him away to please your Archbishop [of Conza]. Now send a Brother with a mule for the journey. Have confidence, great confidence! Father Paolo has to do more for us above than he could do while here below. He has to obtain for us the exequatur, but quickly, quickly.

Write me the particulars of his death; let Father Apice send me a detailed account. I embrace you all in Jesus Christ, hoping that you may all die as Father Paolo died. Now let us become saints, let us observe the Rule strictly. These deaths are warnings for us. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

BROTHER ALFONSO,

Letter 159

TO THE SAME

He should govern the Community at Caposele till the arrival of the new Rector.—Various measures.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 21, [1753].

I have been wishing to send Father Giovanni [Mazzini]; but the news spread in regard to your surroundings is so frightful that I cannot make up my mind to expose this excellent subject to any dangers.

I have received the manuscripts, but I regret that the instructions on the virtues have been lost. See whether someone has them, and try to recover the instructions given at Melfi.

In the meantime do the best you can, and when all danger is over and there is no suspicion of it, you may send for Father Giovanni.

As for the picture, we shall have it made.

Your Reverence may keep Father Paolo's crucifix, donec aliter provideatur [till otherwise provided.]

See to it that regular observance be maintained: exhort, beg, but do not give penances, unless it be to the lay-brothers.

As for Brother Nicola, we must think of sending him elsewhere. Here his health has been worse; he will at your house breathe the air of his native place. If it is God's will to call him to himself, let us be resigned; but make him take the necessary remedies, such as, milk, broth, etc.

In regard to the sermons that you wish to have, we shall speak of them afterwards.[16958]

Tell Father Apice that he should have patience; we shall return the manuscript. But to hear him say: It must be finished promptly, at once, on the same day; one should write while the other is dictating; this is indeed a fine thing! or rather fine vanity!—All this in order that the manuscript might be read and copied by the admirers at your place so that the balloon may become more inflated![16959]

I am told that the Archbishop [di Conza] was displeased because I used my influence in procuring a bishopric for his Vicar-General. I did not think that this would be the case, nor did I suspect that I would thereby cause him displeasure. Henceforward I will never interfere in such things.

Have the enclosed letter forwarded to Muro as soon as possible and cautiously; so that it may not be lost and may arrive safely. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Have the whole Community recommend to God the brother of the archpriest of Teora. Live Jesus and Mary!

When the young man Francesco Antonio de Paola[16960] comes, receive him kindly and send him here at once if he can come. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

(Postscript written by another hand): Our Father wishes to add here, that when you send the riding animals to take Father Giovanni and the goods that have come from Naples, send them laden with good grain; of this arrangement Father Apice has been informed.

TO FATHER FRANCESCO MARGOTTA, PROCURATOR-GENERAL OF THE CONGREGATION AT NAPLES

Solicitude of the saint in regard to the health of the subjects.—Details as to temporal affairs,

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, 31, [August, 1753].

How can I permit Father [Francesco] Garzilli to go to Caposele when I have been informed by letter that Father Buonamano is suffering from a fever like that of Father Paolo?

As for Gaetano d' Ischia, it would not be well to think of sending him thither. I await a list of the books for the exercises.

With regard to the purchase of investments, thus much is certain: you cannot now leave Naples. The purchase of investments in tobacco seems to me about the best bargain; but I fear after what I heard, the four per cents do not offer entire security. I think the investments in the fief is also good. Before investing in houses, it would be well to see what will be the income. As for the Carmelites, it is certain that they will return the money in a few years: add to this that Don Bernardo is rightly in their favor.

Now I receive from Caposele another letter apprising me that Father Picone has also been attacked by fever, and that to the fever with which Father Buonamano is afflicted a very severe headache has supervened. I also hear that the mortality is still very great at Apulia. I therefore would not dare to send Father Lorenzo d' Antonio to Iliceto. I remain, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

If you ever have to give a novena to the children of the Congregation of Borgia,[16961] I should be pleased, and I give you my blessing. Live Jesus and Mary!

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 161

TO THE SAME

Details relative to temporal affairs, to the mission at Calabria and to various subjects.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, September 2, [1753].

As for those books of exercises, by Maffei and Muratori, we already have them. Please send me that work of Father Barbugli[16962] and let me know the price of it; but look out for some other works.

About the purchase of tobacco, three and six carlini would be suitable prices. As for the purchase of the fief it is a wearisome thing to be obliged to quarrel with powerful people about boundary lines; in the course of time they take everything from you little by little.

About the chaplaincy, bene provisum [you have well provided for it]. Your Reverence thinks only of Caposele.[16963] Why does not someone think of the afflicted house at Nocera which has nothing? But enough of this; do the best you can. Please however do not let the chaplaincy bear our name, as that is now forbidden by the king.[16964] You can leave it to the archbishop that he may have us to say Masses and that he give us the revenues of the benefice, or you can leave it to the church of Mater Domini by founding the chaplaincy there. Enough on this point; take the best measures that you can in order that we may not get into trouble with the royal treasury.

I do not care too much about accepting the annual income of thirty ducats in favor of a mission for the village of Solopaca; but poverty forces us to accept it for the present. See whether you could arrange for a mission every five or at least every four years.

Our Frater [Pietro Paolo] Blasucci is already of age required for the priesthood; hence he could be ordained at Christmas; but the consent of the Bishop of Muro is necessary. I hear that the bishop is at present at Naples. Try to find him and ask his permission.

It is not possible to give now the mission in Calabria you know how many subjects we have lost. Next year the young men who are now studying Moral Theology will finish their course, and then we can oblige our friend.[16965] But I will not have a mission given in Calabria without one of these two conditions: either a foundation is to be established; and for that our friend would have to have an understanding with the bishop, and the bishop should express his desire to the king of uniting at his expense some missionaries in one of his houses; or there must be a legacy of two thousand ducats. But then everything that we wish to have done must be exactly determined; if for example, it is desirable to have every four or five years missions lasting two or three months. But if our ministry should be required every year, or if we should be asked that within the space of five years all the places in the diocese be evangelized, such a thing would not be possible. There is question of seven or eight days to be devoted to travelling.

I have received Monsignor Bonaventura's[16966] letter, and give you my blessing for the instructions that you are going to give at the Conservatory of Father Pepe.

As you have already bought the works of St. Peter Damian, leave them for the house at Caposele; but they are not of much value.[16967] It would have been much better if you could have bought the works of St. Thomas of Villa-nova, which are very fine.

Yes, tell Signor Cestoni that I shall not have any more Visits printed on my account, but shall get them from him. However I have asked him to give me a copy of his edition to revise it; it is full of faults. Hence if he intends to print any more, I would wish to revise the edition; I shall take copies from him, after I have disposed of my own, which are not many.

Let me know the authors of the exercises which you have found.

Try to find out whether the sixth volume of Tournely's Moral Theology has been published; I already have the fifth.

I am sending back Brother Mattia, as I have no other Brother to send you from this place; how could you have got along without a Brother? And then, what necessity is there to send the half-sick Brother [to Caposele], where the pest is raging at present?

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 162

TO MOTHER MARIA ANGIOLA OF DIVINE LOVE, AT CAPUA

He begs her to obtain through the Queen the royal approbation of the Institute of the Most Holy Redeemer.

NOCERA, September 8, [1753].

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Now the favorable time has come for you, my dear Mother. In my last letter I asked you to find out whether it were expedient to hand to the Queen before the chase the writing in question; for I feared that amid the distractions of the chase it might be lost. Now I tell you that you should do as you think best; and if you think that you should give the writing before the opening of the chase, give it. But I again recommend to you to employ on this occasion all the influence that you can exert. Make the Queen especially understand the injury that the want of the approbation has caused us; on the other hand, tell her that we renounce the right of making any acquisition whatever, and that we shall be satisfied with what the king allows us through the hands of the bishops. I also ask you in reference to this matter to read this writing, for everything is there briefly exposed. For the service that you will render me, my dear Mother, it is not I that will reward you, but it will be Jesus Christ himself, whose cause you will plead.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I have conveyed to Marquis Brancone the communication with which you have charged me, and I beg you to recommend me to Jesus Christ.

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 163

TO SISTER MARIA GIOVANNA DELLA CROCE, AT CAMIGLIANO

She should not refuse any charge.—Avoid dissipation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, September 30. [1753?]

I answer briefly. As for asking the Prioress that she should not give you employments that may distract you, is something that does not please me; for a religious should neither ask for nor refuse any employment; but when it is given by the Superiors it is God himself who gives it.

In regard to placing into the hands of another religious whatever you have, that would not displease me if you find one that would desire to charge herself with the care of it. You may, therefore, make an attempt, but without coming to a final decision.

In respect to your feast, what shall I say? I do not like these particular feasts which the religious celebrate. I would advise you to deposit with the Prioress what is to be spent for the feast and to concern yourself about nothing except to praise and to offer prayers to the saint; otherwise you will derive therefrom more disquietude than devotion.

As for your brother, if he comes it will be well. If he does not come, do not take the trouble to have him come; for self-love would have therein a greater share than the love of God.

I recommend you to Jesus Christ; on your part continue always to do so for me, and make a novena to the Blessed Virgin for my Congregation; for we are overwhelmed with trouble, especially now as we are menaced, so they tell me, with a great persecution. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very humble servant,

TO MOTHER MARIA ANGIOLA OF DIVINE LOVE

He sends her some books.—Hopes in regard to the extension of the Reform of Carmel.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES, October 6, [1753].

I send you, my dear Mother, my book on the Blessed Virgin with the "Novena to St. Teresa" and the little book of canticles. Please to give the other copy of the "Glories of Mary" to my dear friend Father A. Pagnani in order that he may not forget me before the Madonna. You yourself, my dear Mother, should take care to recommend me to Jesus Christ after Communion and solicit for me from our heavenly Mother the love for her divine Son. I desire nothing else.

I am glad that the affair of the foundation of your monastery of Gruma has again been brought up for discussion; so I was told at Naples. Your holy Institute will, I hope, extend more and more over Italy and in the whole of Europe, to the glory of the divine Spouse and your divine Mother. Well, now! recommend me with fervor to Jesus Christ, I say with fervor, otherwise I shall derive no benefits. Recommend also this Congregation to this divine Master. I will on the other hand pray for yours. May Jesus be our love and Mary be our hope!

TO SIGNORA FILIPPA FARAO

He briefly explains to her the Rules of the Nuns of the Most Holy Redeemer at Scala.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, 29. [1753?]

Your letters are too long. I rejoice that your uncle has consented to send you to Scala; but it seems to me to be difficult for you to attain your end. We must pray much; this is the means of obtaining this grace.

As for the Rules at Scala, a careful search has been made for them, but they have not been found.[16968] The following is substantially what they contain: Perfect poverty; three hours of silence during the day, after recreation; an hour and a half of meditation; there is but one grate, and for relatives, and conversation is held there with the veils down; spiritual reading etc., and similar things; chemises and bed-sheets are of linen; flesh-meat is eaten, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

For pity's sake, keep secret what I say to you, and destroy my letters. Live Jesus and Mary!

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

Letter 166

TO D. LUIGI SAGLIANO

He begs him recommend to the Queen through Mother Maria Angiola the affair of the approbation of his Institute.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, October 30, [1753].

My dear Don Luigi: I have received your very dear letter and that of Canon Farao whom I am going to answer; I have also received the two catechisms. I am glad that the house is catching fire. St. Francis de Sales says that when the house catches fire the furniture is thrown out of the window. He wishes to say that when in a soul the love of God is enkindled, the soul detaches itself and gradually casts off everything that is not God.

I do not forget you in my poor prayers, and you do not forget me. I know not how to prophesy, but it appears to me that God expects great things from you. Well, then, I wish that you would help our poor Congregation, and do your share in assisting this great work that will do much for the glory of our Lord.

I entrust a secret to you: When I took leave of Sister Angiola, I also recommended to her our persecuted Congregation, telling her that for four years we had been laboring and had not succeeded in procuring the exequatur for the apostolic approbation. I then said to her that she should help us through the Queen; she promised to do so, and now she writes to me that she has not forgotten her promise. This is the favor that I wish you to do for me. When you find out that the Queen is going to Caserta I beg you (excuse the importunity) to go to Sister Maria Angiola on the day before the coming of the Queen, and instruct her on the manner in which she should engage the Queen to interest herself in obtaining for us the royal approbation on which this work depends for its stability; as otherwise it will be of no value. Tell Sister Maria Angiola that I have entrusted this to you as a secret, and you should show her that you are recommending this matter to her, because you are actuated by the desire to have the glory of God made manifest. When the Queen has promised this to Sister Angiola, I shall at once present the Brief and have my memorial referred by Marquis Brancone. But I cannot run the risk of losing the Brief if I am not sure of the promise of the Queen. The whole affair revolves on the acquisition of property. We do not wish riches. We shall be satisfied, if the king approves of the arrangement, that he should restrict us as to our purchases and revenues just as he may think fit; we shall be satisfied with fifteen grains[16969] a day for each one, and even less after the manner of servants in livery. We have only four houses in each of which there must be twelve Fathers and seven lay-brothers. For this reason has the king assigned to us what will pay for the food, and nothing more.

I would like to have this work established before my death, which is not far off. My dear Luigi, for that which you do I shall not pay you, but Jesus Christ, who loves this work so much. There is question of saving hundreds of thousands of souls, as there is question of restoring every year to the grace of God thirty or forty thousand helpless souls, together with about forty missions, and as many courses of exercises which are given at home.

But if Sister Maria Angiola urges this matter only in a lukewarm manner, and the Queen promises her assistance only in the same way, the whole affair will come to nothing; and I repeat that I shall not take the risk of presenting the Brief. Sister Maria Angiola would have to say to the Queen that God wishes (this is certain) that she should interest herself in establishing this great work and that after God we place all our hope in the Queen. She should tell her that God positively wishes her to put forth every effort in regard to this matter.

My dear D. Luigi: Jesus Christ will repay you for whatever you do in behalf of this work. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa! I remain,

Your very humble and very affectionate servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 167

TO MOTHER ANGIOLA OF DIVINE LOVE

He again recommends to her the affair of the legal recognition of the Institute.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, November I, [1753].

I have received your answer. It is too much for you to thank me for those little works. I should like to know how your affairs are, for I have understood that a Theatine came from Rome to examine what is the spirit that guides you. I can do nothing; but occasionally I have tried my best to defend you and your work against certain attacks. Enough; I desire only to know how things are. I have no influence; but I will not omit to promote your work as much as I can for the glory of God and of our Mother Mary.

Please again remember me kindly to our dear friend Father Pagnani; no doubt I should have been much happier to make his acquaintance than he to make the acquaintance of me, a poor wretch. May it please God to let me see him again; but already the cold weather has set in, and I shall be condemned not to go out any more on account of my sickness of the chest. Perhaps we shall see each other once more before I die. I also desire to know of your spiritual Father what Mgr. Zortù (?) has said about the spirit that is leading you; for I have heard that he did not approve it, but I do not know on what point. If I desire to know all, it is only for the glory of God.

Well! let us become saints, and do not forget to cast, at least once a day, a look upon the Blessed Sacrament for me and for our poor and afflicted Congregation. You have consoled me by saying that you have recommended the Congregation to God, and that you have reflected on the means of assuring its future. Now I would say to you, and it is the Lord that gives me this hope, that I count on seeing, before I die, this work definitively established, and this thanks to the Most Blessed Virgin, and, then, to your own self. But if you do not speak strongly to the Queen; if you do not tell her that in order to please God she should certainly occupy herself zealously in regard to the future of this Congregation, we shall not succeed. For my part, without the formal assurance of the efficacious concurrence of the Queen, I would not expose the Brief from Rome to fall into the hands of the ministers, for they would surely declare themselves against me. I have already told you, my dear Mother, that we are not anxious to be rich; let the king assign to us what he wishes for the benefit of our four houses. We are satisfied if he gives us each fifteen grains a day, and if he grants us his approbation. Our Congregation will then not be hanging so to speak in the air, and what good it does for so many souls, everybody knows. There is here question of restoring to the grace of God every year from thirty to forty thousand persons by means of forty missions that we annually give. This being the case, may God provide! My hopes and those of my companions to whom I have confided the affair under a secret, rest, I repeat, first on the Blessed Virgin, then upon you, my dear Mother.

May Jesus bless you, and may he grant you the only thing that is necessary, namely, his holy love. I remain, etc.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Be so kind, my dear Mother, after you have spoken to the Queen, not to wait for Don Luigi [Sagliano] or his servant; but write to me at once by post, addressing the letter to Nocera de' Pagani. If God blesses your interview with the Queen, let me know whether you wish to have the memorial or only an abridgment of it, in order to give it or send it to the Queen. It will suffice for her to express the desire to have the memorial to give it to Marquis Brancone, or for her to say to the latter that he should propose the affair to the Council in her presence. Pardon me for my importunity, but there is here question of the glory of Jesus Christ and of the salvation of innumerable thousands of souls, and of abandoned souls. You love our Lord, my dear Mother; you will therefore willingly render this service. Our Lord will not forget it; he will know how to reward you for the part that you will have in the good that will be done by our Congregation till the day of judgment; to which day I hope this Congregation will continue if now you will labor to establish it. Live Jesus and Mary!

For pity's sake, let me occasionally enjoy the pleasure of receiving a letter from you; I shall be satisfied with one line, it will prove that you have not forgotten us. Live Jesus and Mary!

I have the honor to be, my dear Mother, your very humble servant, once your spiritual Father,

Letter OF THE SOVEREIGN PONTIFF BENEDICT XIV. TO ST. ALPHONSUS

[November 2, 1753.]

Benedict XIV., Pope

To our beloved Son, health, and apostolic benediction.

We have received the first volume of the Moral Theology[16970] dedicated to us; we thank you for the honor that you have paid us and for the opportune insertion of our encyclical Letters in the above-mentioned work. We assure you that the work will be read by us on opportune occasions, as we have a due estimate of your merit, your diligence and your prudence in your judgments. In regard to the state of your Congregation,[16971] we can do nothing more than pray to the Lord and recommend to others that they should pray for the prosperity of your Institute, which is so useful to the Church of God. We conclude by giving you and all the members of your Congregation the apostolic blessing.

Given at Rome, at St. Maria Major, the second day of November 1753, in the fourteenth year of our Pontificate.

Solution of a difficulty.

[Anno 1753]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Don Gennaro Farina[16972] wishes to go on the mission. I should have no difficulty about allowing this, but one thing embarrasses me, and that is, that Genovese and Tortora[16973] might complain that we accept Farina's services, while we refuse theirs. However, you can say that he is not a professed member, as they once were.

TO SISTER MARIA DI GESÙ, A CARMELITE AT RIPACANDIDA

He recommends to her prayers the Congregation and himself.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 4, [1753].

I have received your letter, and I thank you much for the charity that you have in recommending me to Jesus Christ; I do the same for you. At the present time please to pray in a particular manner for our Congregation; for there is question of obtaining its approval by the government, and if we fail this time, God knows when the question will again come up. But may the will of God always be done!

In your fears always throw yourself as if you were quite dead into the lovely arms of Jesus Christ and of his very holy Mother. Think no longer of your past faults; when doubt and mistrust attack you, say resolutely: In te, Domine, speravi, non confundar in æternum. [In Thee, O Lord! I have hoped; I shall not be confounded forever.]

As for seeing each other here below, I do not know whether that will ever happen; it may happen, and perhaps not. I am old and infirm; it will be difficult for me to make so long a journey. At present I hardly ever leave the house as I am often visited by fever. It is necessary that I sho uld prepare myself better for death, which must be near; help me, therefore, to prepare myself for the day of reckoning. Be so kind as to offer for me this special prayer, namely, that Jesus Christ may let me know during these last days of my life what I have to do to please him, and that he may give me the strength to execute it. Do not forget this.

Present my regards to the Prioress[16974] and to all my Sisters; for I acknowledge them as such. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO SISTER MARIA GIOVANNA DELLA CROCE

One must perform the duties of the offices imposed by obedience.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

December 4. [1753?]

To think of leading a solitary life at Caserta is something unreasonable. Now that you are a religious, you must occupy yourself in the employments that are given to you, and you must serve the Community.

As for other things, you must leave all when you have duties to perform; but when you are free, do not fail to make your day of retreat and to attend to the other exercises of meditation; and once every month, or on the day of the retreat, ask the Prioress to appoint a substitute for you, if such a thing is possible. Pray for me. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Prohibition to change her convent.—Counsels in regard to patience.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 12. [1753?]

Herewith I answer your last letter. The thought that you have of changing your convent is a temptation of the devil, who will always keep you in uneasiness and will never allow you to do anything good. If this temptation returns, I command you to banish it, and to say then: I wish to die here, because God as well as obedience wishes this. Crosses are found everywhere; if you take into your head to go to San Gaudioso[16975] you will find there other crosses than those that you have now to bear.

Continue as I have told you to receive holy Communion, to pray, to perform all the mortifications that you can, and above all, bear contradictions that prove what you are; if you are quite resigned to bear these trials by conforming to the will of God, you will not think of changing your convent.

Continue to pray for me and for our Congregation, as there is now question of a most important affair. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 172

TO DON LUIGI SAGLIANO

Exhortation to love Jesus Christ.—He sends him various little works.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 19, [1753].

My dear Don Luigi: I know not how to thank you for the great charity that you have shown me; I am praying to Jesus Christ, and I am praying to him with all my heart that he should reward you. As long as the Prioress [Mother Angiola] has the desire to render the service as she should, I do not very much care if I must wait as long as it is necessary; but not so long that it will never be rendered.

Enough on this point; at the favorable moment recall the affair to her memory.

In regard to the persecutions which you mention to me, on the one hand they afflict me, on the other they console me when I see how the Lord is detaching you from the world, and weaning you entirely from it. In the same way the Lord has cut me loose from the world, and now I find myself more content than if I had been made king of the whole world.

How much am I pleased that you take delight in meditating on the love that Jesus Christ bears towards us! I therefore send you another little book by Father Nepveu, who treats in a heavenly manner of the love of Jesus Christ; and truly this sweet Saviour deserves to be loved by us. Continue, therefore, to meditate upon his love; because whoever reflects upon it cannot help loving this good Master and to do everything that will give him pleasure.

Inform me at once whenever there is anything new, and I remain,

Your very humble and very grateful servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] I have not omitted, and I will not omit to pray for you, and you must also pray for me. I shall be delighted to have you come to make the exercises at our house at Ciorani when they are given to seculars. I am sure that you will derive consolation from them. These exercises for seculars are usually made in Lent. You have time to think of the matter. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph!

I send you also another little book about the eternal maxims, with some beautiful considerations for devotion to the Blessed Virgin. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Live Jesus, Mary, and Teresa!

NOCERA, March 4, 1754.

My dear Don Luigi: I am writing you by another hand, because I am in bed, and have been sick for many days. I again thank you for the charity that you have done me in regard to the Mother Prioress, we shall wait to see what she will do.

I am glad to hear about your new business enterprises as they concern the body. But as to the spiritual part I know not whether I should be glad, because I see that this year they have deprived you of the exercises of Passion week about which I sent you word.

My dear Luigi;—I do not oblige you to come precisely to Ciorani, but I recommend this most strongly. Every year lay aside all business and do not omit to devote yourself for eight days to the exercises if you wish to acquire the true spirit. Dedimus corpori annum, demus animæ dies. [We have given a year to the body, let us give days to the soul.] Let me know whether the Mother Prioress has been successful, and if she has been so, may she be a saint! TO MOTHER MARIA DI GESÙ, AT RIPACANDIDA

Exhortation to obedience and to confidence in God.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, March 24, [1754].

I have been sick for some time, and at present I am not yet free from my trouble.

I have received your letter, and I am happy that the direction of Father Fiocchi has helped you to find peace. Continue then to obey; throw yourself into the arms of the divine Goodness, and go ahead.

You would like to be absolutely without any fear; if this were your state, it would be a sign that you are walking on the wrong road. I then repeat; obey, and move onward in the midst of darkness without knowing whither you are going.

Mauriccio is doing well and is becoming a saint; Michele[16976] is also doing well, but his health is not good. If he so continues, I think of sending him for a while to Melfi to recover his health; he will return immediately after his recovery. It is a long time since I have heard any news from Don Luigi Mercante,[16977] as he has not written to me for some time. He has very likely grown cold. Try to write him a strong letter, and make him have a lively fear of the misfortune of losing his vocation.

Recommend every day me and Father Carmine [Fiocchi] to Jesus Christ; I am doing so for you.

Letter 175

TO SISTER GIOVANNA DELLA CROCE, AT CAMIGLIANO

She should not desire to change her convent.—Various counsels in regard to perfection.

NOCERA, April. [1754?]

I went to Capua on account of a very important affair,[16978] and I could not go to Camigliano, as I was travelling with a friend. I must tell you that I have nearly always been unwell, and moreover, that if I had gone to see you, I would have told you what I am now writing to you.

I answer your last letter. It is regrettable that you have not received my letter; in it I said to you that you should positively banish the idea of changing your monastery. At present I say the same thing to you, and if you ever speak to me again about such an affair, I will no more answer you.

You should become a saint in the place where God wishes you, and not in the place where you wish to go. To wish to change your place of residence is pure self-love and shows the desire of fleeing from the cross. I wish to see you become a saint by bearing with contempt, contradiction, poverty, and all that you have to suffer in the place where you are; you, on the contrary, wish to sanctify yourself in holy solitude.

Even the fact that you reserve for yourself a separate cell does not please me. I wish that, poor as you are, and even poorer than the others, you should be occupied in serving as much as you are able the Community and all the Sisters. For the rest, if you wish to pray, the choir is there; you should go there during the time in which you are not obliged to serve the convent or some Sister, especially any one that is sick.

If you do not positively banish the thought of changing your monastery, you will never become a saint; for this thought nourishes in you distractions and disquietude, and hinders you from loving sufferings, injuries and contempt on the part of others. It is, however, just this love that I wish to see in you.

As for solitude, I wish you to love it, but in the way of which I have spoken. Flee from useless conversation, from the grate as much as possible, and withdraw to the choir, unless you have to render a service to the monastery or to any Sister, even though she may be ungrateful. Such is the life that does not please you, but that pleases Jesus Christ.

Well, then, abstain for a month from every mortification, such as disciplines, little chains, abstinences, etc., and attend only to supporting with patience the contempt, the contrarieties, and the unpleasantness which you meet with in the monastery. Afterwards you may resume the accustomed mortifications.

You should also mortify the excessive desire of receiving a visit from me. God knows with what haste I departed from Capua. I did not even stay a day at Aversa, notwithstanding the pressing solicitations to stay.

Live Jesus. Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO MGR. FRANCESCO ANTONIO BONAVENTURA, BISHOP OF NUSCO

He excuses himself for having retained two priests for the mission at Amalfi,

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, May 18, 1754.

Right Reverend and Dear Sir: On account of the evident necessity of the mission that is given by our Fathers in the populous city of Melfi, I have taken a liberty with your Lordship, through the friendship which I profess for you, of sending thither to assist the Fathers two priests of Cassano,[16979] your subjects. They were unwilling to go, since they alleged that by staying so long away from their home they would displease you, and especially since one of them had charge of a confraternity of his place. I have induced them to go thither, making myself responsible to your Lordship for any fault on their part. The reason why I did this was sheer necessity, the other Fathers being engaged in giving other missions. I could not think of employing any other priests than the above-mentioned, as they gave so much edification and satisfaction to our Fathers, and during the time they assisted them they exhibited the highest proofs of their good qualities and their zeal. On this account I hope that your Lordship will pardon my arrogance. Most respectfully kissing your hand, I remain,

Right Reverend Sir,

Your very humble, very devoted,

and very grateful servant,

Solicitude of the saint for the restoration to health of Father D. Saverio Rossi.

[About May 20, 1754.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph!

Here we are continually saying and reciting litanies for D. Saverio. I am also saying Mass for him. I have promised ten ducats for our altar of Mary Immaculate if she does us this favor. Send me good news to-day. Tell that wretched hiccough on the part of Mary Immaculate to go away at once and not torment any more Don Saverio and us.[16981] I feel great compassion for the sick man.

When Father Amendolara returns send him to us immediately so that we may send back Father Apice.

Tell Father Caprioli to send me the two other texts.

I bless Don Saverio and all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I send you the two papers; preserve them. I have already sent the act to Don Andrea at Naples. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 178

TO CARDINAL ANTONINO SERSALE, ARCHBISHOP OF NAPLES.[16982]

He humbly exposes to him his views in regard to the state of the diocese of Naples and to the proper measures to be taken to remove certain disorders.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, June 18, 1754.

Most Eminent and Most Reverend Sir: Since my health does not otherwise permit, I wish by writing to you this letter to kiss your Eminence's feet and to express to you my profound respect as your old servant, and now as your subject and son.

It is not necessary for me to express to you the consolation that I felt when I heard that your most worthy person had been chosen to govern the Church of Naples; your Eminence can well imagine this.

But your Eminence will no longer find the Neapolitan clergy as you left it; you will find a ruined clergy,[16983] and as a consequence a ruined people. You will especially find a decadence of the right spirit in the candidates for ordination, and also what is worse, you will find the same in the three Congregations of priests.[16984] It was by means of these Congregations that there has been preserved during many years the fervor of the Neapolitan clergy, who have been an example to the whole kingdom, and I might say to the entire world; but at present one might shed tears in seeing the state to which they have been reduced.

I hope that Jesus Christ has sent your Eminence to remedy all these evils, and I hope to see renewed the time of St. Charles Borromeo, who preached to the people with so much fruit; in this manner I hope to see your Eminence preach to the people of Naples.

Oh, how much greater art the fruits produced by the words of the Pastor! Your Eminence formerly preached so well as a missionary;[16985] now I hope to have the consolation of seeing you preach at Naples as Pastor.

Pardon my boldness, if I speak thus; it is only for the glory of Jesus Christ. What good would your Eminence effect if you would have missions held in Naples, and would yourself preach at least in two or three places, if only during the first years, and would also give the exercises to all the clergy, strongly exhorting them to frequent the Congregations, to observe their Rules, and particularly to apply themselves to the missions, since by the missions from Naples we extend spiritual help to the whole kingdom! As for the candidates for ordination, you should make them understand that they should either give signs of a true vocation or should retire, since the Church deplores the ruin caused by admitting many subjects who are without a vocation. Your Eminence might at the same time inform them that you will admit to Holy Orders only those that have been well tried not only as to science, which is of less importance, but as to their moral conduct and as to their ecclesiastical spirit,—things that are most necessary.

I also beg your Eminence to listen to Don Giuseppe Iorio and Don Giov. Battista Fusco,[16986] two priests, who are truly men of God and of true zeal, without self-interest. They will represent to you the truth of things, and draw attention to many good works that will be conducive to the welfare of a people that are spiritually ruined. I beg your Eminence at least to listen to them.

I conclude by humbly prostrating myself at your feet, and asking for your blessing. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph! I remain,

Your very humble, devoted, and grateful servant and son,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 179

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA,[16987] MASTER OF NOVICES AT CIORANI

He regulates the studies of some novices.

[The year 1754.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Who has ever said that the novices have to study during three hours? I have not time to answer in regard to all your difficulties, and from afar I cannot arrange things. If I were with you I might adjust everything after having asked certain questions. Besides, I have spoken of the matter continually, supposing that [Frater Girolamo] Ferrazzano had completed the humanities; but I now hear that he has not even finished his course of arithmetic.

As to [Frater Domenico] Caputo, that he has not finished rhetoric does not matter; he will do so afterwards, having already studied logic. As to physics, geometry is not absolutely necessary, nor is it necessary at least in many cases. Caputo is of age and might learn at present some necessary figures. Physics is something not absolutely necessary; it is ornamental not necessary to a priest.

As for [Frater Pasquale] Bianchi, it appears to me that he has already gone through logic. In a short time he will leave the novitiate. But I should like to be there, to speak to Father Spera and settle all difficulties. Hence since the study of physics has been begun, let things take their course. But when the young men reach the end of their novitiate, inform me, and we shall see what is to be done.

Another time you must write to me directly in regard to the difficulties that may arise as to what I have told you. Do not involve me in disputes with others. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] I have just now received your second letter. It is not necessary to dispense Bianchi from the novitiate. Let him remain among the novices and follow the course during the time that is absolutely necessary. Have an understanding with Father Spera. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 180

TO THE FATHERS AND BROTHERS OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

Important recommendations in regard to the observance of the Rules, the study of theology, and other different points of religious discipline which constitute the practice of perfection.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 8, 1754.

I beg all of you, my Brethren in Jesus Christ, before you hear this letter read, to say the Veni, Creator Spiritus, and to ask of God the light well to understand and to put in execution what in the name of Jesus Christ I write to all and to each one in particular. My Fathers and my Brothers: It is not yet two-and-twenty years since the beginning of the Congregation, and it is five years since it was approved by the Holy Church; so that at this moment it should not only have maintained its first fervor, but should moreover have increased it. Many, it is true, are behaving well; but in others, instead of advancement, there is a want of spirit. What will become of these, I know not; for God has called us into the Congregation (especially now at its beginning) to become saints, and to save ourselves as saints. As for him who wishes simply to save his soul in the Congregation, but not to become a saint, I know not whether he will be saved at all.

Poor Congregation if this want of spirit spreads among us! What will it be fifty years hence? One should have to weep and say, Poor Jesus Christ! if he be not loved by a member of the Congregation, who has received from him so many special lights, by whom will he be loved? My God, of what use are so many Communions? and why have we entered the Congregation, and for what purpose do we remain in it, if we are not endeavoring to become saints? Is it to deceive the people, who regard all of us as saints, and to make them laugh at us on the day of judgment when they will know our imperfections?

We have now many good novices, but they and others that come after, will through our example, be worse than we are; and in a short time the Congregation will become thoroughly relaxed, because imperfections will give place to scandals; and if this is to happen, far better will it be, my Brethren, that we pray the Lord to suppress the Congregation at once.

I am already old and in bad health, and am already drawing nigh to the day of account. I desire to be of as much service to you as I can; and God knows how much I love each one of you, more than my brothers and my mother: but it is not the will of God that I should endanger my eternal salvation through love (but an inordinate love) of any of you. We are all miserable creatures, and we all commit faults, but I am not pained by passing faults, but by those that are permanent, and by certain weaknesses that do harm to the whole Community. If anyone would with his eyes open espouse such faults as these, and defend them, or at least excuse them as endurable, I, for my part, declare that I cannot, and ought not to tolerate them. Such would be, for example, faults either against obedience or against poverty, against humility or fraternal charity. I hope, by the grace of God, to maintain this resolution to my death, and faithfully to act upon it, as I have promised God never to allow myself to be overcome by human respect, so as to see the brethren fail in things important and prejudicial to the others without correcting them. You are already aware that perhaps my weakest point is to be too indulgent; but I hope that God will give me firmness not to bear with the imperfect who will not correct themselves and who defend their imperfections; and I beseech you who are young, and who remain to govern the Congregation, never to tolerate a subject who should be so imperfect as not to humble himself after a fault, but should even defend it. I protest that on the day of judgment I will accuse before the tribunal of Jesus Christ the Superior who, in order to avoid causing pain to a subject, shuts his eyes to faults that do harm to the Community, and is the cause of the Congregation being relaxed. With regard, however, to the past, if there be any one who has been guilty of some fault, I do not intend now to reproach him with it; I speak only for the future.

But to come now to certain special points, I beg each one to pay attention to the following remarks:

First, then, I beg of each one to value his vocation. It is the greatest blessing, next to that of creation and redemption, which God could bestow on him. Thank Almighty God every day for it, and be afraid of losing it. Do not be deceived by the enemy of souls, who will perhaps say that you could do good even out of the Congregation, at home, and would enjoy greater peace out of it. And what good? Nemo propheta acceptus in patria sua. [No prophet is accepted in his own country.—Luke, iv. 24.] Everyone knows this, and experience proves it. A priest will save more souls in one year in the Congregation than in his whole life out of it. And to speak of personal advantage, a member of the Congregation will gain more by practising obedience for one year than he would gain in ten by living according to his own fancy out of the Congregation. And besides, we have to do the good that God wishes of us, and not that which we wish ourselves. Now God wills of him who is called to the Congregation that good and those labors that are imposed upon him by the Rule and by his Superiors. Peace, indeed; what kind of peace? Quis restitit ei, et pacem habebit [2] [Who hath resisted him, and hath had peace?—Job, ix. 4.] We see it, my Brethren, in those who have abandoned the Congregation. What kind of peace will God give to those faithless ones who, out of some caprice, and for want of mortification, lose their vocation, and turn their backs upon the will of God? And especially when they come to die, how shall they find peace, when they remember that they are dying out of the Congregation? I will not say more on this point, because now everyone already well understands it. But the evil is, that in the moment of temptation we are blind, and the loss of vocation is not considered an evil. I call attention to this: let no one think to frighten us by saying that he wishes to leave. Thanks be to God, the Congregation has at the present moment many good subjects, and at the same time every day you see there come to us young men full of fervor and talent; for the good name of the Congregation is spread throughout the kingdom, and even out of it; and it is believed that there is great fervor and perfection in the Congregation (would to God that only half were true!): and thus the good subjects will remain with us, to give missions and retreats. And even were we obliged to give fewer missions, it will always be better to keep up the spirit of regular observance with a few subjects, than to see the Congregation become relaxed. Those few that go on conscientiously will please God more than a thousand that lead imperfect lives. So, then, to sum up this point, unhappy he that loses his vocation! And, by the way, I renew for each one the formal obedience that I have given at other times—not to leave the Congregation without having first obtained my express permission, together with the dispensation from the vows and oath of perseverance, unless this has been already obtained from the Sovereign Pontiff.

Secondly, I beg each one to obey and to make no resistance to the commands of the local Superiors. If a subject has some difficulty, he is allowed to make it known; but then I beg him to make up his mind to obey before he makes his representation, should the latter not be entertained. So resolved, let him go and explain his difficulty, whatever it may be; otherwise, if he does not act thus, he will remain disquieted, should his difficulty not be admitted; and, being disquieted, the devil will gain much with him. Father de la Colombière made a vow always to go against his own will. Should anyone not have the courage to do so much (and I do not exact this), at least he ought to be careful on all occasions to mortify his self-will, which is the ruin of souls. Speaking of obediences which are difficult (for there is no great merit in those that are easy), St. Catharine of Bologna says that we should perform them without murmuring exteriorly; for instance, by complaining of the food, clothing, or the manner of acting of Superiors, which latter is a great fault; and also without interior murmuring, for this also disturbs the soul.

I beg in a special manner of each one not to wish to change his house without evident necessity; and even should the necessity be evident, I nevertheless beg him, before he makes his request, to resign himself entirely to the judgment of his Superior, should the latter take a different view of his case. And for my own part, I declare that I will not grant this to any one without a plain necessity; for to act otherwise might become the source of much disquietude to the subjects.

Thirdly, I beg of all not to complain one to another of what the local Superiors do. To do so may be a cause of great temptation both to themselves and to the others.

Fourlhly, I beg each one to ask of Jesus Christ his holy love, otherwise all the good purposes will be of but little profit. And in order to obtain this holy love, let us strive to have a great love for the Passion of Jesus Christ, by praying and making a little meditation on it during the day, and when it is possible by making the Way of the Cross. Jesus Christ is surely much pleased when we think of the sorrows and the scorn that he endured for us. It seems to me impossible for one that thinks often of his sorrows and of his Passion not to become full of love for Jesus Christ. I pray both present and future Superiors often to insist at the Chapters on the love of Jesus Christ and of his Passion. There is nothing on which we insist in the missions more than on this love for the Passion of Jesus Christ. What a shame, then, for one of us to be found on the day of judgment to have loved Jesus Christ less than some poor woman!

And therefore I beg each one to love his cell, and not to become dissipated by wandering about here and there during the day. Let us husband our time, in order to spend it in prayer, in visits to the Most Holy Sacrament, which we have in the midst of us for this very purpose, and also in study, because this too is absolutely necessary for us. Hence I recommend to those that are confessors the study of Moral Theology; and I beg them not to follow blindly the opinions of certain theologians, without having first considered the intrinsic reasons for them, and especially those opinions which, as may be seen in the second edition of my work [on Moral Theology], I no longer allow to be probable. This I say, and the probabilists say it likewise, that every confessor is bound to consider first, in each case, whether there be an intrinsic reason capable of convincing, for thus the contrary opinion becomes improbable. It is only when we are not convinced by such a reason that we can avail ourselves of an extrinsic probability: probabilitas extrinseca. Pay attention to this point; for I fear that some in the Congregation make serious mistakes in this matter. And remark that in my second book I ordinarily admit only those opinions to be probable that I expressly call probable. I do not pretend that my opinions must necessarily be followed; but I beg that before you reject them you read the book, and consider what I have written with so much labor, inquiry, and study. Now I did not undertake this labor, my Brethren, for others, or to acquire a reputation; if I had only wished to gain a passing applause, I should have willingly done much less. God knows the tediousness and the trouble that it has caused me. I have done it solely for you, my Brethren, in order that you might have a solid doctrine to follow, or at least might act after reflection. I confess that at first many opinions seemed to me well-founded, but afterwards I saw that they were improbable. Wherefore, I beg all the confessors as well as the students to read my book, for I wrote it for this end; and then let them follow the opinions that seem to them the best before God. Among improbable opinions I include especially that which holds that a candidate for ordination who is in the habit of grievous sin may be absolved, although he may have the disposition sufficient for receiving the sacrament of penance; whereas for such a one positive virtue is not fitting merely, as some falsely suppose, but is necessary, not on account of the other sacrament that he is about to receive—because for this the state of grace would be sufficient—but on account of that exalted state upon which he enters. For such a state a high degree of virtue is absolutely necessary, since the Canonists and Doctors commonly say with St. Thomas, that such virtue præexigitur, requiritur, necessaria est: words that imply a real necessity and not a fitness; and the reason is, because a candidate for Holy Orders, both on account of the dignity of the state which he embraces, and of the most holy ministry which he has to exercise, must possess that positive virtue, which implies not merely an exemption from mortal sin, but the possession of a degree of virtue acquired by the previous practice of virtuous acts. Formerly I myself defended the contrary opinion; but afterwards I came to see that it was most improbable, and therefore I have retracted it.

Fifthly, and lastly, I recommend to the Superiors, both present and future, the observance of the Rules. This observance is in their hands. The Rector Major is far away: if the local Rector does not attend to it, the Rector Major cannot remedy what is amiss; and therefore it is necessary for the Superiors not merely to preach this observance, but to be the first to practise it. That which is seen makes far more impression than that which is heard. At the same time I recommend to the Superiors charity towards the subjects, in consoling them in their temptations, and in endeavoring to assist them in their necessities as far as possible, and by inquiring expressly (in the account of conscience) if there be anything of which they are in want. I recommend, above all, the monthly account of conscience, if possible the first Monday of the month; and when it cannot be made or finished the first Monday, let it be on the second. I especially recommend attention and charity to the sick, in visiting them and providing them as far as possible with the necessary remedies, and in asking them if they are in want of anything; and if this or that be not compatible with poverty, at least in consoling them as much as possible. I also recommend the Superiors to correct in private; for public corrections do but little good, except in the case where the fault was public, for then the correction does good to the others; but even here it is better first to correct the subject in private, and afterwards publicly.

So much for the Superiors. As to the subjects, I beg them never again to say that the Congregation is not so strict as it was, and that the primitive observance is relaxed. Even if on account of the increased number of subjects more faults are committed, nevertheless each one should endeavor to correct himself, and to live in observance of the Rule; and let him understand that the non-observant, who will not correct themselves, will not be tolerated in the Congregation. Hence, when any one commits a fault, let him at once humble himself interiorly, if the fault was interior, and exteriorly, by accusing himself of it, if the fault was exterior; and on falling into any fault, let him at once make the purpose of amendment. If anyone has some grievance against one of his brethren or against his Superior, let him try to take no step while in the heat of passion; let him first become calm, recommending himself to God; and then if he think it necessary, let hint act, or let him speak or write to the Superior. For the love of Jesus Christ, I beg you to pay attention to this point. Oh, if this were observed, how many faults would be avoided! because in the heat of passion things appear very different from what they really are. And on this account I also beg the Superiors not to correct when they are under the influence of anger, but to wait until the mind becomes calm, otherwise they will always be falling into excess, and their corrections will avail but little.

I recommend as strongly as I can detachment from relatives, who are certainly, as Jesus Christ says, the greatest enemies of our perfection. Let everyone be on his guard not even to mention the word stima propria [honor] in the Congregation; the greatest honor that a member of the Congregation should desire is to love obedience, and to be despised, and to be thought little of. This was the desire of the saints, to be despised as Jesus Christ was despised. He who does not make up his mind to become a saint cannot persevere in the Congregation; Jesus Christ himself, who loves exceedingly this Congregation, will drive him out. It is not the will of God that the first stones of this his own building should be so weak as to be not only unable to encourage and to give good example to those that shall come after us, but even to give little edification to those that are in it at present. Let each one well understand this. I recommend also the love of poverty, and beg all to take notice that faults against these two virtues—poverty and obedience—are not, and cannot be, tolerated in the Congregation; for if the practice of these two virtues fail, the spirit of the Congregation is wholly destroyed and at an end.

I again protest that what I have now written—just as it came into my mind—is not against any one in particular, but in general for all, and rather for the future than for the past. And I moreover beg all of you, after hearing this letter, not to suppose that I have any ill-feeling towards any who in past time may have committed some fault. I declare that as Jesus Christ has forgotten the faults of those who have humbled themselves for them, so also do I forget them. And let each understand that when any one has the misfortune to fall into a fault, if he will only heartily humble himself for it, he may be sure that I will heartily forgive him; and even by his humiliation he will make himself more dear to me than before. I say this in order that no one may lose courage, if by chance he should ever fall into some fault. But, on the other hand, let all guard against committing faults—even the smallest—with open eyes; because the devil is wont to make use of such faults as these to lead us into more serious ones, and then to tempt us to lose our vocation; and by this snare the devil is able to drive more than one out of the Congregation.

Lastly, be assured, my Brethren, that I love each one of you, after God, as my only love on this earth; and I offer for each of you, from this moment, my blood and my life: for you who are young may do much for the glory of God: but as for me, who am old, and ill, and useless, what more service can I render? And therefore I beg each one, if he is at a distance, to write to me whenever he has the need, and to banish the idea, which the devil has been making use of to disquiet me and others, that he will annoy me by speaking or writing to me. Be sure the more one shows me this confidence, the more he binds me to him; and remember that where there is question of consoling one of my brethren and children, I leave everything. I consider it of greater importance to help one of my children than to do any other good work; and God demands this of me in my office more than anything else.

To conclude, then, my Brethren; let us—in what remains of our lives, little or much, we know not (within a short time have died three of our young men: Muscarelli, Blasucci, and Zabbatti, and Father Paul [Cafaro], whose health was that of a young man)—let us, I say, become saints; and let us love Jesus Christ very much, for he deserves to be loved, and especially by us, whom he has loved more than others. Let us love a God who died for the love of us. Let us enliven our faith, and remember that we have but a few days to live on this earth, and that eternity is awaiting us. We preach these truths to others, and indeed they are truths of faith. So, then, we have no longer to live for ourselves or for the world, but only for God, only for eternity, and in order to become saints. And therefore let us continually offer ourselves to Jesus Christ, that he may do with us what he pleases; and let us continually beg of the most holy Mary to obtain for us the great treasure of the love of Jesus Christ. And when the devil tempts us against our vocation—and this is his great business with each one of us—let us recommend ourselves to this Mother of perseverance, and we shall certainly not lose our vocation.

I bless and embrace you all in the Heart of Jesus Christ, that having loved him exceedingly on this earth, we may all be one day united in loving him in our heavenly home. Let us not lose the beautiful crown that I see prepared for every one that lives in observance, and dies in the Congregation.

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE,[16988] RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT CAPOSELE

He reproaches him for his excess of condescension.—Various dispositions.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 31, [1754].

I beg you for mercy's sake not to be so condescending. To send some one of ours to fetch Father Apice's sisters is something that I cannot approve. You would have done well if you had tried to prevent them from coming to Caposele; for their journey to Caposele may be a cause of surprise to the relatives of the Fathers, and of inconvenience to the people of the village, etc.

If similar novelties, not authorized by usage, should again occur, be careful not to grant permission without first sending me word. This whole affair has pleased neither me nor those that have heard of it.

I have been asked from Caposele for permission for Father Francesco Saverio de Leo to hear the confessions of men. A little patience! I wish him yet to study two months so as to finish the necessary treatises. Then he may hear confessions in the missions, and especially at Corato where he will probably go. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I bless you and embrace you all. Live Jesus and Mary!

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] Invite the usual persons to the feast.[16989]

When the sisters of Father Apice come to see him, I absolutely wish that none of ours should accompany them to Caposele. Send someone belonging to the place.

This affection of Apice's for his relatives very much displeases me; gently endeavor to withdraw him from this attachment by making him perceive the danger of it. This young man makes me tremble.

Various recommendations.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, September 8, [1754].

Bear with me if I give you some advice. With age and experience I have learned many things.

As the air of Caposele is not beneficial to Father Giovenale, send him to Iliceto; in his place I shall send another Father. Let him tell you all that he knows about the Community which you are to direct.

Take care that all may make their retreat, especially should you permit Father Garzilli to do so; he justly complains that you have not for a long time given him an opportunity to make it. Let all have finished with their retreat by the 20th of October.

I hope that at this date Father de Leo has finished the study of the necessary things and that he will be able to hear confessions in the missions. If he needed to employ for this work the ten days of retreat, I should permit him to do so, in order that he may go on the missions.

What am I to say about Father Margotta? He will soon come here, and we shall talk to each other. Tell this to Father Garzilli.

I have had prayers ordered for Father Strina[16990] that he may become cheerful. I embrace and salute you all, particularly my dear Don Benedetto Grazioli,[16991] whom I wish well, since he is so earnest in his love for Jesus Christ.

I have also been much pleased with your Reverence, since I noticed that my corrections did not disquiet you. Thank Jesus Christ for such a grace, as many fail in this respect. I understand very well that it is not possible on so many occasions that present themselves, always to conjecture what is the wish of the Rector Major; hence we must have patience and afterwards comply with obedience.

I embrace and bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, September 21, [1754].

As for the two young men of Montella, send them both, or only the one that can come.

But inquire whether they have any patrimony.

I send a thousand blessings to Father Latessa and Frater Picone,[16992] who should recommend me to the Madonna, because I do not omit to do the same for them.

As regards the économe, since Brother Gerardo[16993] is back again, let him be économe, especially because, as I remember, Brother Gennaro is deaf, and moreover, is busy at the building.

As for your retreat, three days are sufficient for your Reverence.

As for the retreat for Mgr. di Nusco, I say yes, and give you permission, provided it is given within the month of October; because on the 1st of November the Fathers will have to set out for the missions.

Tell Don Benedetto [Grazioli] that I will most cordially recommend him to God, and have others to do the same. But let him render me the same favor; and your Reverence should recommend me every morning at Mass.

I embrace and bless all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Measures to be taken in regard to a student.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, September 28, [1754].

Donato Antonio, bearer of these lines, was anxious to have his son at Bovino;[16994] but such a thing could not possibly have been allowed him. I have, however, consented that for the re-establishment of his health the young man might go to Our Lady of Consolation [Iliceto]. See to it, therefore, that he be sent at once to Iliceto with one of our Fathers; and I should prefer that you yourself would accompany him.

If you cannot at once send Father N. as his companion, send him as soon as you possibly can. The Father that is to accompany him must behave with circumspection.

The two young men have been sent away; one had no patrimony, the other was a seminarian, and a seminarian of the Bishop of Muro.[16995] Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Frater N. told his father that he felt as if he had a hot iron in his intestines. For what reason did he express himself in this way to his father? See what is at the bottom of this, and act accordingly. Live Jesus and Mary!

He approves of the manner in which he acted in regard to the student Manfredonia.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, October 2, [1754].

Give thanks to Jesus Christ for having inspired you to send the young man away at night.[16996] You must, however, not be disturbed. What fault could you have committed in permitting him to speak to his father in company with Father Strina? Sometimes it is unavoidable to allow young people to speak with their relatives.

Last evening I had an interview with him; he is a little hardened. That he concealed his temptation so long is what injured him. As for a dispensation, he must not think of it. If he wishes after all to lose his vocation and his soul, so much the worse for him. We shall try to help him as much as we can.

For pity's sake, do never use in regard to yourself the words: Drive me out of the Congregation. You thereby inflict a wound on the love that I bear you. I really love and esteem you very much. Even though I sometimes reprimanded you, I never yet doubted your good intentions. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Recommend and have recommended to God Father Fiocchi who is suffering greatly from fever at Ciorani. Live Jesus and Mary!

Inform me what the relatives of Manfredonia did afterwards. Live Jesus and Mary!

Sentiments of the saint in regard to dispensation from the vows.

[October, 1754.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I bless your exercises and your triduos.

Your Fathers do not reason well in regard to the affair of Manfredonia. If this door is once opened, it will be sufficient for any one that is tempted and wishes to leave, to become stubborn in order to be dismissed with a dispensation; then there would be no use of making a vow of perseverance.

It is true that this subject does not render any more services, and I do not know how it will all end;[16997] but so much the worse for him. For the sake of an individual I cannot possibly inflict an injury on the whole Community. The example that I would give by now dismissing him with a dispensation would afterwards create a temptation in the minds of many. It is cast up to me that I have injured the Congregation by having granted a dispensation to those that have already left us; but in their case other reasons had supervened, and perhaps I proved myself too weak in their regard. Henceforth,—let this be communicated to all—he that wishes to leave the Congregation without a reason, must make up his mind to leave it in mortal sin. No one will be able to take away from me this conviction; and tell your Fathers that no one should speak to me any more to the contrary.

This time you do not deserve a penance, but at another time if this happened again you would deserve one. I bless you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER SAVERIO ROSSI, THE RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT CIORANI

Exemplary chastisement inflicted on a disobedient subject.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

[NOCERA], October 18, [1754].

Since Father Grassi[16998] has refused to go to Iliceto, write to him at once that on account of this refusal I dismiss him and declare him excluded from the Congregation.

Let us pray to God that, if there are similar subjects among us, they may leave us promptly. If perfect submission to holy obedience is lost among us, it will be all over with the Congregation.

It will be well to notify the Vicar-General that this man is no longer a member of our Congregation. Also inform the Bishop of Cava of what has happened, since this gentleman might assume importance in that part of the country and thus throw dishonor upon us. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 188

TO FATHER D. GASPARO CAIONE

Various recommendations relative to the house at Caposele, to private retreats, and to the students.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 12, [1754].

I cannot but approve of the sale of the vineyard. As for the proceeds of this sale, since you desire them to be devoted to the benefit of the Congregation for the glory of Jesus Christ, we shall examine with Don Andrea [Villani] what is the best use we can make of them. I am of the opinion that the whole should be converted into capital for the benefit of the Congregation.

If the Archbishop Nicolai [di Conza] insists, answer him again, but only as if the answer came from yourself, that you have received from me the order to keep no one in the house longer than twenty days; that you had taken it upon yourself to allow a stay of thirty days, while the Lazarist Fathers keep no one longer than fifteen days. It must be understood that our houses are not prisons; otherwise we shall render ourselves odious to the whole diocese. If after this the archbishop still presses the matter, tell him that you must write to me about it, and then send me a few lines.

For certain good reasons I do not deem it expedient that Brother N. should return to your house; let him go to Iliceto whence Brother N. will come.

I am very glad to hear that there is a prospect of having dry rooms; for I am continually disquieted by the fact that the rooms there are so damp. Hence see to it that as soon as the season arrives,—in April or May,—the plastering of the rooms should be begun, according to the opinion of Father Garzilli and others.

Tell the Brothers that they must not give to women any orders to purchase things for them.

I am told that Frater N. has been given to melancholy for some time, and it is whispered here that one of the students has been mentally affected. Inform me whether the fact is true about N. and how his health is now, and whether I should write to him.

Fears are here expressed about the students who are and who will be in this house; for I am informed that they have so easily an occasion to see young girls who are engaged in working at the building. Give me your opinion about this matter, and be on your guard; for if it be necessary, we shall have to remove the young men to another place.

In regard to yourself personally send me some news about your health. I have made inquiries and was told that you are still very much enfeebled.

On, feast-days it is sufficient if you hear confessions till half an hour after the particular examination, that is, till after dinner, and no longer. Do not trouble yourself about the number of confessions; and let things go as they go. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

In regard to the work on the building, I bless all that you do; yet be careful always to take counsel; and, moreover, do not incur too many expenses; for I have remarked that all Superiors are anxious to build in order to show what they have done. I beg you not to trouble yourself too much about the work on the buildings; and on account of the improvements that are to be made the Community should not be made to suffer any privations either in regard to food or clothing. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 189

TO THE SAME

Answer to be given to his bishop if the latter should wish to recall him to his diocese.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 14, [1754].

The enclosed letters having reached me, I opened them to see what they contained; for I had been informed of the agreement made between the Signor Cantore and the Bishop of Troia, for the purpose of forcing you to go to Troia to take charge of the seminary. I do not doubt your constancy, and I have read with pleasure the letter of your worthy uncle,[16999] who says that it is a conspiracy that hell has formed in order to disquiet you. But I hold for certain that this will not cause you any disquietude, and that it will only make you laugh.

Let us come to the point. The bishop threatens to order you to return to Troia. You know what answer to give; but allow me to suggest something. The bishop says that you have promised him obedience. In the first place, the reigning Sovereign Pontiff, Benedict XIV., in the Constitution Ex quo dilectus, etc., of January 14, 1747, has declared that this is to be understood in the sense that the one ordained cannot leave the church to which he has been attached without the permission of the bishop, unless he enters some religious Order or regular Chapter, which our Congregation resembles. This as you see, refers to the case when the one ordained is attached to some church of the diocese. Now you have been ordained for the Congregation without having been attached to the diocese of Troia.[17000] It also refers to the case when the one ordained wishes to live outside of the diocese, and not when he has entered a Congregation approved by the Pope.

Declare, therefore, to Cantore that it is not necessary for the bishop to make a move in this matter, since you yourself are able to have recourse to the Pope at Rome. I say this, because the bishop counts perhaps on the good standing and influence that he enjoys in Rome; but he surely will never succeed.

I doubt whether it is expedient to answer Cantore immediately, or to await a second letter; for if you do not answer, the bishop may give up his intention. I leave this matter to your prudence. At least I should wish that you defer your answer as long as possible; and as Cantore has taken the affair upon himself, and has compromised the bishop, I would counsel you to complain about this proceeding in your answer.

It is nevertheless desirable that you should write at once to your uncle, to thank him for his good advice, and to ask him, if an occasion offers, to persuade the bishop not to follow up his intention. I fear that this good prelate may give you and me a great deal of trouble. He has near him Don Carmine. . . . . who has been at the Chinese College, formerly Rector of the seminary of the neighboring diocese of Troia, a learned and saintly man; why does he not take him? If you write to Cantore, you may hint this to him. After all, if the bishop wishes a good Rector, let him not grudge the expense, and he will have one.

To sum up. Write so forcibly that they will persuade themselves that they will never succeed in shaking your resolution. I think that even now it would be better to send an answer, but do so only after two weeks; otherwise the bishop might become ill-disposed towards us, thinking that we had withheld your letter.

Give me a copy of what you have to write, so that I may be able to make my answer agree with yours; for it may easily happen that the bishop will afterwards write to me about the matter. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO SISTER MARIA VINCENZA GIANNASTASIO IN THE MONASTERY OF THE SS. ANNUNZIATA, AT CAVA

Behavior amid contradictions.—Advice in regard to direction and confession.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 8. [1755?]

I have received the stipends for fourteen Masses, and the two baskets of sweetmeats; for which please accept my thanks. For pity's sake, not so many presents! What I desire of you is that you should become a saint.

As for the persecutions to which you are subjected, love them. They please me more than if you were working miracles.

Always recommend to our Lord in a particular manner those persons who persecute you more, and render them services whenever you can. Show them at least a pleasant countenance, salute them affectionately, but without affectation; speak well of every one, and whenever you commit a fault against meekness, repent of it at once; then become quiet.

The advice of Father Stasio is good, but it is not good for you. It is better for you to think of the mercies of God of which you have been the object, and of the immense and ardent love that Jesus Christ bears to a loving and faithful soul when it remains faithful even in aridities and mortifying things. The Lord draws you by the way of love; it is this way that you should walk: it is that which appears to me the surest for everyone. It closely unites souls to God; it gives strength and perseverance. Quis me separabit a caritate Christi? [Who shall separate me from the love of Christ?—Rom. viii. 35.]

I have spoken of the confessor to Mgr. [of Cava]. Have patience; do as I tell you. Far away from you as I am, I can give you but little assistance. Take then D. Pietro Galise; tell him all that I have told you, and you will see that he will not differ from my direction, at least in essential things. For the rest, in accidental and less important things, as the omission of Communion or mortifications under certain circumstances, you should always be guided by his decision. Have patience. Here is what you should do: Ask Monsignor for this good priest, and he will surely send him to you.

If, however, Don Pietro should give you instructions that are absolutely opposed to mine, we shall then arrange with each other afterwards. But in the meantime, do what you are told; begin in this way; then write to me from time to time, and let us see how the vessel will sail. I will not fail to give you all the necessary assistance. You should say to yourself that after all it is God who is to make you a saint, and not the confessors.

Recommend me to Jesus and Mary. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO SISTER MARIA GIOVANNA DELLA CROCE

He exhorts her to love contempt and to love the Sisters that oppose her.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 14, 1755.

I have been sick; and now I answer your letter. I hear that you are disconsolate, and that pleases me; but what displeases me is that when any one bestows upon you marks of contempt, you complain and lament for entire months. This shows that you are not yet humble and dead to yourself. Do not tell me any more such things, but inform me that when you receive any injury you are inferiorly pleased, and that you feel great affection for the one that has gratified you in this manner. In your meditations let all your resolutions and prayers be directed to the attainment of this disposition; and then if you commit faults, renew your resolution and be calm.

I again recommend to you a day of retreat more than the use of the discipline.

As for your idea that you wish no more to see creatures, tell me what do you mean by that? You are in the convent, in which you must necessarily have intercourse with your Sisters and serve the Community. As for the parlor, do not go there except through obedience and sheer necessity. Explain therefore to me what is your idea.

Always recommend me to Jesus Christ, and try to love him much. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 192

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

He presses him to make another application to the Archbishop of Conza.—Various details.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

PAGANI, January 27, 1755.

I have just received your letter in which you say nothing about going to the Archbishop [of Conza], because perhaps you may not yet have received my letter. I therefore briefly say again what I have written.

Please go as soon as possible to the archbishop and beg him in my name to remember his promise, that is, of sending if he thinks fit, the candidates for ordination to our house when the time for the ordination arrives. Tell him that I have not Fathers to give the exercises at the seminary more than once a year. On these occasions sermons must be preached for the seminarians that study, and also for the priests that come there, and sometimes in the presence of the Monsignor himself. Hence it is necessary for us to know what kind of ecclesiastical sermons are to be preached; and there are some of us who know not how to do this kind of work; nor can one repeat the same sermons that are once preached.

This was the substance of my letter. Your Reverence i s prudent enough to represent this to him most distinctly, but you must speak resolutely. It is necessary that this affair should be at once settled; for the longer we follow a custom, the more difficult will it be for us afterwards to break through it.

As to the students, the matter is understood. It may be that I shall send you Frater de Michele,[17001] because the air here does not benefit him.

To Signor Cantore [of Troia] it seems fit that your Reverence should write again briefly what you have already written. I have already received your letter and have forwarded it. Erase from it the words; although the Pope should command it. It is sufficient to say that if the bishop should give a formal order, you would not be obliged to obey. And if an order comes from Rome you are also ready to go to the Pope.

As regards the flag-stones for the rooms, I have been told that they are the cause why so many insects are in the rooms; this is the reason why I wish to have them replaced if possible by a sort of pavement, although this would increase the expense. If possible I shall have workmen come from this place.

In the Chapters recommend obedience in the missions, and inform them that during the mission they should not touch any one, big or little; that they should make meditation, at least once a day, and should have Chapter.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

BROTHER ALFONSO.

[P. S.] The secretary sends his regards, and copies as much as he can of what you have written to him, but it is not very suitable. I send you a paper on the manner of preaching, and if you could have it gradually copied, and then have it sent me, you would do me a favor, because I have not time to copy it.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, March 23. [1755?]

Father de Meo is coming to you. It is sufficient if he applies himself to his studies. Do not charge him with the duty of attending to a confraternity nor of hearing the confessions of grown up persons. However, if he manifests a desire to hear confessions, let him be satisfied with preaching, but do not urge him to do so.

Let there be no writing done during class.

Send me the writings of the deceased members, particularly those of Father Cafaro.

TO SISTER MARIA ANNA DI GESÙ, AT CAVA

Counsels in regard to prayer and the practice of religious virtues.

[The year 1755?]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

To judge by your letter, the Lord calls you to perfection. Take care then not to grow lukewarm; for souls whom God calls to perfection with a special love and whom he destines to walk on the narrow road of virtues, should respond to his offers. If they wish to follow the wide road of lukewarmness, they run the great risk of being abandoned by God and of being damned.

Thank the Lord for the lights that he has given you, and especially for the gift of prayer of recollection of which you speak. Although one does not meditate on any subject in particular, this prayer is the best of all when God grants it. But God does not grant it always. Now when you are a prey to desolation without the power of meditating and without the power of recollecting yourself, continue to make prayer with patience and perseverance. Do not doubt that you will be dearer to God than before.

Now since you have not this recollection at prayer, you should help yourself with books; and when you cannot do any other thing, resign yourself to the divine will, abandon yourself to the mercy of Jesus Christ, ask his pardon, and multiply the prayers and the acts of love towards Jesus and Mary. Whatever you suffer in this state offer always to God.

Besides detachment, I recommend to you scrupulous attention to holy poverty and to obedience; it is in this delicacy that consists in great part religious perfection.

I also recommend to you charity towards all your Sisters; support meekly and peacefully reprimands and contempt, and render good for evil to the one that persecutes you. The religious that does not do so will never become a saint. Let it, moreover, be one of your exercises in prayer to prepare for contradictions.

Finally, in the state of desolation in which you are, try to obtain the needed permissions to communicate as often as possible; and when it happens that you commit some fault, such as some act of impatience, etc., do not be troubled; humble yourself, quietly repent of it, and unite yourself more closely to God by an act of love and of confidence. If you fall a hundred times a day, use a hundred times the same remedy.

Follow these counsels, and recommend me to Jesus Christ in your visits to the Most Holy Sacrament and to the Most Holy Virgin. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO THE SUPERIORS OF MISSIONS

Regulations relative to confessions.

[The year 1755?]

All the Superiors of missions should know that it is my express wish, without any possible interpretation, with the exception of a case of necessity, which will rarely happen, that in all our missions the people when the mission is given should be fully satisfied in regard to their confessions. If therefore it should be necessary either the number of the sermons should be increased, or the Fathers should remain for some time to hear confessions without preaching. Moreover, let the meditation be made in common, at least once a day, in accordance with the Rule. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Let everyone understand that he is obliged to act in conformity with this order, if he sees that the contrary is practised. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Answer in regard to some difficulties.—The sending of two little works.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, April 2, 1755.

I am happy to know that you are in peace, and I answer your two difficulties.—You have at present, so you tell me, neither doubts nor troubles. Besides, you enjoy a peace that is troubled by nothing.—Here is my answer in a few words: Keep this peacefulness as long as fears do not come to visit you; and when they come, abandon yourself to the hands of God. I say when they come; for I believe that you will not always enjoy this tranquility. Our life should be interwoven with flowers and thorns. But this is sufficient. Let us always say: I wish for myself what God wishes, and nothing more.

I send you the Visits[17002] with the appendix which I have added, and I very much thank you for your remembrance of me before God. I beg you for the love that you bear to our Lord, to continue; for I need graces for myself and for others. I also send you the "Novena to St. Teresa."

Recommend to God a very important affair which refers to the Congregation; and ask Mother Prioress to have the Community recite for this intention the Salve Regina every day for nine days.

I am writing hurriedly; tell therefore the Mother Prioress that I thank her for the love that she shows for our Congregation; but how can I prevent other priests from adopting our costume? Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Discretion of the saint in regard to a vocation and to the foundation of a new house.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES, May 19, [1755].

Francesco de Paola[17003] is making me lose patience with his letters. I feel sorry for him, but I know not what I can do for him. If he should ever leave home and come here, I would not send him back; but I cannot write this to him. I should feel a scruple in regard to the Congregation if I would expose it to the danger of having a useless subject who could not be ordained. Besides I could not even write this since I fear that my letters might be intercepted. For this reason the enclosed letter is written in a tone of indifference.

I am staying here to arrange that affair of Sicily; the archpriest of Girgenti has already come; but I see that there is trouble ahead. In fact negotiations have been going on with the Fathers of the Mission, and I have declared, that as long as these negotiations are continued with the said Fathers, it is altogether improper for us to become involved in this affair about the foundation, otherwise it might appear that we wish to supplant them.

As to the new Father of whom you speak, have patience. Father Gallo has had a severe attack of illness and is using remedies: let us see how he will get on. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I must inform you that towards the end of July Father Apice should come here in order to go to Sorrento to give a novena, for which Canon Corbo, who lives with the Cardinal, has most urgently applied to me. Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

TO THE SACRED CONGREGATION OF BISHOPS AND REGULARS

Petition for the confirmation of the foundation of the house at S. Angelo a Cupolo in the archdiocese of Benevento.

[Month of May, 1755.]

The priest D. Alfonso de Liguori, Rector Major of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, humbly exposes to your Excellencies the following facts:

For the greater glory of God and the profit of souls, he has for about three months, with the permission of Mgr. [Francesca Pacca] Archbishop of Benevento, as appears from the permission granted to him, begun the foundation of a new house at S. Angelo a Cupolo, a district of the city of Benevento and a fief of the archbishop. This foundation will, with the divine help, result to the greatest spiritual advantages of the clergy, since in said city and in this whole vast diocese there is not a house in which the spiritual exercises can be given to the candidates for ordination, nor any Congregation to instruct the same in the art of preaching, giving missions, hearing confessions, and so forth. This foundation will also benefit the people who are both in spiritual want and numerous, as well as destitute of the ministry of priests in such a manner that hardly had some of the Fathers of the Congregation gone among them and given them some missions and other exercises of piety conformably to the end of their Institute, when they were in the greatest request in most places of the diocese. Hence, for the greater stability and safeguard of so useful a work, besides the received permission of Monsignor Archbishop of Benevento, and the testimonies of extraordinary contentment of the people of said district, the petitioner also desires the approbation and good pleasure of your Excellencies; humbly begging that he may be consoled with such approbation, etc.

Answer of the Congregation. "The Congregation of the very Eminent Cardinals who preside over the affairs and consultations of the Bishops and Regulars, in view of the report of the Archbishop of Benevento, has charged the latter (the truth of the facts given having been demonstrated) to grant to the petitioner the object of his request according as he shall think fit.

He sends him two of his works.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, June 4, [1755]

I send you the second volume [of my Moral Theology] with a little work on the religious state. This little work, it is true, is directly addressed to our Congregation, but may also be useful for religious vocations of every kind. At least you may use the considerations that are at the end, and you will no doubt be pleased with them.

Father Pagano[17005] has told me that he wished to take my Moral Theology for those that follow the longer course in your house. Remind him of this promise if you think fit.

Please let me know at an opportune time what has been concluded in regard to the foundation of Girgenti.

Do not forget to recommend me to Jesus Christ; I have also been recommending you and are recommending you still. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 201

TO THE SOVEREIGN PONTIFF BENEDICT XIV

He sends him the second volume of his Theology, and asks him for some spiritual favors for his Congregation.

[June 8, 1755]

Most Holy Father: I send to your Holiness the second volume of the Moral Theology which has caused me two years of labor. I hope that it will not be disagreeable to your Holiness to deign to cast a glance at it.

Besides the Bull of your Holiness, I confess that I have received great light from your most worthy notifications which have been my guide in the questions that are therein examined with great learning and labor. Of the practical matters appertaining to the instruction of confessors, I have made an abridgment in the vernacular, have inserted it in the work, and had it separately printed, and I send it to your Holiness together with other little ascetical works which I take the liberty of offering to you, trusting that in your kindness you will be pleased with it. The said abridgment entitled Pratica will I hope be of great use for the instruction of new confessors in regard to every state and every kind of persons, both good and bad.

I am not so presumptuous as to claim a recompense; it is sufficient for me that your Holiness accepts and blesses what I have offered, so that my books, if there is any good in them, may contribute to the salvation of souls. But prostrate at your feet, I supplicate your Holiness for a spiritual favor in behalf of my little Congregation. By the approbation of your Holiness our Congregation has come into existence. The favors that we ask your Holiness are: the communication of the privileges of the Fathers called the Pious Workers,[17006] and the faculty of being able to have the subjects of the Congregation ordained under the title of mensa communis, at least for a certain determined number, conformably to what you have kindly granted to the Fathers of Monte Argentaro, called Passionists. In this way the Congregation will be able to develop itself, since the harvest that we have had at hand is so great.

But in order that the favor may be complete would your Holiness be so kind as to grant to the Rector Major of our little Congregation the faculty of giving Letters dimissory, to the said candidates for ordination, and that the same may be ordained by the Archbishop of Benevento? Finally, to comply with the request of the archbishop of this diocese we have founded a house which is entirely subject to your Holiness; it is in the diocese of Benevento, at S. Angelo. Hence I beg you to give a special blessing to this foundation, by which we are doubly the subjects of your Holiness. I have asked that they may be ordained at Benevento; otherwise the favor would be useless for the reason which the sagacious mind of your Holiness can appreciate. Should we not be thought worthy of obtaining this favor from your Holiness who has called into being this our little Congregation, much less should we be able to obtain it from your successors.

We are moreover in trouble by not having the royal exequatur; since we have not yet thought the time opportune for presenting the Brief of your Holiness granted to us seven years ago. If your Holiness were to say a word to our king in regard to the royal consent, I should think that it would be of great avail. . . . . (The rest is wanting.)

To this petition the Pope sent the following answer:

[July 15, 1755.]

To our son Alfonso de Liguori, priest of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer at Nocera de' Pagani.—Benedict XIV.

To my dear Son, health and apostolic benediction.

We have received your letter of June 8, together with the second volume of your Moral Theology, and the other books of less bulk, but of great profit to the salvation of souls. We thank you for your present, and having cursorily looked at your book on Moral Theology (which is dedicated to us, for which we send you special thanks) we have found it full of valuable information; it will surely meet with universal approbation and will be most useful to the public. We shall gradually read it, and we hope that what remains for us to read will correspond to what we have read.

We have read the petitions that you have offered in behalf of your Congregation. With the exception of our blessing, which we willingly bestow upon you and upon the whole Congregation, the rest will be of little service to you as long as you have not obtained the royal exequatur for our Brief, expedited seven years ago. We shall not omit to do our part with the Duke of Cerisano, ambassador of the king and of the two Sicilies, who is with us, and if our efforts are successful, we shall think of the rest. . . .

Given at Rome at St. Maria Major, July 15, 1755, the fourteenth year of our Pontificate.

According to the original draught preserved in the archives of Father General at Rome.

Letter 202

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

Various affairs.—Orders and counsels concerning the building of the house at Caposele.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, June 10, [1755].

I answer your last letter. I have written to you a letter in which I told you that there is no need of coming in July since the Chapter had to be postponed till October, and D. Saverio [Rossi] has been unwell and had to go away for a change of air, and I do not know how his health is at present. There are other reasons, but the chief reason is that Don Andrea [Villani] must necessarily be present at the foundation of the house at Benevento; a storm is feared on the return of the archbishop.

As regards Father N. my dear Gasparo, I have told you, and I say, that this young man makes me tremble for his perseverance because he has a head too thoughtless and unsteady.[17007] At the end of July he is to come here to give the exercises at Sorrento; if he has to drink the waters at Castellammare, he may set out sooner and come at the beginning of July. But he does not like the idea of staying with me, because I gave him a gentle correction. Now what is to be done? If he should at the end do something rash, so much the worse will it be for him. God will then have no need of him. Let us assist him, but it is not necessary to satisfy him in everything, for he is never satisfied. I commit him in this matter to your prudence.

Concerning Father N., his brother has written to me. I answered him that for an interview with the said Father I gave him permission, although I hear that the interview has already taken place. As to going afterwards to Naples, I forbid, have forbidden and will forbid such a thing; and inform the Father of this in a gentle way so that there may be no thought of going to Naples. What trouble we have with so many different heads!

As regards the paving-tiles, that is understood. As to the plinths they may be put down afterwards, and it will be better to make a trial with paving-tiles in two or three rooms; and a trial might be made with the rough-casting of which Father Ferrara has spoken; but the architect says that this will all be useless, and that the dampness of the walls, the frost of winter coming a little afterwards, will make all come down.

The news about Fr. Agostiniano pleases me, but I have a doubt about his perseverance.

I bless all. The affairs at Benevento are now prospering.

Let me hear at once, when you receive information, whether Father Margotta has made good arrangements with [D. Benedetto] Grazioli. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

When speaking about the building with the Archbishop [of Conza] especially about remedying the dampness, be careful not to enter into any promise that things should be done so or so. If he speaks of the matter evade the question and say that counsel has been taken about the best method, that a trial would be made, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 203

TO SISTER MARIA VINCENZA GIANNASTASIO, AT CAVA

Counsels regarding the acceptance of employments and the use of mortifications.

[The year 1755?]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I never promised Don Francesco di Franco that I would come to give the novena; I only said to him that I would try to send another Father. But this has not been possible.

See whether five hours of rest are not too little for you; take six hours of rest if you suffer from want of sleep. As for employments, in future neither desire nor refuse any, and pay attention to this point, for thus you will do the will of God. Continue your Communions as I have regulated them, and do not trouble yourself about the rest. As regards mortifications, those that I have allowed you are sufficient; do not do more; only you may wear during the day a little chain on your arm in order to remind you that you should offer acts of love to Jesus and Mary.

I have told you that I can direct you from afar; do not therefore say any more that I should call upon you. This would give me pain, and I would not come.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 204

TO FATHER CARMINE PICONE, VICE-MASTER OF NOVICES IN CIORANI.[17008]

He tells him to invest certain postulants with the habit.

[About June 12, 1755.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Francesco Antonio is coming; keep him with the novices, and let him do all that which those must do that are preparing for receiving the habit. He may receive the habit with the two others[17009] on the feast of St. Aloysius.

Let them make the exercises, but allow them to come to recreation. Also moderate for all the practices of devotion and application during the warm weather. Let them go out often, and moderate the use of the little chains while the weather is hot. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 205

TO THE SAME

A recommendation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Certainly, grant to N. some solace and more liberty; but assist him, as he has much to contend against. See that you give him some remedy, milk or some other thing. Tell him from me that he should have confidence; that nothing is the matter.

I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 206

TO THE SAME

Qualities that novices should have.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your Reverence should go on with great courage and confidence in God, and not be disturbed about anything, nor be grieved, if a novice grows cold and leaves us. Help all of them as far as you can; but if any one commits habitual faults and does not show the right spirit, let me know this, because then I will send him away. Let him remain, who is willing to remain. Let only those remain that wish to suffer all, and wish to be really saints! Tell this to all the novices and add that he that has not this spirit, is not made for the Congregation.

There are now many of us. The Congregation has no need of men who are without fervor.

Among other things see that they obey you. Always tell them that those that are stubborn, or attached to their relatives and to self-esteem, cannot be of any use to the Congregation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 207

TO THE SAME (?)

Encouragement to be given to a postulant.

Live Jesus and Mary!

If N. does not come to receive the letter, carry it to him yourself, and encourage him. He will still have many tempests to go through in order to follow his vocation, as his father is at present by no means favorable.

I very well know that his father is disquieted; but what I am sorry to hear is, that the young man has grown colder and has become discouraged. If he remains firm, he must not doubt that God and we shall come to his aid. But if he begins to waver, saying now yes, then no, you must declare to him that I will even refuse to receive him.

Carefully inquire about his health; for I have been told that he has some trouble with his chest, and that he has been spitting blood. If this is the case how could I receive him if he suffers from his chest? Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 208

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

Various recommendations relative to the works of the saint and to the interests of the Congregation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, June 22, [1755].

Let me know what business Father Margotta has transacted with [D. Benedetto] Grazioli, if you have any news about it.

Don Andrea Villani asks and begs that an alarm-clock be sent to the place where he is [at S. Angelo a Cupolo]. Have patience; you may keep for yourself the English clock with the alarm, and send the old one to Don Andrea.

I expect Father Apice; he is to drink first the mineral waters, then he is to go to Sorrento to give a novena or a retreat. He will come on the 10th of July.

I send six copies of the Pratica.[17010] Later when I have an opportunity, such as to return to you the conveyance to bring Father Apice, I will send you the second volume[17011] with other copies of the Pratica to sell.

Then you must inform Father Caprioli of the cost of the second volume. The Moral Theology is sold at twenty carlini.[17012] An appendix has been added, and it cannot be sold for less. The Pratica costs one carlino.

As for all the books sold and that are to be sold, and all the other books which you will require of me do not write to me, but have in everything an understanding with Father Caprioli; the care of them has been entrusted to him by Father Saverio [Rossi] who pays for the printing.

I have already received news of Father Margotta through Father Ferrara. Tell therefore Father Margotta that as soon as he receives anything from Grazioli he should at once come here to see me; we shall then see what is to be done.

Should Father Fiocchi be with you, tell him that I have written to him two pressing letters, to return at once to Iliceto, because his presence is needed there.[17013] Let him speak to Father Giovenale. Tell this secretly to Father Fiocchi, so that he should set out at once.

It would be well if in kind words, without dispute, you could obtain a diminution from the tax.[17014] If you succeed in doing so, you must thank all those who have in any way assisted us.

Let me know all about your affairs and what has been done in regard to the tiles. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 209

TO SISTER MARIA VINCENZA GIANNASTASIO IN THE MONASTERY OF THE SS. ANNUNZIATA AT CAVA

Behavior that she should adopt in the state of desolation in which she finds herself.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, June 22, [1755].

I answer you briefly. I have read your letter, and I feel more happy because of the desolations through which the Lord has made you pass than if you had written to me that you had wrought ten miracles.

All the lights, inspirations, knowledge and intimate communications with which you have hitherto been favored came from God; of this I assure you in his name. Now God wishes you to be a saint without delay; and it is because he wishes you to be really a saint that he has put you into the state in which you are.

In this state continue to persevere in all your exercises. I also permit you, when you have time, to make another half hour's meditation; finally, continue your Communions and all the rest. As for meditation, always make it with a book, and use for this purpose my little work; especially read the considerations on the Passion of our Lord, and more particularly the affections that follow them.

In the state in which you are, you have to perform more frequently three things when you pray and communicate. You should, first, humble yourself, by acknowledging yourself worthy of severe chastisements. Secondly, resign yourself entirely to the will of God, and offer yourself to remain during your whole life and during eternity in this state of pain, and even in still greater pain if it is God's will. Thirdly, abandon yourself absolutely to the arms of the divine mercy.

Have frequent recourse to the Blessed Virgin. Let your acts of love ordinarily consist in an entire offering of yourself to God. Finally, always recommend me to Jesus Christ.

Confidence and courage! I see that Jesus Christ wishes to make you really a saint.

I thank you for your little present. I do not wish you to take again so much trouble.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Recommendations in regard to various works of the saint.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, June 28, [1755].

Send the enclosed letter to Ripacandida at the first opportunity.

It seems to me that I have sent you a certain number of copies of the Pratica for the use of your Community. Now I send ten more to be sold. Show them to those that come to visit you. In regard to the cost of the copies of the Pratica, I answer as I did in regard to the Pratica and the Moral Theology, have an understanding only with the Fathers at Ciorani,[17015] and punctually send them what they order.

The second volumes I will send you at the first opportunity when your conveyance returns, so that they may surely arrive.

I expect [Father Bernardo] Apice when he comes to drink the waters at Castellammare. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!—I also expect Father Margotta as soon as he has settled his affairs with Grazioli. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO THE SAME

Various recommendations about different subjects.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, June 30, [1755].

You have appointed Father Margotta to perform certain labors, now that we stand in need of him; but what is done is done. I beg you, however, do not in future arrange any exercises within the month of June, unless it be at the beginning of the month.

As for the missions which the Archbishop [of Conza] wishes us to give it is sufficient that you have mentioned this to me. Answer neither yes, nor no; do not accept any more missions, nor hold out any hopes for any more; because in the coming year I do not know whether we shall be able to give even one mission there, especially in winter. Now when the time arrives and it will be necessary to give the promised missions at Benevento; I shall send my excuse to the archbishop.

Let Father Apice be here about July 10, to drink the mineral waters.

For Polestra and Melaccio[17016] it wil be necessary to procure letters dimissory.

In regard to Mgr. di Muro the affair is settled.[17017] I have written to him that Francesco Antonio de Paola is with us, that when he wishes he may send for him.

As for closing the church, you have to come to an understanding with the archbishop.

As to the économe, your Reverence is the Rector. Appoint Brother Gennaro for this charge if you think fit; and Brother Gasparo you may employ wherever you please. Afterwards I will try to send him with Father D. Andrea [Villani, of S. Angelo a Cupolo]. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

When Father Apice comes, send me all the second volumes that you have there,[17018] because I wish to insert some sheets and have them bound; and then I will send them back. This I will do when the conveyance that brought Father Apice returns. I will send you the second volumes to-day if the young carrier will take charge of them, together with six copies of the Pratica and two of the Dissertations on probable opinion.[17019]

I send you also a package containing copies of the Elenchus for the second volume; have them distributed among those that have the first edition of the work. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I embrace and bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Tell Father Margotta to read the letter at once. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO THE SAME

He enjoins upon him obedience to the physician.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, 6. [July, 1755?]

Before speaking of other things I must tell you that you do not belong to yourself but to Jesus Christ and the Congregation; hence you must take care of your health and be obedient.

In a word, I tell you that you must obey the physician in all things, just as the Rule commands us to do, either on the one hand by eating no more food prepared with oil, or on the other hand by taking the medicine that is prescribed. Moreover, during the day you must sleep at least half an hour, and during the night, six full hours.

What shall I say in reference to the letters dimissory of the young men? I pray to Jesus Christ to grant me patience. I have also written a petition to the archbishop, which you will please forward as soon as possible. If an answer comes addressed to you, open it; and if you see that the archbishop remains inflexible, ask Father Margotta in my name to go himself to the archbishop and to ask for this favor, etc. Write also to the Vicar-General, and thank him specially for me for all that he has done with the archbishop in favor of these young men. Letter 213

TO THE NOVICE LUIGI CAPUANO,[17020] AT CIORANI

What was to be his behavior under difficult circumstances in regard to his vocation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SARAGNANO, July 16, 1755.

My dear Brother, summon up courage! I am confident that God expects great things of you, since hell creates so much noise in order to draw you away from your vocation.

It may perhaps happen as I have told you, that you must go by order of the king to some monastery, to be examined in regard to your intention. Recommend yourself to the Mother of God, and fear nothing.

To the monastery your relatives will undoubtedly come to tempt you, and the monks themselves will practise the devil's art under pretense of appeasing your father and your mother; they will represent to you that it is a matter of conscience if you thus bring ruin upon them. Make no account of such scruples; if they wish to be ruined, it will be their fault. Tell them that in order to appease them you cannot imperil your eternal salvation by losing your vocation, which is quite certain.

Do not doubt that, after this trial at the monastery, your relatives will no longer annoy you.

Pay attention to this point: if you go to the monastery, do not believe what certain religious may tell you; they have been gained over by your relatives, and will give you a thousand reasons to induce you to return home. If they come, be careful not to listen to them, and be sure that they wish to deceive you. Hence as soon as they begin to perform the office of the devil, dismiss them in a kind manner. Do not undertake to answer them, because they will succeed in perplexing you. The best thing would be not to answer, but to say that you will recommend yourself to God in order to find out his will; and then rid yourself of them in this way.

I say this, not that you must now pray to God that he may make known to you his will, since he has already made it known to you in making you understand that he wishes you to be a member of the Congregation; but this answer will deliver you from their importunities. By saying that you are praying to God to enlighten you in regard to his will, you will silence them, and thus force them to retire immediately.

Since Father Tannoia is not there, be guided by [Father Alessandro de] Meo. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO SISTER MARIA VINCENZA GIANNASTASIO

She should, notwithstanding her interior desolations, persevere in her exercises of piety.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SARAGNANO, July 21, [1755].

Your whole letter pleases me. One thing, however, would give me pain; it would be to hear that you are now abandoning the career upon which you have entered.

Courage, then, and firmness! Continue the exercises that you have begun, although they may be to you like the pains of hell; continue, and be assured that you will certainly become a saint.

I have told you already, and I repeat, that according to the rules laid down by the saints it is clear to me that the state of desolation and pain in which you find yourself will last a long time; perhaps it may last even till your death.

No, it is not true that God has abandoned you; on the contrary, he loves you more than before; but he wishes to try you, and to consume in the fire of tribulations the rust which your past faults has attached to your soul. Take courage, then, and go on. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 215

TO THE NOVICE LUIGI CAPUANO

Additional advice as to the trial to which he was to be subjected.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, July 22, [1755].

My dear Brother: Your relatives have already addressed to the king a memorial, in which they say that you entered the Congregation, having been misled by an elder brother, who had interested motives, and that you were taken against your will to our house at Ciorani; moreover, that the Fathers, seeing your mother advance to embrace you, rudely repulsed her and caused her to fall to the ground, to the great scandal of all. See what lies and what calumnies! Now this memorial they did not present to the king, but they carried it to Mgr. Borgia, who has written to me that we must satisfy your relatives in having you examined as to your intentions in a place where you would be under no restraint. Monsignor must, therefore, be obeyed.

Do not fear; for everything will turn out well, and so also the bishop thinks. We shall send you to Naples to the Chinese College, the Superior of which and those that are there are my friends; all will favor your vocation. If, however, your relatives send priests or religious to find out your intentions, answer according to the letter that you sent me last.

It was with regret that I read in your letter that you had experienced a very violent attack on your vocation,—words that made me doubt at first about your constancy; for I feared that you had somewhat listened to the temptation. I was, however, consoled by what you afterwards wrote to me, namely, that you knew perfectly well what you have to do, and that you would resist every temptation until death.

Always recommend yourself to the Blessed Virgin; and when a suggestion from hell is made to you, do not reason about it, but simply answer by pronouncing the names of Jesus and Mary. Do not allow yourself to be shaken; after this struggle I hope that your relatives, that is I should say, your enemies, will become quiet. I bless you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 216

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

He charitably excuses the defects of a subject.—Various matters.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

CIORANI, August 3, [1755].

My dear Don Gasparo: What shall I say about Father N.? He believes that he is doing right when he does those things, and disturbs others and also himself; and I fear, as I have frequently said, that the devil may on this account make him one day lose his vocation. He is, however, humble, zealous, observant of the Rule, and loves the Congregation; but he labors and engages in work with such a passion that he disquiets himself and others. What is to be done? Everyone has his faults. I have more of them than others.

As to Brother Gerardo, fiat voluntas tua! [Thy will be done!] I send him the blessing.[17021]

In regard to the grain, those at Pagani wish that I should write to you to send them ten tomoli.[17022] I have answered them: What right have you to ask for these ten tomoli? Now I have written that your Reverence had spoken to me in your last letter about debts, provisions that you have to buy, etc.

For the rest, if your Reverence could send them, as if of your own accord four or five tomoli, it would be well.

As to the sick Fratres, I am glad that they are somewhat better. Say from me to Frater Melchionna that Father Ferrara has said nothing to me, that he was feigning sickness, and that if he had said anything to me about it, I would not have believed him; tell him to take care of his health, to do the will of God, and remain quiet.

Let twenty-five carlini be sent to us, as I have spent that amount for repairing a copper-plate engraving of the Madonna. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 217

TO THE NOVICE LUIGI CAPUANO

He advises him how he should behave in the temptation to which his vocation is exposed.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 4, [1755].

Your relatives have become somewhat pacified, but not entirely; and as I hear, your father and your mother are going to Ciorani to tempt you by tenderness and by false reasons. Be on your guard; this will be the last assault; do not give a chance to the devil to raise a laugh at your behavior up to the present day.

Yet while reading in your letter that you are continually agitated by temptations to give up your vocation, I cannot help fearing for you. But it is not on account of these temptations; for as long as you recommend yourself to God and repel them, there is nothing to fear. What I fear is, that you give too much ear to them, that you reason with them, and that you do not take care to have recourse to Jesus and Mary when they come. If you act differently from what I tell you, you will lose the grace of vocation and of eternal salvation; for your vocation is clearer than the noonday sun; if you lose it, what will become of you?

I should like you to write to me again and to tell me what motives the devil proposes to you to leave the Congregation after you have so much desired to enter it, and God has given you so many graces to enable you to do so. Is it perhaps your fondness for your relatives? But why? To please your relatives should you wish to abandon Jesus Christ who has deigned with so much love to call you to a life of sanctity? Is it perhaps because in the Congregation one has to suffer?—Enough of this! for I am only speaking to the winds, not knowing in what way the devil wishes to entrap you; this is the reason why I beg you to write me in detail what are your temptations.

For pity's sake! my dear D. Luigi, do not expose yourself to lose this precious crown that Jesus Christ is preparing for you. When an infernal thought enters your mind, represent to yourself the moment of death, and consider what remorse you would feel if you had the misfortune to die out of the Congregation after having abandoned God on account of some earthly purpose. Ah, how I should regret to see you lose your vocation! The efforts that Lucifer has made to excite your relatives, or rather the enemies of your soul, to do what they have done, convince me that if you remain firm, you are destined to do great things for God; for all those who in the Congregation have been engaged in these terrible contests with their relatives, without allowing themselves to be shaken, have afterwards done marvelous things.

For mercy's sake, when the temptation presents itself, repel it forcibly and indignantly by invoking the holy names of Jesus and Mary, and often repeat these all-powerful names. Renew then your resolution by saying: No, my Jesus! I do not wish to leave Thee; no, never; should I even be obliged to die on account of my resolution.—And if, notwithstanding all this, the temptation does not leave you, go if you have permission, to the foot of the altar, before the Blessed Sacrament, or throw yourself, in your room, at the foot of the crucifix, and sigh and pray in this manner: My Jesus, help me; I do not wish to leave Thee; no, no, no!—Then without delay confer with the Master of novices about your temptation; and if it be necessary, write always to me.

I wish to help you as much as I can; but if you neglect to have recourse to Jesus Christ and to the Blessed Virgin, who is the Mother of perseverance, and to consult the Master of novices, I regard your vocation as lost. Look at poor N. and poor N. on the point of leaving the Congregation, yet without their own fault; oh, how I pity them! and you should voluntarily listen to the suggestions of hell by returning to the world, so as to become the laughing-stock not only of hell, but of your whole diocese, of Bishop Borgia, and of everybody! I hope to God's goodness that this may not be so.

Every morning, on rising, I beg you, renew the firm resolution to persevere in the Congregation, and always repeat it during meditation, at your Communion, at your visit, and at your examination of conscience. Always invoke Jesus and Mary, and consult your Father Master. By acting in this manner you need not fear to lose your vocation.

I bless you and I await your next letter so as to know in what way the devil tempts you. I recommend you to Jesus and Mary; do also the same for me. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 218

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

He counsels holy revenge.[17023]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 5, [1755].

I have heard in what a complimentary manner the people of Caposele have acted towards you. Well! we must try to revenge ourselves! Be therefore careful to increase almsgiving at the door, and be liberal to those that ask alms. Besides, take special care of the confraternity of which those ungrateful men are the members.

What I regret is that these disturbers of the peace will leave the confraternity and not have the courage, to return to it; for from this will arise a spiritual injury for which I am more sorry than for the temporal. Try therefore and ask others to try by kind words to induce them not to give up the confraternity; invite them especially if it be necessary, without however making mention, particularly in sermons, of what has happened. During the novenas let the preacher encourage them to frequent the confraternity.

As for those that have conducted themselves so loyally, you must thank them in a special manner; and it might be well, if you think fit, to go from house to house to thank them; at least you will derive the advantage that they will remain attached to us. What else could we do? Such is the world. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 219

TO THE NOVICE LUIGI CAPUANO

Happiness that one enjoys in the Congregation.—Answer to several objections.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SALERNO, August 7, [1755].

I have read your last letter, and I am consoled to hear that you are adopting the means to overcome the temptations of the enemy.

As for your relatives, besides Jesus Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and the saints, who are to you more than a father, a mother, and brothers, are we not also brothers to you? Your relatives love you, but as enemies, because they wish that which will make you lose your soul; we, on the contrary, love you as true friends, desiring to see you happy in this life and in the next. Happy, I say, even in this life; for the pleasures of the world do not satisfy the soul, while a holy life with the innocent recreation that the Congregation permits, is able to delight the soul, because in such a life it finds God. In the beginning you may not entirely enjoy this peace, since you must first overcome the temptations by which God wishes to try you; but after the victory one enjoys the peace that surpasses all the delights the world and the senses can procure: quæ exsuperat omnem sensum [which surpasses all understanding].

Besides, as you see, it is not true that with us we are always shut up in the convent. When you are a priest you will go on missions the greater part of the year, moving through the country in order to save souls.[17024]

One dies young. This is not true; for many among us enjoy better health in the Congregation than they enjoyed in the world. And after all, if die we must, can there be anything more beautiful than to die for the love of Jesus Christ? Of what use is life, if we do not employ it for God?

O how much was I pleased by what you wrote at the end of your letter concerning your relatives! Thank Jesus Christ and his holy Mother, who have inspired you with these holy sentiments. Courage then! let us sanctify ourselves, and pray to Jesus Christ for me. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO SISTER MARIA NICOLETTA LEONI (DI CALVANICO), IN THE MONASTERY OF S. GIUSEPPE AT FISCIANO

He recommends to her resignation to God's will.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SALERNO, August 11, [1755].

I have received your first letter enclosing a honorarium, and the Mass has been said. I received your second letter to-day here at Salerno, also enclosing a honorarium; and to-morrow I will say the second Mass for you in order that the Blessed Virgin may obtain for you the grace that you desire. But you should be fully resigned to the divine will; if not, the Blessed Virgin will not grant you the grace. I recommend myself to your prayers. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I did not answer you the other day, as I did not know whether you were at Fisciano, your letter not indicating the place where it was written. If I answer you to-day, it is because I learned by chance that your letter came from Fisciano. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 221

TO SISTER MARIA VINCENZA GIANNASTASIO

He encourages her to suffer contradictions in a Christian manner, and gives her important advice.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

SCALA, September 14. [1755?]

I write you from Scala where I received your letter. All the storms, both exterior and interior, which you experience, I have foretold you. They are the cause of affliction to you; as for me they afford me consolation.

How happy am I to know that you are treated as a foolish woman! Be courageous, and continue to be thus foolish for the love of Jesus Christ.

The words of your confessor were for you a cross harder to bear; but he spoke to you with the best intentions. For the rest, I repeat my appreciation and the former obedience that I have imposed upon you, and I assure you on the part of the Most Blessed Trinity that you are in the grace of God. Not only does God wish your salvation; not only has he pardoned your sins; he also really wishes you to be a saint if you persevere.

Be then firm in omitting nothing of what I have told you; and unceasingly pray to Jesus and Mary to obtain perseverance. To this you should always come back, for the persecutions are great, and I believe that they will become greater.

If you think fit, confide entirely in the ordinary confessor, and beg him to speak in your defence to the Superior of the convent in order that you may be able to live in peace. If you do not wish to make this offer to the confessor, beg at least the bishop to come to see you; expose to him in a general way the past and the present state of your conscience, and tell him what I have advised you to do. Monsignor can indeed render you a great service by ordering that you should be left alone.

To go to the parlor? To see your relatives? There is no longer any question about that. Henceforth there should be for you only God, and nothing else.

Take care not to omit the common exercises, and to attend them punctually; fulfil also the duties of your employments, and render service to the Community as much as obedience imposes this upon you; for if you fail in this point, you may be attacked and may be charged with illusion. But how could this be done, if you never fail in any of the duties of your state of life?

The attractions that you feel from time to time, I am convinced, come from God. It is God that draws you to his perfect love by communicating his strength to your soul in order to resist the storms to which you are exposed. They are, you may be sure, not illusions, but divine favors, and great favors, which God grants to you in order entirely to gain your heart. Regard this as certain, and your poor soul will in this conviction take courage to resist the attacks of temptation, of distrust, of all kinds of contrarieties.

If the persecutions should continue, I should be happy, I repeat, if you could have an interview with the bishop; for he is a man of God, is prudent, and well understands how to guide souls. He will encourage you and deliver you from the annoyances which the religious and the directors may cause you.

Follow then my advice and continue the Communions, prayers, mortifications, and all the rest. However, whenever you are not very well, omit without scruple your mortifications according to the degree of your infirmity; and in doubt, do rather less than more.

If you speak to Monsignor tell him that it is I who have wished you to have this interview. You would also do well, in ordinary doubtful things and daily difficulties, to consult your ordinary confessor, whoever he may be, and to obey him if he imposes something upon you, or if he diminishes for a time your various exercises. I say for a time; for, as a general rule, I do not wish you to omit anything that I have arranged for you. I speak thus because, being far away I cannot direct you in all things that daily occur. For the rest, go on, and have not the least doubt that you are on the right road.

In your Communions always pray for me and for the Congregation, especially at this time when our wants are so great. I bless you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

She should accept a charge without objection.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, October 16. [1755?]

I answer your letter in a tardy manner; for I have been ill for a long time.

As for the office of attendant at the turn, if it is entrusted to you, accept it without objection. The distractions that it will cause you will be distractions which God wishes.

You will have, you tell me, a thousand eyes fixed upon you.—I am delighted that this is so, for you will thus be more attentive not to commit faults. Otherwise they will say: See the saint! how beautiful is her speech, how beautiful is her conduct! Let me know whether you have spoken to Monsignor. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

ALFONSO,

TO THE SAME

He exhorts her to tend to perfection with courage and perseverance.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, November 2, [1755].

For pity's sake, no more presents. I thank you, but I desire of you but one thing: it is that you devote yourself to the task of becoming a saint. Why speak to me of coming to preach a novena? I set out for Benevento in a few days with nearly all my companions.[17025]

The answer that you gave to Monsignor afforded me great pleasure. See how God comes opportunely to your aid through your Superiors! Be then faithful, and do not leave the path on which you are now walking, even though you should have to combat hell within and without.

Above all, do I recommend to you to be faithful to your accustomed prayers as long as your services are not needed by the Community. I also recommend to you detachment from all, and from myself in particular, since I can assist you only from afar. I have written out for you certain rules; observe them, and imagine that I am always repeating to you what I have said and written to you.

I send you the new edition of the little work called the Visits, printed by D. Benedetto Gessari; hymns are added to it, and at the end you will find a treatise on the will of God. As all perfection consists in conformity to the divine will, you may little by little use this short treatise even for meditation.

Always recommend me to Jesus Christ in your prayers and in your Communions. I wish you to receive holy Communion every day, except on one day of the week. Communion will obtain for you perseverance. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO,

Letter 224

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

He reproaches him for incurring a superfluous expense.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

November 16, [1755].

I saw Brother Francesco, and having asked him what he had been doing at Naples these past days,[17026] I received the answer that he had been looking for a copy of St. Augustine which he expected to purchase for forty ducats. But I know that you already have St. Augustine in your library. Why then make such an outlay? You will say that the copy which you have is badly printed; but I answer it is sufficient that it is a copy of St. Augustine, and a copy that is suitable for us poor people.

Then I should like to know with what money you have made this purchase. If it is money from uncertain restitutions, I should feel scrupulous about exchanging it for a better printed copy of St. Augustine; if it is money from, Don Gerardo,[17027] the priest who has been received, I wish also to have a word to say; since I am bankrupt on account of the many expenses that I have made; and on the other hand, I find myself indebted to the amount of thirty ducats for the work on the Explanation of Scripture. The publisher calls for his money, and I know not what to do. If it is the money of that priest, we should at least divide the sum between us.

You have in your house two bad Consultors, Fathers Fathers Apice and Leo, who wish to have books in a grand style, but not in accordance with our poverty. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

If you have any money to spend I would rather have you buy the works of Bellarmine, Spondano, Rinaldo (Compendium of Baronius), the library of Mansi. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

BENEVENTO, November 17, [1755].

I have heard in what misery you find yourself. For the present I do not see how you manage to live. There is but little income to be hoped for. The lands are not leased. But you would say: Let us go to Iliceto; let us go to Iliceto.[17029] And now have you anything to live on there?

Could not your Reverence in this embarrassed state of affairs avoid certain expenses? I tell you and beg you to expend no money except for what is absolutely necessary for your support. If this produces no effect, you will all have to remove to Ciorani. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO HIS BROTHER D. ERCOLE DE LIGUORI

He begs him to ask for him the blessing of his dying mother.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

BENEVENTO, November 23, [1755].

Yes; to serve you I have already written to Brother Francesco [Tartaglione] to assist you until God calls our mother to himself. [17030] How greatly am I consoled that she is now undisturbed by scruples!

Here we are giving a large mission in the city of Benevento; there is a great concourse of people, and there are eighteen Fathers engaged. We shall stay here for a month. There is no other news.

Send me the ornament which was promised by you to the Blessed Virgin; it will serve to adorn her crown. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Ask mother's blessing for me and tell her that God and the Blessed Virgin will surely secure for her eternal salvation. And I have recommended her to the prayers of the people. Live Jesus and Mary!

Various recommendations.—Some details in regard to the mission at Benevento.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

BENEVENTO, November 23, [1755].

I rejoice to hear that Father Mazzini is better, but he might have waited a little while longer and not set out while suffering from fever.

You did well in regard to Frater [D. Fabrizzio] Cimino. Your Reverence should write to Father Caione to speak or write for me—it would be better to have an interview—to the Archbishop [of Conza] in behalf of Polestra and Melaccio. But in the meantime Polestra and Melaccio should prepare for the examination for subdeaconship, because the archbishop will come to examine them. It is necessary for them to know the treatises de Horis canonicis, de Ordine, and especially de Subdiaconatu, with the treatise de Sacramentis in genere. Tell Father Siviglia to direct them in this matter.

I send to Ciorani the manuscript of Father Mazzini.

As for Frater [D. Ignazio] Fiore, the affair is being arranged.

I have already written to Ciorani and to Naples for copies of the Moral Theology and of the Pratica.

Here the mission continues amid a great concourse of people. On Saturday a mission will begin at four other places, and we shall give one to the nobles. There are many that wish to enter our Congregation, but are moved to do so by the exercises and the missions; their vocation must however first mature.

We have made great friends with the Jesuits. Here there is being established a beautiful congregation of young ecclesiastics to make them good apostolic laborers.

I bless you all, and especially the students. I will return about the 21st of December. This time will appear to me a thousand years. So far I have been ill twice. Now I am well, and am at work. Live Jesus and Mary! Father Spera is at work and gets along. Live Jesus and Mary!

Tell Father Mazzini to mention in Chapter that it would be a very great fault if one, when writing to any one of us, would put on the letter the words matters of conscience and the letter should contain nothing of the kind.

Write this also from me to Father Caione so that he may speak of it in Chapter. Live Jesus and Mary!

If you have an opportunity, send me some more copies (the small edition) of the Visits printed at Naples. Find out the time when the conveyance comes from Ciorani to this place. Live Jesus and Mary!

Send a hundred Visits to Ciorani so that they may be sent to me at the first opportunity. Live Jesus and Mary!

The measure in which accessory sciences should be studied.

NOCERA, December 15, 1755.

. . . . . As for the cornices, that is understood; leave them in the choir, because the choir belongs to the church.[17032]

I have heard some whispering that Father Leo wishes to teach mathematics, or geometry. For the principles of geometry and the four rules of arithmetic, concedo [I grant permission]; for more, no. Even Father Mabillon, who was at the head of learned men, forbade this to the religious. Tell Father Leo that by all means the course of philosophy should be finished in two years. I regret to see in the Congregation that the spirit of vanity and useless erudition is gaining ground to the detriment of important sciences. . . .

Letter 229

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, RECTOR, AND MASTER OF NOVICES AT ILICETO

Advice in regard to the health of the subjects, to useless expenses, to the practice of mortification.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 31, [1755].

In regard to Ansalone, Father Ferrara has written me a fiery letter. He tells me that it is suspected that he has been spitting blood. Hence as to his admission, tell him in my name that he must have patience, and that he should wait another month, in order that it may be more surely seen how his health will be, especially since his father has written that he was suffering from costiveness. Let him in the meantime not be dejected; I will afterwards shorten his novitiate.[17033]

I say that he should still wait another month; but when he has been once received, and has been sent by me into the country to see whether he will recover, what need is there of a new admission? However let us give this satisfaction to Father Ferrara, by keeping him in suspense for a month. But though he may have been received a second time I should have to dismiss him if he has a relapse.

Ansalone himself writes to me that he is perfectly well. Tell him in my name to take courage; he is already a member of the Congregation; why should he fear? If he continues to remain well, he shall be one of us; but if bad health returns, his admission will not hinder him from being sent away; let him be patient and cheerful.

Let us now come to a matter of greater importance. You write me that bread is wanting. . . . . But why incur so many useless, or unnecessary expenses,—expenses that are out of proportion to the present scanty resources of this house, or hardly conformable to the obedience that I have given you not to incur any expense except through sheer necessity? For pity's sake, do not now think any more of making improvements in the building, nor of any other expense but what is absolutely necessary. At present remain as you are; provide for your wants as well as you can; later on we may think of doing these things if divine Providence will permit us. According to what I learn there is a debt of a hundred and sixty ducats at Lacedogna; there are also debts at Foggia; and there is a want of oil, grain, wine, etc.; well! to what a pass will you find yourself reduced? Are you going to feed on grass, or will you be imprisoned for debt? I shall at last be obliged to treat you according to the rumors that now prevail at Ciorani.

The Chapter[17034] against my opinion has permitted the giving of a second glass of wine to any one that expresses a wish for it; but you must inform the novices that he that does this always or without a real necessity will give very little edification, and show but little mortification. I beg you to pay particular attention to this matter; for when there is question of profession I will ask you about it.

As regards having two rooms made for yourself, give up the idea for the present; later on we shall speak of it.

Frater N. writes to me for sweetmeats; I send him something that I withheld this morning from the young people among whom they were to have been distributed. I should have been better pleased had the novices asked me for mortifications and the means of loving Jesus Christ, rather than for sweetmeats.

The novice D. Gerardo [Gisone] writes to me that he is quite content, etc.; pay particular attention to him; for priests in the novitiate have more temptations than others.

I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I send you the hymn of St. Aloysius.[17035] Live Jesus and Mary!

He permits him to return to Pagani.

PAGANI, January 7, 1756.

I have read your letter, and it has so much affected me that I cannot help granting your request. Come, then, to this house at Pagani; but travel in the most convenient way possible, and take, I beg you, the same precautions as at your departure for Melfi. Choose also for this journey favorable weather and less frightful than we have at present. I am here waiting for you. Do not forget to bring me the accounts that you will be able to collect in regard to Brother Gerardo.[17037]

While awaiting the pleasure of seeing you soon, I embrace you in the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

[P. S.] I am expecting you, my dear Frater Mauro, and hours appear to me to be ages; but whether you are sick or well, it suffices that you belong to God. Do not, however, set out, I beg you, in damp weather, and as much as possible protect yourself against the cold.

I bless you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE, AT CAPOSELE

The sending of some points with regard to the Life of the Venerable Brother Gerardo.—Various counsels.—Seditious pretensions of the lay-brothers at Iliceto.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 11, [1756].

I have received your long letter which you first wrote to me.

I understand that St. Augustine's works were already bought, but I was wishing you would have bought Petavius. But have patience; let us divide the twenty ducats. For in the destitution in which I am (and God knows how great it is) I have bought this Commentary on Scripture, and I am half sorry for it; nevertheless it is certainly useful; it gives only the literal sense, but it is a sense that is indeed very necessary for one to know.

Please inform me whether the Archbishop [of Conza] is in the diocese or at Naples. If he is in his diocese, write to him from me to ask him whether he will allow Frater [Don Vito] Polestra to take Orders in tribus diebus, as the young man has completed his studies, has abilities, and has attained his twenty-sixth year.

I send you hererewith the notes taken by Father Giovenale[17038] on the Life of Brother Gerardo. Preserve and take a copy of them as well as you can, as I have asked you to do. See also about the time that you can devote to this matter. It would be well for you to spend about a quarter of an hour every day on the work, and thus you will finish the work gradually. I send you also your own manuscript; it will serve to remind you of a great many things.

I am glad that the seminarian Guglielmo has joined us. I would wish you to write to him to procure the permission of the archbishop before he sets out for Naples. His resolutions under the form of promises to the Madonna are truly full of tenderness.

As for Father Nittoli, I told him to continue to act as Prefect according to what you wrote me in your last letter. Tell him, however, from me that he should make no difficulty in giving absolution even several times a week to those of our Fratres who accuse themselves only of venial sins, past or present, provided at the time there is no habit of relapsing into sin and even when there is no extraordinary sign.

With regard to the contributions,[17039] do as seems best to you.

I bless all and especially the Prefect of the students with all his subjects.

Inform me of the number of retreats that you will have to give during this Lent. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa.

Have a watchful eye upon the lay-brothers, and do not allow them to claim rights. At Iliceto there has been a semi-revolution on this subject. The Brothers maintained that they should take precedence of the novices; that they should make the common acts after dinner, and not in the evening after having toiled all day, as is customary in other houses, now that the winter is here; and that they should have the privilege of taking a siesta[17040] after dinner, which they have not now, as the days are short and the night's sleep is sufficient. Moreover, they assert that the Carmelite lay-brothers and the Franciscan lay-brothers gained the exemption from washing dishes, and I do not know what other privilege. A fine state of affairs, truly! Hence your lay-brothers have to perform the common acts every evening. Do not allow the siesta during the day, unless there be a real necessity for it. As for washing the dishes and serving at table, it will suffice to have the chorists do this occasionally, with interruptions, and when the lay-brothers have had special work to perform.

Finally, let us carefully avoid customs that may afterwards give rise to disputes. Read my letter to Father Apice; read it to the chorists of the house, and then send it as soon as possible to Father Apice.[17041] Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 232

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT ILICETO

Punishment that he should inflict upon the seditious lay-brothers.—The study to which he should devote himself,

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 13, 1756.

I have just read of the fine doings of the Brothers. All those that have conspired to go away deserve to be expelled. I will however pardon them this time. But I cannot pardon the novice-brother; send him away at once. As however he is the ring-leader and hot-headed, I fear that he might do you some harm or might lead astray some other Brothers, if you dismiss him from Iliceto. Hence I should say that you send him to another place, for example to Lacedogna, or elsewhere, with a letter addressed to some friend, telling him that as the bearer is no longer a member of the Congregation he should do me the favor of dismissing him. Enough; do as you think best, bit expel him immediately, and endeavor as I have said to prevent a scene.

Then take the habit from Brother Giacomo until further orders; he should eat his meals outside of the refectory, and receive Communion only on Sundays.

Since they have mentioned the dispute among the Carmelite and Franciscan lay-brothers, take care that no new custom be introduced in regard to serving at table and washing the dishes. For the beginning at least see that as heretofore the lay-brothers are made to wash the dishes and to serve at table, and only from time to time but with interruptions appoint the novices to do this work.

It does not matter that on this account it will be necessary to free the Brothers of other work. But enough on this subject. Let us keep up our customs, let no other customs be any longer mentioned, and let the Brothers avoid saying: That is none of our business.

Call all the lay-brothers to you, one at a time, and tell them that I am angry with them, etc., and let them read the enclosed letter that I have written to them. Call Brother Cesare and tell him privately from me that he should be watchful to see who murmurs and complains, and report the matter to you; you should then communicate the name of the culprit to me. Tell him that he should at once reprimand the one that says a word.

I also hear at the same time of your miseries. I do not know how you can subsist without grain, without oil, without linen, and without money. I send you ten ducats (and I give fifteen carlini to the Brother for his journey): but will this be sufficient? I am thinking of imposing a little tax on all the houses. But with all this shall we succeed in remedying the evil?

Father Ferrara writes me that he could send away Frater Vitelli on the ground that there are doubts about his patrimony. If it is certain that he has none, he cannot of course be received. He has however been already received; it is true, he is deficient in talent, but he behaves well. When Father Villani comes consult him and write to me.

In regard to Father Villani, I have indeed made him Visitor; but you need not send for him during this carnival, and make him leave the many missions that he has to give.[17042] It is sufficient if he comes during Lent. Write to him at once to remain where he is. It would have been better, before writing to him to come, you had written to me.

I have written to Ciorani that they should send you a copy of the "Glories of Mary."

I allow you to have duplicate books of devotion for the novitiate; but I cannot allow you to read Cassiano and Alessandro. How head-strong you are! I should rather have you read half an hour every day my Moral Theology so that you may be able to hear confessions. Are you never to hear confessions? It is not for want of intelligence. You must acknowledge that in this matter there is some tepidity, or may be laziness, on your part. Study at least the principal treatises, as de Præceptis Decalogi, de Peccatis, de Pœnitentia, de Matrimonio, de Censuris, de Charitate, de Conscientia and de Legibus. I mention those treatises that you have not yet read. I do not wish to impose this upon you under obedience, but try to study them when you can.

I bless all and especially the novices. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 233

TO THE LAY-BROTHERS OF THE HOUSE AT ILICETO

He complains of their conduct and threatens them with punishment.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, 13, [January, 1756].

Dear Brothers: God knows what great pain it caused me to hear of the faults committed by you in so short a time, faults especially of pride; it should be your duty to acquire the virtue of humility which is the virtue proper to lay-brothers.

Well (speaking in general), I pardon you all; but I beg you not to force me to chastise you again for such chastisement may and will draw after it eternal punishment: if you oblige me to expel you from the Congregation, I do not know what will become of you; I should tremble for your eternal salvation.

Do not think to intimidate me by saying that you wish to leave. Every day I am forced to refuse admission to men who wish to enter the Congregation; however even if no new-comers were to arrive, Brothers might be obtained from other houses, where they happen to be numerous.

Hence I beg you not to talk any more about leaving, for that alone would induce me to dismiss you from the Congregation.

Now that the winter is here, you will make the common exercises of the day in the evening, for then you have time, as you have not to study like the chorists. Moreover, as the days are short, the siesta is not necessary; the night's sleep is sufficient for you. That is the practice in the other houses.

I ask you, if you were at home living with your relatives would you rest and make your exercises during the day, or would you work? We should always be charitable to those who are not in so good health as we, for they need our charity. You are always to take the last place, a fter the Fathers, students, and novices. What a shame, to see Brothers claiming precedence!

The Carmelites and the Franciscans are members of Orders, making solemn vows; you on the other hand, belong to a Congregation in which the Rector Major can dismiss subjects whenever he sees fit to do so.

The duties of the chorists are to preach, to hear confessions, and to study. The office of the lay-brother is to serve and to do whatever he is commanded. Understand well, that serving at table and washing dishes are the duties of the lay-brothers; sometimes and only sometimes the chorists may perform these duties, but only to make them practise humility.

Well now; do not cause me any more displeasure; I love you as brothers, but I wish you to become holy. Of what use is it to enter the Congregation, if you do not wish to become saints? Now the virtues that are necessary for your sanctification are, humility, obedience, and patience; without suffering there can be no true sanctity.

I bless all the Brothers who have a good intention, and I curse those who have a bad intention; and remember that my curse will be accompanied by that of Jesus Christ.

Live Jesus, Joseph, Mary, and Teresa!

Letter 234

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

He again refers to the treatment to be given to the lay-brothers to prevent subsequent disorders.

Live Jesus, Joseph, Mary, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 16, [1756],

I believe that I have written to you in regard to the Brothers, that they should make the common acts in the evening in winter during which the days are short, and that they must do without the hour of repose as it is permitted only to the chorists.

Now in reference to the hour of repose my wish is that you inform the Brothers that half an hour, if not a whole hour, of rest will be granted to those that need it. In this matter you must be governed by prudence. At all events the practice of the Brothers taking an hour's rest in winter must be stopped, since it is permitted only to those that study.

I recommend to you, besides, that you take care that the Brothers nearly always wait at table and wash the dishes. It will suffice that the students do this work once or twice a month. Exhort these Brothers not to murmur, since those that did so at Ciorani are now suffering punishment, and will have to suffer it for some time to come.

In future, I shall probably not admit the Brothers to profession till after a probation of ten years. Tell, therefore, the new Brother of Grazioli[17043] that I will receive him, but only on condition, now imposed on all others, that he must serve as a secular for several years—at least during four years—before it will be permitted him to enter the novitiate. Your Rev erence must not, therefore, during your Rectorate, apply to me for permission to give him the habit.

As for those that have already received the habit and that are to be professed, you must inform me of the least faults that they commit, as I may perhaps defer their profession. These good Brothers, after they have made their profession, are apt to become proud. Live Jesus, Joseph, Mary, and Teresa!

Letter 235

TO FATHER GIROLAMO FERRARA,[17044] MINISTER OF THE HOUSE AT ILICETO

He declares his intentions relative to the religious profession of the lay-brothers.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

PAGANS, January 18, 1756.

Brother N. wishes to enter the novitiate according to what he writes to me. Tell him that he may enter for some time, say two or three months, according as you think proper.

Tell, moreover, the novice-brothers, who have or who have not yet received the habit (and tell each one in particular, each time, so as to prevent the forming of plans), that I have no intention to admit to profession the lay-brothers except after a very long trial of their virtue. For this purpose take care to gather information, mark down on paper and send it to me, what are the particular defects of the lay-brothers that are in your house, so that I may use your report as a legitimate pretext when they asked me to admit them to profession. It has been remarked that these good Brothers after their profession begin to relax in their fervor and that they become very imperfect. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

As for Brother N., it is well that he enters the novitiate; but in order to receive the habit, he will have to wait a long time. What I have said in regard to others, I also say in regard to him; for if I am indulgent towards him, I shall be obliged to be so towards others.

I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 236

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

Expression of disapprobation on the subject of the mission given at Potenza.—Conditions essentially required that missions, and above all important missions, may be accepted.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph!

NOCERA, 19, [January, 1756].

First remark. It appears that a mission is to be given at Potenza. I had already refused this mission, and I therefore do not understand why you accepted it.

I have said to myself, and I say so again: This mission at Potenza, in view of the number of subjects whom you will employ and the inconveniences that they will suffer, will be for you an occasion of a conspicuous failure. You yourself, my dear Father, are suffering from a severe cold in the chest; on the other hand, Potenza is a place where the cold is extreme. I really cannot understand how you can go there.

I beg you, therefore, that as soon as you can travel and you have had a favorable journey, return to Mater Domini (Caposele) and do what the physician tells you. If he orders you to go to bed, remain in bed till your cold has disappeared; for a cold so obstinate might kill you, or at least disable you for the future. For the sake of one mission you might render yourself unfit for all the missions that you might give afterwards.

As for this mission at Potenza, I should have wished you had first spoken to me; I should have examined whether it would prove successful. For this work you would need fourteen or fifteen of the best subjects; as the city is a difficult place to preach in. But the date has already been fixed; what is to be done?—I do not forbid you to give the mission, but I say that it might easily be dropped; you are in fact too few, and several among you are still young. If then it were possible to put it off till the next year, it would be preferable. For the rest, I refer the matter to Father Fiocchi; but tell him from me that when there is question of so large and so important missions, I wish to be informed in advance.

Since you tell me not to send either of the two Brothers, I will not send him. But you must know that the Brother for whom you asked us is not fit to transact business outside of the convent.

Father Fiocchi (I see from his letter) wishes to have Father Cimino. At present I will write that he should be sent if this can be done; but you may be sure that he will not come. In fact, missions that have been engaged and promised are to be given at Ariano, and without Cimino it will be impossible to give them. You see what happens when we thus accept at random missions, and difficult missions.

Read to Father Fiocchi all that I have just written, that is, all that regards this mission at Potenza which has given me so much annoyance. All could have been arranged if you had sent me word. Now you are to go back to the convent; Father Cimino will surely not come: indeed that will be a fine mission that is going to be given!

As for Father Apice, if he also suffers from his chest, I do not wish, I do not wish, I do not wish him to preach the evening sermon. When we have lost a subject, all the inhabitants of Potenza would not be able to restore him to us.

This then would be my opinion: It being now settled that you cannot take part in this mission, that Father Apice is also suffering, and that Cimino cannot come, Father Fiocchi would have a good reason to withdraw his word in regard to Potenza. He should simply write: Several Fathers have fallen ill, and the others are engaged.

Steps have been taken to give the mission at Potenza, but as for the missions to be given at Conza, asked for by the Archbishop [Mgr. Nicolai], have they been given or not?—I do not wish the missions at Conza to be omitted in order to give other missions. Why do you wish to make the archbishop indisposed towards us?

Don Benedetto Grazioli writes to me that he is most anxious to have the consolation, that at the baptism of a child expected by him from day to day, Father Margotta should fulfil the duties of parish priest and Father Fiocchi those of sponsor. I am sending a messenger to Naples to have Father Margotta come, since I cannot refuse this consolation to Don Benedetto, and I dispense from the Rule in this case. Tell then Father Fiocchi to put off the day on which he is to go to Atella; or rather, I am going to write to Don Benedetto that at the desired moment he should send for Father Fiocchi. The latter, when he arrives at Atella should ask Don Benedetto (as I have already written to him) to send at once to Benevento the whole amount that he wishes to give; for if he sends it little by little, it will be used in paying the expenses of the building, and the house would derive no income that would assure its future.

Grazioli writes to me that he has sent or will send (I do not well understand him) five hundred ducats for Benevento. If they have reached you, or as soon as they reach you, send them to me in order that I may determine the use to which they should be applied.

I hear at this moment the following piece of news: The mission has begun at Potenza, and notwithstanding your cold in the chest you have begun to preach the evening sermons. Gloria Patri!—Here is once for all the general rule: I forbid every one suffering from a cold in the chest or an obstinate cold, I forbid him, I say, to preach the evening sermons, especially in places where people are hard to please; and it matters little whether we give up a mission already begun. You must then examine what is to be done in the present case. Here you see what it is to burn one's vessels without thinking of the future. This mission at Potenza has been of singular torment to me.

In regard to the mission at Capaccio, I hope to provide for it with the subjects of this house; but as to Castellucia, it is incumbent on you to think of it.

To return to the mission at Potenza, I see that my letter will embarrass you. I do not however wish to cause you trouble; this is the reason why I refer the matter to the decision of Father Fiocchi, who will judge what is best to be done. Yet as for risking the health of the subjects, especially that of Father Apice and yours in making you preach in spite of all, I beg Father Fiocchi to be prudent so that I may not grow angry as I fear I shall be obliged to. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph!

BROTHER ALFONSO,

Letter 237

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, AT ILICETO

Mistake to be remedied in the case of a lay-brother.—Punishment inflicted on the guilty ones at Ciorani.

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

NOCERA, January 20, 1756.

I wrote that you should dismiss the novice-brother; but you may have noticed that I was mistaken when I believed that he (as appears I indicated in my letter) had committed some impertinence by employing force to remain in his room. But now I hear that the one who committed this fault was Brother Andrea, who is already professed; him I cannot send away merely on this account, but he deserves a severe penance.

Besides, Brother Bartolomeo, that is, the novice, as I see from the letter of Father Ferrara, did not commit such a fault as to deserve to be dismissed. So I hope that you have understood the mistake and have not yet sent him away.

I have spoken kindly to Brother Giacomo and he confessed his guilt. Hence as regards the penance that he as well as Brother Andrea and all the rest have deserved, I leave all to your Reverence and to Father Ferrara.

I do not write with my own hand, because I have been ill these past four days; I therefore do not write specially to Father Ferrara. It will be sufficient to let him read this letter.

As for Frater [D. Fabrizio] Cimino, his illness is not serious, and I will have him take here some little remedy.

At Ciorani justice[17045] has been done. I have dismissed Brother Crescenzo; he had murmured and then refused to do the penance. Brother Carlo and Brother Giuseppe Trombetta of Naples are confined to their rooms [carcerati].

All the others that have murmured have been put under penance. Brother Domenico is confined to his room here.

I bless all. Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

TO THE SAME.[17046]

He asks him to assist a Brother tempted against his vocation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 21, 1756.

Brother N. writes to me that he is disquieted and on the point of losing his vocation; that such a trouble should also come upon us! I have answered him firmly and kindly.

Try if possible to calm him by kind treatment. Allow him more sleep, if he wishes it. O my God! these Brothers!

Brother N. has asked me to admit him to the novitiate; see whether you can allow him to make a part of it. However, I have told him that no one should speak to me about receiving the habit till the lapse of several years; and as for the vows many years will have to pass by.

Letter 239

TO THE SAME

He refuses to dismiss a subject.

[End of January, 1756.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

As for Brother [Bartolomeo] I have no reason to send him away. I first wrote that he should be sent away, but through a mistake I thought that he had done what Brother Andrea has done. I therefore wrote that he should be kept; now how could I send him away?

Let us see how he behaves himself; and if he behaves badly, he may afterwards be dismissed, and then he may feel sorry, but I shall not. I shall feel sorry for my own sins, but not for this act of justice.

You wrote me about the priest of N. that he is suffering from lunacy. Now you write me that this fact is doubtful. You should therefore see (now is the time) whether he is really suffering from such a disease.

I am glad to hear that those that have received the habit[17047] are doing well.

I bless all, and especially the novices. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 240

TO FATHER GIROLAMO FERRARA, AT ILICETO

Conditions required for dismissing a subject.

[End of January, 1756.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I have written to Father Rector on account of Brother Andrea and Brother Bartolomeo.

For pity's sake, let Father Rector not trouble me so much about these Brothers! When I have written and decided something, of what use is it to torment me again about it?

I have already written to him that Brother Bartolomeo should stay; why urge me again to send him away?

After admission grave reasons are required to dismiss a subject; and after profession, we must have very grave reasons joined with incorrigibility; without this it is a mortal sin to dismiss him.

I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 241

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE, AT THE MISSION GIVEN AT POTENZA

He forbids any postulant to be sent him without his previous permission.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 30, 1756.

I received your two letters, and I am greatly surprised to see that you have not received my letter which I recommended to our people at Ciorani to send at once by a messenger. However, you will soon receive it.

The letter contained a complaint about the mission that was begun by you when I had refused to give it at least at the present time, and when your Reverence and Father Apice were suffering from a cold. I hope to God that in future this may not again happen. You will read the rest in my letter.

I hear now that the mission has been successful. How wonderful! No mission had for a long time been given at Potenza. But it would have succeeded far differently had it been given at the proper time and with a sufficient number of Fathers.[17048]

Gloria Patri! Within a short time you have sent us four young men without having first informed us that they would come. From this day forward (and tell this to all most especially) send me no one without having first informed me, and before I have sent a favorable answer.

The two young men have been admitted; but the tall one I had already dismissed because he is only very mediocre, and we are not now in a condition to receive those that are mediocre; there are enough of us, and there is no bread. But then there was so much weeping, and I felt so much compassion for him now that he had made such a journey that the Consultors themselves proposed him to me to admit him.

But we no longer wish to be exposed to receive any more subjects through compassion. And so remember, and I repeat, tell this to all, to send me no one, no one, no one, if I have not told you that he may come. But all this it seems to me your Reverence already knew.

I bless all. Father Cimino[17049] should come here immediately after the mission at Rocca is finished, because a great deal is to be done; and I would also wish that Father de Meo should come.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

BROTHER ALFONSO.

Letter 242

TO FATHER FRANCESCO PENTIMALLI.[17050]

He exhorts him to perfect obedience.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA February 11. [1756?]

My dear Francesco: I have learned with pleasure that you have recovered from your illness; but I was somewhat pained to hear that you have given to the Superior and to your brethren an answer that was rather sharp.

Many things may appear to us preposterous, which are nevertheless right for us, when they have been dictated by obedience. If every subject wished to do what seemed best to him, there would be at end to obedience.

I beg you then to be patient when certain things seem to you to be what they should not. When you have given your opinion, then become quiet; it will be sufficient that you reserve to yourself the privilege of writing to me or of orally reporting to me what seems to you to be suitable.

I beg you for the rest of the missions to stand by whatever the Superior ordains; afterwards, when you return, you may tell me all.

I bless you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, AT ILICETO

He sends him different kinds of help.

[February, 1756.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Take care of Frater N. who is suffering from catarrh; see that he does not take cold.

I again send two pounds of chocolate for those that have a cough or have a cold.

I also send ten ducats to help you a little in your distress.

I bless you all, especially the novices. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 244

TO THE SAME

Measures to be taken in regard to various subjects.

[February, 1756.]

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

First of all in regard to the Masses of [Father Pasquale] Basile, there is some commotion at our house in Ciorani;[17051] I approve of the application of Masses such as you have made for this house. But in regard to the Masses that you have applied to yourself you must by all means have them supplied; because we must keep up the established custom, namely, that the application of the Masses does not change, whatever may be the temporary changes of residence among the subjects.

As for the priest Saltarelli, try to have him go away as soon as possible. Think of some way and of some pretext. However, by all means see that he is sent away at once. And tell him that it is not necessary for him to come here to importune me, because this would be a loss of time, since I have good reasons for believing that the Congregation is not made for him.

As for the physician, what is to be done? There are no such deficiencies, etc. I have written to him. Read the letter that I am sending to him, and then give it to him.

As to the young man of Resina, since he is suffering from pains in the limbs, there is no reason why he should stay in the Congregation. Tell him that all our houses are very cold, and he would thereby soon lose his health. Induce him to go away. I feel sorry for him, for he is a good young man; but there is no remedy; God does not wish him to be in the Institute.

I say the same thing in regard to the two other young men from Ischia and Bosco. They are good, but not good for us.

Say, however, to these two that I do not dismiss them altogether; I wish only that they should go home and re-establish their health; for as soon as they have become well, I will receive them; and so let them go away with this certain hope. Send them away, however, in their secular dress.

As for Frater [D. Francesco Antonio] de Paola I have ordered that he should be sent.

I bless you all. Live Jesus and Mary!

In regard to the two Brothers, Saverio and Domenico, if they do not do what they should, they will be dismissed without fail. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 245

TO THE SAME

Project of a foundation at Matera.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES, March 6, 1756.

As soon as Father Villani arrives tell him it is impossible for me to send Father Amarante, as we are overburdened with work, which even with Father Amarante's assistance we can hardly accomplish; the mission is very large. Nor is it possible to send any students, for I do not wish them to be taken away from the study of Moral Theology; otherwise they will not be able to go out on future missions.

The house at Benevento had too many missions this year.

Touching the matter of Matera,[17052] I do not desire to say anything either to favor the undertaking or to hinder it, because it will be difficult for us to find later on a foundation as advantageous as that, and even to have another foundation in the kingdom under like circumstances. This reasoning appears to me to be just. However, God will help us, and I shall not accept it until I see everything well arranged. But the affair will hardly be allowed at Rome, since there is danger of giving offence to a great religious body.

All that I have said has also been admitted by the Cardinal [Sersale], who has also promised not to throw any impediment in the way.

Tell also Father Villani that I recommend to him among others the young man from Torrecuso.[17053]

Should D. Andrea [Villani] not come in time to receive this news, you will please write it to him, and thus spare my head, which God knows how it fares when I am eating nothing. There is nothing else. May you keep well! Live Jesus and Mary!

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

(Postcript written by the secretary): Father Rector Major says that the person sent by Don Benedetto Grazioli may stay as long as he wishes.

The young man from Panni is always writing to me; see whether you can grant his request.

TO SISTER MARIA NICOLETTA LEONI (DI CALVANICO), IN THE MONASTERY OF FISCIANO

He earnestly recommends to her to resign herself to the will of God.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES, March 9, [1756].

Your letter has reached me here at Naples. I shall say the Mass for you to-morrow; but you may be sure the Madonna will not obtain for you the grace that you desire, because your prayer has mistaken its object.

You should ask for patience and not for health; and even this last, it seems to me, you ask with but little resignation. If in asking for patience, or at least for health, you were resigned to God's will, you would more easily obtain both.

Do what I tell you: Ask in future that you may be able to bear patiently not only sickness but the contempt that you receive from your Sisters. To suffer as Jesus Christ has suffered, to suffer and to be despised to suffer even without exciting the compassion of any one, can anything be more meritorious for gaining Paradise?

Think of it: with the numerous infirmities which you suffer, your life will be but little prolonged. Try then to provide for merits during the short time that still remains to you.

Drive far from you the horrible temptation of leaving the monastery. Ah! do you wish to run the risk of losing your soul?

Now that you have read this letter kneel down, or even from your bed, make to God an entire offering of yourself, and beg him to treat you as he pleases. Unite also your pains and your annoyances to those that Jesus Christ had to suffer.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

Letter 247

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

Solicitude of the saint for the house at Iliceto and for the health of the students.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES, March 20, [1756].

The first thing that I have to ask you, my dear Gasparo, is to take up again the work on Scripture. I am not exactly pleased with it myself.[17054] Yet it is after all Scripture; at least in Communities it may be of great benefit.

Secondly; at Iliceto the novices are in want of the necessaries of life, and are suffering very great misery. I have, therefore, been thinking of removing them from that place. For the present I have ordered to be sent to them ten ducats from Ciorani and five from Pagani; I now ask you to send when you can ten more ducats.

As for Frater Michele [de Michele], I do not wish that he should study. It will do no good if he has a relapse, and we shall lose all that we have gained. It will be sufficient if he sometimes goes to class and listens a little to what is said. Let him walk out and take exercise. After Easter send him to the missions that are to be given with Father Fiocchi, at first at S. Angelo, etc.

Tell Frater Castaldo that I participate in the consolations that he enjoys; let him pray to God for me. I do not send a special answer as I am about ascending the pulpit to preach.

I have promised you Father Fiocchi for a change; but being here I do not know what arrangements have been made by the Fathers of Nocera and Ciorani to whom I have entrusted the giving of all the spiritual exercises.

Here much good is done by the Congregation. I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Counsels regarding observance and resignation.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

PAGANI, April 22, 1756.

In answering your letter I am using the hand of another o write to you, for it is only a little while ago that I recovered from serious illness.[17055] Here is my answer in a few words.

In the state in which you are you have nothing else to do than to observe the Rule and to show zeal for its observance. Then you should without ceasing offer yourself to God and be resigned to his will in whatever state he may wish to put you.

I feel extremely grateful to you for remembering me in your prayers; for my part I am doing the same for you. Continue, I beg you, to do so during the few days of life that still remain to you.

I shall do what I can to intercede for you [with the Bishop of Melfi] to have Communion restored to you; but I must wait for a favorable opportunity. In the meantime be resigned in everything; this is what Jesus Christ wishes.

Salute all the Sisters for me, but especially the Mother Prioress; let her have the charity to recite during nine consecutive days the Salve Regina on account of two grave matters that concern the Congregation. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

Confirmation of an order already given.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 250

TO THE SAME

Request that he should work at the Constitutions.—Various measures.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, May 11, [1756].

Before all things, I beg you to set your hand to the Constitutions at once and as often as you can; for they should be read in the houses where they are little known, else it might be said that they are not obligatory because they are not published. Finish them as soon as you can, with the assistance of Father Ferrara, just as the Chapter has ordained. Be very careful to preserve the original copies, so that one may consult them whenever a difficulty arises.

In respect to allowing you to have the Blessed Sacrament in the oratory of the novitiate, I have always felt some repugnance. It is true, after your arrival from Naples I appeared to consent to having it kept there; but at present I am confronted by another difficulty. Meditation is made in the choir, the visit is made in the choir, what need is there still of the Blessed Sacrament in the novitiate? It affords you consolation, you will say; but have patience, deprive yourself of this consolation. If you have not placed the Blessed Sacrament there, you had better not do so; and if it be there, you must take it away.

All is going on well: Nigro and de Sanctis go to Caposele [to begin philosophy]; de Paola remains at Iliceto. Passari and de Gattis can also remain there to perfect themselves; they can begin their rhetoric and logic in a short time.

For the study of rhetoric take Cuione.

You are right: there was no cause for sending these students to Caposele.

I have asked more than once for that book on the Madonna [“ The Glories of Mary”] and the Brother has received nothing. Send it to me as soon as you find it convenient.

For the humanities, books will be sent from here, and I will write to Ciorani; a copy of Calepino of Torino will be kept here, because we need it.

I am answering Perez. Read the letter I have written to him. Instead of having him make fifteen days retreat before receiving the habit, it will be sufficient if he makes ten.

A safe journey to Vitelli and Pica![17057]

I bless the profession of Paravento and Leggio;[17058] tell them from me to practise humility; watch them carefully.

I bless the novices and all the others. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Father Margotta writes me that you wish to pay a part of the expenses of the printing of the “Glories of Mary,” and while the book is being printed you will have nothing to eat! Live Jesus and Mary!

What I now add, you must keep secret and allow no one to know except Father Ferrara. Father N. will come to you in June for the purpose of recollecting himself as he says; but would to God he would truly recollect himself and would not peruse books without caring about the observance!

Now you must know that I have expressly forbidden him to hear the confessions of women or to speak with them. Hence do not allow him to be called for this purpose; and if he be called, forbid him to hear the confessions of women even if they be dying. I have been obliged to come to such a decision in regard to him on account of his extravagant notions. I have written you a longer letter on the subject and have sent it by way of Bovino; try to procure it, and destroy it after having read it. Say nothing of all this to N. except in a case of necessity, and unless you see him hearing confessions of women. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

Various matters.—The sending of a little work composed by the saint.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, May 16, [1756].

I am glad to hear the news about the mission at S. Angelo. I have already heard about it through [D. Benedetto] Grazioli. I will say Mass for the Abbess of S. Maria di Troia, and will write to Father Villani.

As for Father N., let him go to Iliceto where he wishes to go to recollect himself, because he has been exposed to a great deal of dissipation.

I have written to you another letter in which I say to you that I forbid N. under the formal precept of obedience to hear the confessions of any more women; hence do not allow him to be called to hear women's confessions when he comes to your house to give the exercises; and even if you see him hear the confessions of women you must forbid him to do so. Let him then go to Iliceto. When afterwards these young men have finished their course, I will send you someone else to replace him. This treatment of Father N. has been found to be necessary because of his extravagances. Keep this, however, as a secret.

Frater Contaldo should be sent as soon as possible to Iliceto for a change of air.

If Father N. comes to your house, Father Pentimalli will not come. Have patience then, and do the best you can.

If I mistake not Father Pentimalli has to go to Lauro. Father Apice has been promised to Iliceto. Have an understanding with Iliceto, but if not, how will they be able to get out of their difficulties? Father Apice must necessarily go to this house.

I bless you all. I can scarcely write on account of my head. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Here is a letter which Father Pentimalli's brother writes to me; try to satisfy him. Live Jesus and Mary!

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] I send you some copies of my little work[17059] written against unbelievers. Two are bound in parchment; give one to the archpriest of Caposele, the other to the Vicar with my compliments. The other two are for your house. Live Jesus and Mary!

If it is not really necessary I beg you not to take Brother Mattia[17060] from his clocks; for now I hear that he has been sent to accompany the Fathers on a mission.

Letter 252

TO SISTER MARIA NICOLETTA LEONI (DI CALVANICO), IN THE MONASTERY OF FISCIANO

He reproves her for her continual impatience, and exhorts her to be a true nun who is entirely resigned to God's will.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, May 19, [1756].

I have received your letter with the stipend for a Mass, and I will comply with your intentions. As for paying you a visit, I beg you, should you write again, not to mention such a thing, for it would give me useless annoyance. I hardly ever leave the house; I do not even accept the invitations that I receive from the convents of Nocera, which are quite near. How could I go to Fisciano?

Moreover, if I went to see you I would say nothing more than what I have repeated to you more than once, and I should gain nothing with the religious of your convent, though you may think otherwise.

As for confessors, there will be no lack of them. But one thing is more necessary to you than confessors: it is patience, or rather the love of Jesus Christ.

The saints have loved Jesus Christ and have had other sufferings than you have; they have had to bear other sorrows, other diseases, other kinds of contempt and of abandonment than you have to bear. Yet they believed that they w ere suffering nothing when they reflected that a God died for us in an ocean of contempt and of sorrow.

Hence all the trouble that you have is caused by yourself when you complain about everything and show so little patience.

In short, what will you find at the hour of death, which in view of your maladies is not far off? You will find only acts of impatience and sins; only venial sins, I hope, but these may lead you farther if your impatience goes on increasing.

Well, now! take counsel of your crucifix, look upon it often, and offer to our Lord what you suffer. Your evils would be changed into pearls of Paradise, but they are changed through your fault into so many thorns, and into sins which you will have to expiate in the flames of purgatory.

When then will you write to me that for once you will with God's help bear patiently all your trials? When you feel yourself weighed down by affliction, cast immediately a glance at the crucifix, have recourse to our Lady of Sorrows, and always ask this good Mother for this one grace, that she should obtain for you resignation to the will of God.

I entreat you, do not again write to me the words that you have used, together with the interminable lamentations: I cannot bear this any longer. Such treatment is too much to bear, and the like. If I mistake not, you suffer less from your corporal pains than from the contempt that is heaped upon you; your want of humility is, therefore, it seems to me, more than anything else the source of your trials. Here is my little work, the Visits, a new edition; I send it to you that you may read the little treatise on the will of God which is added to it (see page 209). Read it little by little, and when you have finished it, begin again.

Oh, if you would embrace with all your heart the will of God! If you were persuaded that in accepting your pains with an entire resignation, you would rejoice the heart of God, and with what joy, with what love would you endure them! Hence, when you feel yourself more than usually weighed down, I beg you to re-read this letter.

May God grant you his light and his love! He that loves God does not suffer; he rejoices even in suffering.

Perhaps you will tell me: But I am not a saint. I answer: You are not a saint and you do not wish to be a saint. Do you wish to become a saint amidst tenderness and consolations? And if you do not wish to become a saint, why did you leave the world? Did you perhaps enter the convent to be served and honored, and not to suffer? What would you say to one of your Sisters who would complain to you? What you would say to her, say to yourself; offer, offer all to Jesus Christ, and ask him without intermission, not that your trials may cease, but that you may have his love and may be patient. This is the way to transform all your pains into pearls of Paradise.

In order to write you this letter I had to snatch a moment from my numerous occupations.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

PAGANI, May 25, 1756.

I have received information about the affair from Father Rizzi.[17061]

If things remain in the same state, and Monsignor is not pacified, so that we may have to fear that he will put the Father into prison, send him to Caposele without losing a moment.

Tell, however, this Father that he did not do well to write that letter. He wrote it through zeal; but he does not know that it is forbidden to us outside of the confessional to meddle with affairs that may cause embarrassment to others. For the love of God let him in future give up such kind of zeal. We must think of the general good of the Congregation rather than of the good of others.

As for the question about the Blessed Sacrament in the oratory of the novitiate, I wish to consider the matter more fully with my Consultors, and when Father Fiocchi returns, I shall send him thither immediately to give you the answer to this as well as to some other questions.

Tell Frater N. that the three young men have presented themselves. He knows that Andrea will not suit us, for he does not understand enough Latin, and at Naples I told him that he would not be received.

As for the other youth, I mean N., there is a difficulty, for it is not known where he is to be ordained.

Finally, another young man came; but he had no patrimony. I shall therefore send the two candidates who have received the votes of the Consultors.

When Father Fiocchi comes, he will give you the answers to other questions. Please give the enclosed letter to Frater Perez.

Send immediately a copy of my book [Dissertation on the Errors of Modern Unbelievers] to Canon Vitale at Bisaccia. Tell Father Rizzi to say three Hail Marys as a penance.

[Father Francesco] Pentimalli must come without fail to Ciorani, even though they desire to keep him at Caposele. Give yourself therefore no trouble about him. I have written to Caposele to send you at least Father [Andrea] Strina who preaches very well, and Father [Stefano] Liguori: and so you will be able to do your work.

I am now engaged in writing to Mgr. di Bovino, and I hope to appease him. Father Rizzi should have mentioned those points to the bishop when he heard the latter's confession; he should not have written him a letter.

If Father Fiocchi arrives here in time, I will send him immediately. Say no more about this. As soon as I can have him I shall send him to you; I have sent to Ciorani for him and have called him away from the exercises that he is giving, at Ciorani in order to please you.

I repeat: If matters are now settled, it is not necessary to send Father Rizzi to Caposele; if Monsignor should come to the house, it would be well for Father Rizzi to go to him privately, to throw himself at his feet and beg pardon for his indiscretion.

Let Frater [Michele] Ferrazzano become a little stronger and healthier before speaking of making his profession. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Father Margotta tells me that you wish to contribute towards paying the expenses of the Madonna ["Glories of Mary"]; but where is the money? Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 254

TO SISTER MARIA DI GESÙ, CARMELITE AT RIPACANDIDA

Explanations regarding spiritual direction.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

PAGANI, June, 1756.

I have read your very long letter, and I answer it in a few words.

I expect within a few days Father Fiocchi, who is to go to Naples; I must first hear him and examine afterwards what I can do to oblige you.

While waiting, place yourself entirely at the disposition of God for his greater glory; now it is for the greater glory of God to do his most holy will.

Present my respects to the Mother Prioress, to Sister Maria Giuseppe, to Sister Maria Celeste, and to all the rest. Let all recommend me to Jesus Christ; for I repeat, I wish to do what I can to be useful to you, but I must first hear what Father Fiocchi has to say.

I am fully persuaded that he did not withdraw on account of some disobedience on your part or on the part of the other religious, but for some other important reason. Who knows what the Bishop [of Melfi] has told him! Perhaps out of regard for the Carmelites? I do not know what to say in this matter.

However, if Father Fiocchi returns to you, you must be satisfied with the little that he can do; for you know that our Rule expressly forbids us the direction of religious, either in general or in particular. Be satisfied with the counsel that is given to you every time that an occasion presents itself.

In the meantime follow the advice that Father Fiocchi has given you; and if anything new occurs, do nothing exteriorly without the order of the Superior. As for interior things, to remove every doubt, it will be sufficient to say: My God, I wish only Thee and Thy good pleasure; say nothing more.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 255

TO A FATHER OF THE HOUSE AT CIORANI

He sends pecuniary aid to the poor house of Iliceto.

[June 3, 1756.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

My dear L.: Have patience; it is necessary that you should go to Iliceto where the spiritual exercises are to be given to the candidates for ordination as there is no one to help to give them.

I send you secretly thirty ducats: carry them to the Superiors of Iliceto for the purchase of food, because I hear that they are in embarrassed circumstances.

You must not say anything to others about these thirty ducats; but you must tell them at Iliceto to celebrate seventy-two Masses to the intention of those that have given the money. Take out of this sum of thirty ducats what will pay the expenses of your journey. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I bless all the novices. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 256

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, AT ILICETO

How he was to act in regard to an imprudent subject.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

June 3, [1756].

Father N. through his extravagances has thrown me into the greatest confusion.

Forbid him to say Mass till the 15th of this month; after that let him again say Mass. But, for pity's sake, do not employ him too much in preaching, nor let him go out too often. Make him remain at home to recollect himself and to regain a little fervor; for it was for this reason that I sent him to you.

Tell him that I command under formal obedience that he shall no longer hear women's confessions, nor the confessions of young persons under seventeen years of age. He may hear the confessions of men and of boys who have completed their seventeenth year; for I have heard that by his extravagant questions he has taught young persons certain things of which they were ignorant, and now they complain of this. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 257

TO THE SAME

He prescribes to the novices moderation in prayer, and expresses his sorrow on account of their poverty.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, June 24, 1756.

I have received from the novices a package of letters expressive of their thanks for having allowed them the Blessed Sacrament.[17062] I hear, however, that they go to excess, and that they have already begun to make themselves sick, as, for instance, N. N., etc.

I beg you to moderate their prayers in the chapel of the Blessed Sacrament.

It is sufficient if they make the ordinary visit by adding to it, in the evening and during the day, one or two other visits that must not last longer than half of a quarter of an hour.

This is understood of days outside of the retreat days.

I do not answer the letters of the novices; for it would take me two months to answer them.

I hear that at your house you have no soup at your meals. Why do you not send to Ascoli since you have four animals for riding? It would be well to send to the environs for a little wheat, etc., but the misfortune is to know whom to send.

On the subject of cheese, all are opposed to Father N.; and in other houses they continue to give it. But as to your house, what can we do? Should we wish to witness some scene? It is better for you to dissimulate, and to he guided by prudence.

I see that Father N. has told me the truth; for there is truly no way of living in that place. Now I send you a little help; but afterwards what can be done? It is a heart-rending spectacle thus to see the sufferings of so many young persons that have just left the world!

As for Brother N. although he has made his vows, keep him near you, so that his health may improve. He may do some light work that Father N. may assign to him.

Please to send from time to time to Ascoli or elsewhere to procure the wherewithal to make a little soup [minestra]. I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 258

TO THE SAME

He complains of the useless expenses incurred in the house at Iliceto.

[End of June, 1756.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I write by the hand of another, since I cannot do so myself on account of my head.

Father N. writes that in fifteen days you will not know what to do, since you are without grain, without wine, without cheese, without lard, and without money, for the reason that the thirty ducats sent you have been given to Maffei.

As for myself, I really do not know what to do. It will be impossible for me to force the other houses to send you money. Reflect on some means, think of what might be done, and speak about the matter to Father N. Examine whether it is necessary to abandon Iliceto in order not to see our young people die of starvation.

I beg you to be in all that you do as much as possible in accord with Father N.; for otherwise it will be impossible to navigate the little vessel.

I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 259

TO THE SAME

New complaints in regard to useless expenses.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

July 4, [1756].

Briefly, when I receive news from Iliceto it seems to me that each time I must swallow a cup of poison. The other day assistance was sent, and it disappeared immediately. Now something again has been sent, and I hear that it has also disappeared. Father N. wishes to construct a cistern, and you wish to be the architect; and for this purpose Father N. says beams are needed.

I therefore say again and again that it is my wish that no expenses should be incurred except for what is absolutely necessary, namely, for food and the necessary clothing; for you are in want of linen, of bread, etc.

How often have I not forbidden the incurring of extraordinary expenses! And now I learn that you wish to buy planks on credit. On credit, and without the means of paying for them!. . . . Have patience; think only of your support for the morrow, and of nothing else. I feel like dying with compassion for these young people. I repeat: At present think only of keeping alive. I shall assemble my Consultors to find out what means may be employed;[17063] for it is impossible for the little vessel to sail on in this way.

I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 260

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE, RECTOR AT CAPOSELE

He reprimands him.—Theological reasons in favor of ordination titulo patrimonii.

[Beginning of July, 1756?]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I can no longer dissemble; I will tell the truth. That you have sent Father Apice (and may God prevent you from sending another!) to San Gregorio has pierced my heart, the more so since you had at first resolved to write to me, and afterward: you did just the contrary. My God! to send a subject that costs us our blood, to die in a sickly place during the great heats, and at a time when there is an epidemic raging!

But, he is needed there.—True, but all the priests are not dead; there is always one remaining that can give absolution. For pity's sake, in future, and before doing any of these extraordinary things write to me.

It is necessary to obey the Archbishop [of Conza] but cum grano sails [with some allowance], in those things in which we are obliged to obey.

I am starting for Naples to-day, and God knows what sorrow and pain I feel on account of what you have written to me. May God be propitious to us!

See that Father Apice procures as quickly as possible the letters dimissory for those young men, and tell him to let the Vicar-General understand in a very gentle way that he has not acted very charitably towards us, by refusing to recognize the title of patrimony when all the other Vicars made no difficulty about it.

We are rendering service to the universal Church. According to a Papal Brief we are allowed to be ordained with a patrimony; added to this, we are engaged in serving the diocese of Conza. Still the most cogent reason is that we are working for the universal Church, and that the universal Church has already approved of our ordination under the title of a patrimony.

If there should happen to be a Father at present at S. Gregorio, recall him immediately. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

BROTHER ALFONSO.

(Postscript by another hand): As our Father was on the point of setting out, he requested me to add a few more reasons in favor of the admission of the patrimony.

In the first place, the permission of the Sovereign Pontiff, according to our Rule, allows us to ordain our subjects with a patrimony. Then we have the permission of his Majesty, who considers us very useful in the kingdom on account of the houses which we have; for under that title we shall not be a burden to him; we know that as a general thing he refuses this title in order not to multiply the number of useless priests.

Again, the Concordat does not take the privilege from us; for according to the terms of that document it is left to the judgment of the bishop to ordain with a patrimony when he sees it would be useful for the Church, without specifying the particular church of those who are to be ordained. Hence Mgr. Borgia says that it is his custom to ordain a number of priests in a place where there is no want of priests, in order to be able to transfer them afterwards to places where they are needed. Thus we see that he ordains according to the need or utility of the Church, not of the church of the one who is ordained, but of the one that ordains. This practice is also in accordance with the Council of Trent [Sess. xxi. cap. ii.] which gives to the bishop the faculty of ordaining clerics under the title of a patrimony, if he thinks it useful and necessary for his churches: remark here the wording suarum [his churches], that is, the churches of the bishop, and not illorum [their churches], that is, the churches of those that have been ordained. Supposing all this, who can deny that the Fathers of our Congregation are useful to the churches of the Archbishop of Conza, seeing that he uses us as he wishes?

Father Villani had intended to write these points to you; but learning that I had done so, he omitted sending them to you.

Letter 261

TO THE COUNCIL OF ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS

The saint solicits the legal approbation of his Institute, and he refutes the objections that could be raised against it.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NAPLES, July, [1756].[17064]

Since the year 1732, the priest Don Alfonso de Liguori and other priests, have learned by giving missions the great spiritual need of the people in the country, and especially of those living in hamlets and small towns of this kingdom; and on the other hand, how little is the assistance that they receive from the missions that are given from Naples. These priests have, therefore, united and have by giving missions applied themselves to the spiritual care of these abandoned people.

To carry out this work, the first house was erected in the diocese of Salerno, and then with the permission of the king, three other houses were founded in the dioceses of Nocera, Bovino and Conza.

Afterwards, in the year 1749, at the instance of the bishops of said dioceses, the reigning Pontiff, knowing the benefit and necessity of this work, a decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council having been previously issued, approved by an apostolic Brief this Institute in the form of a Congregation under the title of the Most Holy Redeemer, subjecting it to the diocesan Ordinaries.

The before-mentioned Brief has not been put in execution, as it is still lacking the permission of his Majesty. But in the meantime the aforesaid missionaries have continued to devote themselves to the giving of missions, travelling for nine months in the year through six provinces of this kingdom, giving about forty missions a year to these poor country people.

The royal clemency of our Sovereign has in the meantime been petitioned that for the good of so many of his vassals, he may deign to grant permission so that this work may be firmly established. Otherwise it will come to nothing, because, on the one hand, the young men who have been called by God to leave their families to live in ecclesiastical Communities, will hardly be induced to enter a Community that is not established with the royal approbation; and on the other hand, those that have entered, on seeing that the approbation is deferred, will be tempted to leave it for fear that after the work has been given up, they would have to live outside of their own homes as well as outside of the Community.

The reasons for making difficulties in granting the royal exequatur are the following:

1. That in the kingdom of Naples the number of religious houses already existing is excessive; and that for the spiritual want of souls, the pastors and priests of the country places and the missions that are given from Naples, furnish ample means.

2. That the increase of religious houses is an injury to the interests of the laity because of the purchase of property made by said houses, and because they then remain in the possession of this property.

3. These foundations begin well, but in time they are rather injurious, or at least useless.

To the first objection the reply may be given that although the religious houses in the kingdom might be sufficient and excessive, yet the houses of missionaries that attend to the spiritual culture of the poor people of the country, are very few in proportion to their wants. Everywhere zealous bishops are heard complaining, because they see a great part of their flocks perishing for want of help; they ask for missions, but they cannot have them, since the missions from Naples do not reach the hundredth part of the wants that exist. There are, it is true, many ecclesiastics (and would to God there were fewer!), but very few of them are good apostolic workers.

To the second objection that the increase of religious houses is prejudicial to laymen we reply that the king has already provided for this, by ordering that the above-mentioned houses of the missionaries cannot acquire any annual income, and that which they possessed in the beginning are administered by the bishops who are to furnish each of the subjects with two carlini[17065] a day, and all the rest is to be given to the poor of the place. And this supreme disposition of the prince has been resignedly accepted by said missionaries, who were even satisfied with the disposition made by his Majesty. To this must be added that the same exact nothing from their own families; hence it happens that their patrimonial income remains for the benefit of the laity, their relatives.

As for the last objection, that these foundations begin well and then end badly, or remain at least useless, we ask you to cast your eyes not upon all religious houses, but only upon the foundations of missionaries, such as those of the Pious Workers and of the priests called Priests of the Missions, and you will see that these Institutes, although founded more than a century ago, are still useful to the public, either because the obligation of continually laboring keeps them from dissipation and engaged in prayer or study, or because the power of dismissing the negligent being in the hands of the Superiors, it happens that those that remain devote themselves to the work of their Institute.

As, therefore, an experiment of this new Institute of missionaries has been made during the space of twenty-three years, as it has furnished a good number of missionaries, and has already received the approbation of the Sovereign Pontiff, who gathered the most exact information about them, it is hoped that our most pious Monarch by his permission will render this great work perpetual in his kingdom, for it is a work that is devoted to the welfare of his vassals, and that is established to maintain purity of our holy religion, on which even the tranquility of the State depends.

He announces to her his early departure from Naples.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NAPLES, [end of July, 1756].

I have not had a moment for myself, occupied as I have been with important affairs of our Congregation. I will leave the city to-morrow in all haste, and when I return to Naples I will send you our Brother [Francesco Tartaglione] to whom you may tell all and give the money.

NOCERA, August 3, 1756.

I answer your last letter; it contains nothing important that needs a special answer.

I am only very glad to know that you have been insulted; yet I regret that there was so very little insult, and that the blows were measured instead of being given plentifully.

Do not omit going to Communion, even when you are told a hundred times that you are damned, and that you are a demon. Do not love the less those that show you greater contempt; render them services and pray for them.

In regard to the discipline, omit it when you are ill; but when you recover, resume it, notwithstanding that you have lost strength; take it then at least a little so as not to lose the habit of it. I recommend the same thing in regard to the spiritual reading.

It will be impossible for us to go to Caiazzo. The king does not permit us to have any more foundations; the same prohibition holds good for all religious whoever they may be.

Pray always for me. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 6, [1756].

I have just received your letter in reference to the office of Examiner, etc. Father Ferrara tells me that this is only for once, and that there is question of nominating an archpriest at Andretta.[17066]

This is sufficient. When you receive the formal letter of the archbishop in regard to the matter, you will take care at first to thank him kindly, and then to excuse yourself by saying that to accept the office you are obliged to write to me and to obtain a dispensation, since such a thing is forbidden by our Constitution. If nevertheless he presses you to accept, and wishes to push the matter, then, as there is question of doing this but once, I dispense you only for this case.

The duties of a Prioress.—Various recommendations.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 17, 1756.

I answer: Yes, God is worthy of being loved, and he wishes to be loved by you, although you have no director.

You have again been appointed Prioress; the Prioress of a convent should also be prior in love, that is to say, the first in loving God, and this is the rule of conduct that I give you.

Since you have received Jesus Christ anew,[17069] recommend me to him when you receive him as food; at least on those days on which Communion is not taken from you.

I have written to Mgr. [di Melfi] to permit you to answer Brancone. If this is granted, answer the Marquis that you never forget him in your prayers. Encourage him and say to him that you are praying to the Lord to grant him strength and light to walk on the right road and to defend the interests of the Church in the office that he occupies.

I thank you for the novena that you wished to make for me, and for the remembrance that you have of me. I thank Jesus Christ that he reminds you of me, and I pray to him that he may always remind you of me.

Thank also our Lord for the signal favor that we have just received from the Pope; for he has given us all the privileges of the Pious Workers and of the Fathers of the Christian Doctrine.[17070]

Give the enclosed answers to the Sisters who have written to me; but tell them that when they write, they should not, especially if the letter is somewhat long, expect an immediate answer; for time is wanting to me. I had even to steal the moments to write to you.

In your position, you have nothing else to do than to observe the Rule and to exact its observance. Unite yourself, then, to God by a continual offering of yourself, and in whatever state of soul you may be, humbly resign yourself.

Salute for me all the Sisters, and let all continue to recommend me to Jesus Christ. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 266

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

Exhortation to practise patience.

[NOCERA, month of August, 1756.]

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

I have read your letter and said: Alas! that this new misery should come upon us during the festival, and now we are all involved in it.

Your Reverence is asking a Mass from Petrella.[17071]—In the first place Petrella has gone to Iliceto. Secondly, you must know that Father Saverio [Rossi] usually talks when he comes here about having more Masses; because he has about forty subjects to board and a debt of about two thousand ducats; and what he obtains from the vineyard he has to give to the Baron.[17072] But seeing the misery of this house he has not the courage to speak of it. To take now from Ciorani the Mass of Petrella and to give it to him, is a thing that cannot be thought of, the more so since this Mass already belongs there.

Therefore, in order to give you some other Mass I should have to take it from the house at Pagani. Now you know what is the condition of this house.

There is a debt of about two hundred ducats, which has to be paid to butchers and others, who are anxious to be paid. Hence Father Mazzini has declared that he felt no confidence in being able to support the novitiate, although I have assigned to him another Mass which I had assigned to the impoverished house at Iliceto. Hence if there is no prospect of obtaining help, it will become necessary to remove the novitiate from this place.

Now just think, from whom could I take this Mass? I feel compassion for you all, and say that you are right. But I would like to have someone to say to me what I am to do in order to satisfy all. I have already praised you for not having complained, and I see that now you have complained being forced by necessity; but we must embrace our sister, patience, which is poverty's own sister.

I thank you for the little paper that you have written, and I expect the other.

I have received no letters from Benevento. I bless all, and I pray to God to grant you patience.

After the feast of the Blessed Virgin is over,[17073] have the Fathers who can do so make their retreat, because in October of this year there will be work for them; perhaps it will be a mission at Amalfi, which I have heard mentioned. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 267

TO THE FATHERS AND BROTHERS OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

He exhorts a rigorous observance of a point of the Rule.

[NOCERA, August 18, 1756.]

Alfonso Maria de Liguori of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer Rector Major.

The rule that forbids the receiving and the sending of letters without the permission of the Superiors is a matter of great importance. The non-observance of this rule may make room for innumerable disorders that would ruin the Congregation. Hence in order to provide temporarily till the next Chapter for the exact observance of the foregoing rule, we ordain, for the porters of the houses and for all the Brothers, that all the letters that they receive for the subjects, except the letters addressed to the Consultors or written by them, should be carried to the Superiors of the houses or of the missions. In regard to those letters referring to matters of conscience they must conform to the constitution of the Chapter.

Should a Brother neglect the execution of this ordinance, we forbid the subjects to open the letters that they receive; nor should they forward the letters that they write, before having shown them to the Superior, at least sealed if there is question of matters of conscience.

We charge the consciences of the Superiors with the faithful observance of this rule, and exhort them to punish severely those that are guilty of any infraction of it; otherwise they will make themselves responsible, and will be sternly dealt with by me, since this is a matter of very great importance, and for certain reasons of much greater than some imagine.

In regard to letters concerning matters of conscience, it has been decided in the constitution of the Chapter, that the Superior shall not open them; but we declare that this must be understood of letters from strangers, and not those from relatives.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, September 24, [1756].

I have received your letter, and Father Fiocchi just happens to be here.

He says that if he ceases to have any relations with you, it is because from a distance and by letter he can hardly do more than undertake the direction of your conscience. For the rest, as soon as you become reconciled to this fact, my dear Mother, he will give you this satisfaction, and I have told him to do so. But in return always recommend me to Jesus Christ; for this is a particular dispensation that I grant in your favor, since our Rule prohibits such a thing.

May Jesus Christ reward you for the charity with which you recommend me to him! Our good Mother in heaven will, I hope, always put you in mind of this.

TO FATHER ANDREA VILLANI, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT S. ANGELO A CUPOLO

Recommendations relative to the interests of the Congregation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, October 1, [1756].

I have sent the letter to Marquis Petruro.

You tell me that if the same assistance had been given to Iliceto, it would have been possible to support the novitiate there!—O my dear Andrea! what do you say? Did you therefore hope that the Masses would be said here, and that the money for them would be sent to Iliceto? At Iliceto you would not have received ten carlini a week. You had better drive this idea out of your head; for it can never be, no, never, that one house should support the other, because all the houses in whatever condition they may be are really hospitals in which every carlino that comes in goes out.

A long explanation would be necessary to make this clear to you. If there had not been secretly set on foot the making of stalls, the carpenter-work for the upper story, etc. we should not now find ourselves in this embarrassment; but now things are done, and we must be silent and must suffer.

When the contract of the farm is settled at Naples I will be able, I hope, to furnish you in November with money from [D. Benedetto] Grazioli to make the purchases.

When you make the purchases do not fail to found two chaplaincies, or at least one of them, in order that we may be able to ordain one of our subjects who would not have any patrimony, a chaplaincy for instance, for Frater [Lorenzo] Nigro, who is moreover the only son, though in Minor Orders.[17074]

The chaplaincy should be founded entirely in Masses, with an annual revenue corresponding to the tax of the patrimony which at Benevento is thirty ducats; with this should be connected the obligation of celebrating these Masses in our church of the Assumption.

I say this in order that the subject who is deprived of the chaplaincy, if he should leave us [the Institute], may not lay claim to the fruits without coming to celebrate in our church.

The chaplaincy would have to be founded when making the purchases; otherwise it cannot be founded afterwards, as it would be alienated; and alienation would require the intervention of Rome.

The chaplaincy may be founded on the interest-money of the annual revenue. About this you would have to consult the Vicar-General.

We must think of this matter now, because there would be no time after the purchase has been made.

In regard to furnishing another Father to help you on the missions, there is great misery; because applications for missions are innumerable.

For Benevento are already destined Fathers Amarante, Grossi, Buonamano and de Angelis. You may, however, when you wish send for them. [Father] Buonamano can help me at Amalfi whither I shall go at the beginning of the week.

As for the large mission asked for by the Archbishop [of Benevento] write to Father Fiocchi, who will be near Conza, or write to me, and we shall see whether we shall be able to detach one or two of the Fathers.

The subjects destined for the missions are too few for this campaign.

I conclude, because my head allows me to say no more. Missions, debts, departure for [the mission at] Amalfi, etc. Oh, what embarrassments! Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 271

TO THE FATHERS AND BROTHERS OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

Prohibition to go out without a special permission.

NOCERA, October 2, 1756.

No subject is allowed to leave home without the permission of the Rector, and unless the Rector advises him to come to speak to me.

In case the subject does not wish to communicate his affairs (for which he wishes to come) to the Rector of the house, or the Rector does not think it necessary for him to come to me, the subject may write to me; and when I shall say to him to come, he may come.

TO SISTER MARIA NICOLETTA LEONI (DI CALVANICO), IN THE MONASTERY OF FISCIANO

He reproaches her for her impatience and exhorts her to resignation.

NOCERA, October 6, [1756].

I have received your letter and with it the stipend for a Mass.

I will pray and have others to pray for you; but if you do not do your share of co-operation in practising patience, God will not come to your assistance, and you will always lead a miserable life. I do not even know what death you will die if you die in the like sentiments of impatience.

You say: I am surrounded by enemies. Is this the language of a religious? Enemies, when you yourself tell me that a servant was hired expressly for you? Is it the fault of the Sisters if afterwards this servant falls ill?

Your acts of impatience, it seems to me, are continual, and you blame now the Sisters, because they do not assist you as you wish, now Almighty God, because he does not deliver you from your illness. This is the way that you suffer without merit, and after having thus suffered you will have to go to purgatory to expiate all your acts of impatience.

Well, then, stop all that! otherwise you will die a bad death. Put yourself in God's hands, ask him for good health, but ask with resignation; and if God does not grant it to you, you should say that your illness is good for your eternal salvation.

Is there anything grander than to offer one's sufferings to Jesus Christ, to him who has suffered so much for the love of us, and who has endured greater sufferings without having deserved them? Do this, and you will suffer in peace, and you will weave for yourself a beautiful crown for Paradise. Among the sufferings that you must offer to God is the little assistance that you receive from the Sisters.

But they forget me!—And you forget that you are a spouse of Jesus Christ; you forget the sins by which you have offended your divine Saviour, the promises that you have made to him, and the love that he has borne you.

In future, I hope that you will do what I have just told you. Renew every day the resolution of offering to God all your pains, and at this very moment when you are reading these lines, make this offering at the foot of the crucifix.

But if you wish to continue to complain of your illness, of your Sisters, etc., it will be useless for you to write me anymore, for I loathe to see a religious so impatient and always complaining about the Sisters. If the Sisters do not do their duty, do yours by bearing with them. You will act so, I hope.

I bless you in the name of Jesus Christ and of Mary, so that you may hereafter obey me. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 273

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

He begs him to watch over the health of the students.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, October 27, [1756].

I am told that Frater Michele [de Michele] has begun to look as badly as he did before.

I beg you to examine how he is; and if it be necessary do not allow him to study, nor to do even what I have permitted him to do. If this young man has a relapse, it will be all over with him.

I have also been informed that Frater [Lorenzo] Nigro and others are seriously affected with bowel troubles.

I give you full power to moderate the studies of these young people, and in case of doubt to incline always to the side of health. I give you all the faculties, on condition, however, that you afterwards render an account of what you have done. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 274

TO THE SAME

Various recommendations.—Explanation regarding some points of the Rule of the students.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, 29, [November, 1756].

According to what I hear, my dear Gasparo, you are greatly tortured by that detestable fever. May the will of God be done! I also have been favored these past few days with a little fever.

I beg you not to be troubled about the confessors. There is no harm if all those that come to confession [in our chapel] are not heard. During the missions things are not otherwise. It is therefore sufficient if two or three remain at home.

As you feel indisposed at present, Father [Ignazio] Fiore will remain; when you are better, you can go out for some time, then Father Fiore may take his turn.

Father Picone is now hearing the confessions of men and women, and as he is Prefect of the students, he can engage in the work during the time of studies, of retreat, etc.

Tell Father Leo from me that he should be patient; that he may hear the confessions of men on all feast days; what is done, has always been done.

I am so much embarrassed at present with missions, especially with those of Calabria that I find it necessary to set out myself sick as I am.

Now attend solely to the restoration of your health.

In relation to the controverted points in the Constitution of the students here is my answer:

1. In regard to the semi-retreat of Sunday mornings, an hour of preparation and an hour of thanksgiving appear to me to be too much; half an hour for each is sufficient. Let there be a conference, a general Communion, a half hour's spiritual reading, the Little Hours in common. The rest of the time every one may spend in private devotion.

2. As for going out, let the Prefect accompany them, or if he is prevented they may be presided over by a discreet student, or the Rector may appoint a Father for this purpose.

The Lector may go out with the students on study days; on recreation days he must go out with the Fathers.

In reference to spiritual direction, the students should address themselves either to the Prefect or the Rector of the house.

I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO MOTHER MARIA DI GESÙ, AT RIPACANDIDA

He exhorts her to correct abuses with prudence.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOLA, December 4, [1756].

I answer you from Nola, where I am at present.

I am very glad that you have undertaken to remedy the abuses that have been introduced against the Rule. May Jesus Christ bless you for your zeal, and give you the strength of which you stand in need! For if in the beginning such abuses are introduced, twenty or thirty years will not pass by before the entire Rule will have been swept away.

As for the distressed souls that come to consult you, I advise you not to fail to assist them; since they call upon you expressly for this purpose, we may hope that they will be docile to your advice. Retrench, however, all useless discourse, and endeavor to go straight to the point; yet do this prudently, for you may not be able to do this in the beginning.

Continue to recommend me to Jesus Christ. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO CANON GIACOMO FONTANA, AT NAPLES

He speaks to him about one of his little works: "Rule for Seminaries."

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOLA, December 9, [1756].

I have received your most esteemed note; I will send to his Eminence for the offering of which you speak.

The little work on Seminaries is already in press, and will be issued in accordance with the corrections which you have kindly made.

I shall present a copy of it to all the bishops; I hope that they will read it, as it is short; and I trust that it will redound to the glory of God.

I shall be at your service, and I beg you to recommend me to the Infant Jesus.

In conclusion, I would most humbly kiss your hand. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

It is to you that I have entrusted the revision of the little book on Seminaries, since you have had the kindness to read and to correct it. When you read it, you will find all your corrections. I will send you the proofs and the original that you may compare them. Live Jesus and Mary!

Your most humble and devoted servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

The following is the eulogy pronounced by the Canon in his report to Cardinal Sersale:

Most Eminent Sir: In compliance with the order of your Eminence I read the little work entitled "Rule for Seminaries." The most pious author, always bent upon promoting the glory of our Lord, has most accurately explained in this work whatever is required for the good direction of seminaries; hence I judge that its publication will be a public benefit.

I have the honor to remain,

Most Eminent Sir, with profound respect, your obedient and humble servant,

CAN. GIACOMO FONTANA.

Some advice in regard to the spiritual life.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 12, [1756].

I thank you most cordially for the little present, but do not inconvenience yourself on my account.

God knows when I shall go to Naples, especially during winter. For the rest, you have no need of me; you have your director and I am far away.

I send you some spiritual works which I have just published. Read especially the "Practice of Perfection" which comes after the "Novena to St. Teresa," and the "Glories of Mary." You can read some of it every day, even if only half a page. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Write me some particulars about your life, your exercises of piety, and your penances. I will then send you a general rule which you may follow; however let this be with the consent of your director. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO FATHER EMANUELE CALDARERA, OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE ORATORY AT NAPLES

Thanksgiving.—Asking for a favor.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, 17, [January] 1757.

My dear Father Emanuele: I thank you very much for having given me to read the first volume of the Trappists.[17075] Please to send the others when you can. I have searched in Naples in order to find the Lives of these religious, and I did not succeed. You will surely do well if you send them to your brother that he also may read them.

I send you the little works about which you have been informed[17076] with the letters that accompany them; if possible have them sent to Sicily to one of your friends, and beg him to see that they reach their destination.

It matters little that the name of the bishop is not found on some of the letters; that of the episcopal city is always given, and this is sufficient.

You can now offer the holy Sacrifice; grant me, then, my dear Father, a memento in your Mass; I will render you the same service. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph! Believe me always,

He exhorts her to a perfect love of Jesus Christ.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, 23, [January, 1757].

I yesterday received the box, of which you make me a present. I beg our Lord to reward you for it.

Tell your director that I have been sick for some time through his fault; I mean since the novena which he made me preach for him at Nola.

I am glad that your sister will soon take Jesus Christ for her Spouse. As for you who are already the spouse of this good Master, love him as a spouse, that is, purely through love without having in view temporal or spiritual consolations; and when you go to Communion, pray for me as I always do for you. TO FATHER EMANUELE CALDARERA, OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE ORATORY AT NAPLES

Thanks for services rendered.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, January 28, 1757.

My dear Father Emanuele: You may be assured that in sending me these Lives of the Trappists I have received them as a treasure. I had been looking for them so long a time and I could never find them.

It would be a fine thing if after that the head of the house should need ask permission to read his own books! Whenever your Reverence wishes again to read the two books that I have or the others when you have finished reading the former, send me word and I will send them at once to you.

I thank you for delivering the letter addressed to the bishop.[17077]

Recommend me to Jesus Christ, because I have done so and am doing so for you with all my heart. I thank you again and am at your service.

Your Reverence knows that I do not wish to be prolix. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph! Kissing your hand, I remain,

TO SISTER MARIA ANGELA ROSA GRAZIANO, IN THE MONASTERY OF THE SS. ROSARIO AT NAPLES

She should ask her director for a rule of conduct such as she needs.

[March, 1757?]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

The following is an answer to your letter.

Since Don Giov. Battista does not give you a rule of conduct such as you need, you must ask him for it. Ask him to tell you, for example, how long a time you should spend in prayer, what mortifications you are to practise, how often you are to communicate, etc. Always ask for Communions and mortifications, and then obey what is prescribed.

As for myself, it is impossible that I should direct you so far away, and moreover, I have no time at my disposal.

Pray to Jesus for nee. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO THE SAME

He exhorts her to persevere in prayer.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, April 8, [1757.]

I have received your letter together with the present, for which I thank you; but for pity's sake do not inconvenience yourself on my account.

I have not at present any occasion to go to Naples; when I shall be able to go there I shall call upon you. But you have your director; in what way could I be of service to you?

This morning Don Giov. Battista was here, and he told me that you are doing well; this gave me much pleasure.

As for prayer, that which we perform without relish is the best; for the less it pleases us, the more it pleases Jesus Christ.

Always recommend me to Jesus Christ as I recommend you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Do not be uneasy in regard to the fancies that importune you during prayer; despise them, and quietly proceed by offering to God this pain. The devil would like to have you abandon prayer; spite him by remaining faithful to prayer. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 283

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

He speaks of a mission that is to be given and of various other subjects.

NOCERA, April 17, [1757].

Be so good as to see to it that this letter may safely reach Giuseppe Caselle. Read the letter addressed to me by the Vicar-General of Salerno; he continues to insist that we should give a mission at Castelluccia. Try in any case to send at least two Fathers; however, two cannot do the work; we need three of them; and it would be well to go to Teora immediately after. In a word, see to it that this little mission be given immediately, and for this purpose let everything else be laid aside. You should without delay inform Father Fiocchi of this arrangement.

My dear Gasparo, how painful it was to me to see what Father N. has done! I had begged him several times, and the last time I begged him most earnestly, to go to Iliceto to speak to Francesco Antonio Maffei, and instead of going himself he sent a messenger to ask Maffei whether he wished to see him. This made Maffei still more angry, and he renewed his prohibition to gather even dry wood in the forest.[17078]

If we have Maffei against us, it will be all over with this house. My God, how can I direct the Congregation when people act in this manner! Let me know why he did not wish to go there. Did he perhaps feel unwell? I purpose to give him a severe penance, but I shall wait for a more favorable opportunity.

As for Brother N. I must say that I tremble for him; for he seems to me to be of a disposition not easy to get along with. However, as to the affair of the blows given to a novice, I have found out that that was not true; for he scarcely touched his head in a playful way. But there is no doubt that he has committed a thousand faults. The letter, however, that he has written to me has consoled me. Let him read my answer to him, and be kind enough to direct him and make him render an account of all that he does, because he is a subject of great hopes.

Then tell Brother N. that his letter has afforded me great pleasure. His penance shall consist in one more visit to the Blessed Sacrament, that he may obtain the grace of practising obedience, and I bless him also. I do not write to him a special letter, because I am not able.

I bless you all, and especially your Reverence in the pitiable state in which you are now. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 284

TO DON GIUSEPPE CASELLE, AT RAPPOLA

He recommends to him that he should regulate his family affairs.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, April 18, 1757.

I have just received your last letter.

All goes well. As for myself, do not be uneasy. Quod scripsi, scripsi. [What I have written, I have written.] Do not spend your time in entertaining doubts. Devote yourself to the arranging of your family affairs, so that you may no more be annoyed by them.[17079] In the meantime finish the study of Moral Theology, and recommend me to Jesus Christ. Letter 285

TO A FATHER OF THE CONGREGATION

Hints as to the Composition of a theological treatise.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

June 3, [the year uncertain].

Ask in my name Father N. to compose a treatise de Incarnatione to be studied by our young men, because that of Father N. does not please me; but do not let the latter know this.

I should wish him to consult various authors, such as Giovenino, Habert, Contensone, Petavio, Tournely, Gonet, the Manual of Petrocorese, and to write not a book, but Elements in which may be found the principal things. On each question let only the principal reasons as also the principal objections be given in a concise but clear style. The Elements should exhibit the general notions of certain things and of things controverted, so that one may thereby avoid advancing an error or affirming anything that is controverted. If need be, let him read those authors that treat the matter in detail.

Let Father N. read these remarks, and gradually set to work to compose the treatise, especially as I hear that he has already begun to do so.

Letter 286

TO FATHER CELESTINO DE ROBERTIS

He begs him to change his place of abode.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

June 4, 1757.

My dear Celestino: I see that in that house [of S. Angelo a Cupolo] your Reverence and Father Villani do not agree because between you two there exists a spirit of contradiction; for this reason I have to remove either your Reverence or Father Andrea [Villani].

But it is not convenient for me at present to take away F. Andrea, because the Archbi shop [of Benevento] has asked me not to take the latter from him; hence if now I remove him I should displease the archbishop. I therefore beg you to leave that house immediately and to go to Ciorani as soon as possible.

When setting out perform some act of humility in regard to Father Andrea, because I do not wish that any grudge should remain between you. A divergence of opinion or of appreciation should not take its abode in the heart of him who wishes only God.

I bless you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 288

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT CAPOSELE

He requests him to watch over the observance of the Rule and the preservation of the health of the subjects.—Rules in regard to the teaching of theology.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, 15, [July, 1757.]

You have answered wonderfully well in regard to the ordinary confessor for Calitri.[17080] Continue now to say that you do not dare to write to me on the subject, because that would give me much pain, and I would never consent to so grave a thing against the Rule, no, never; I say no more.

Father Margotta says that when there is question of the interests of the whole Congregation, we should know how to resist and be deaf to every solicitation for three and even ten years.[17081]

As for Frater Ricca, let him recover entirely, for he has always been ailing and weak; in October we shall speak of his coming.[17082]

I await Brother Giuseppe Caputo to arrange matters for the ordination of his son.[17083]

Send Father [Pietro] Petrella to Ciorani to drink the waters. Here no more persons are received.

As for the affair of Brother N. reported to me by Father Ferrara, do you really believe that I ever lent an ear to what that good Brother said? The Brother, you know, often talks nonsense, and I reprimanded him severely; still he will always remain what he is.

I hear that several students have been a little unwell. In the morning, during the hot weather, let them go out during the time one may walk without being inconvenienced by the sun, that is, before the sun becomes very warm.

I wish that the students should enjoy good health; it matters little that they lose on this account two hours of study. Let them go out also in the evening, and have at least an hour's recreation.

If you have still to speak in reference to the confessor for Calitri, express yourself in regard to the matter yet more strongly. Arrange things in such a way that, if it can be done, I may not be obliged to write about this subject; for if I must write I should have to express myself with still greater force, and we might thereby displease the archbishop.

As for Frater [D. Vincenzo] Striano I should like to know what is to be done; I shall have to reflect on the matter.

As for the scholastic questions about the sacraments, I do not wish that there be taught opinions contrary to those that we hold in Moral Theology. I speak of the principal questions; of attrition, of the minister of marriage, and also of the intention that the minister must have to do what the Church does, etc.

In important and the like principal questions I wish that the common opinions and those that I myself reach in my Moral Theology should be followed and maintained as much as possible. I do not write specially to Father Leo because the Brother is about to depart; but you may tell him that on this point I do not wish him to make any reply. If the Lector holds a contrary opinion, let him keep it to himself; for the rest he must practise obedience, and endeavor to defend our opinions by the best possible reasons, endeavoring to become attached only to those opinions that are conformable to obedience.

Tell Father Leo that I shall not listen to Father N. . . . . and that he should guide himself as seems best to him. It will be sufficient that a two year's course in theology be given, and that the principal treatises, de Deo, de Trinitate, de Incarnation, and de Gratia be taught. Ask him from me not to devote too much time to history, as Father [Alessandro de] Meo has done.

What I wish him to do is to explain thoroughly the dogmas, the distinctions, terms, and principal questions treated by the scholastics: these, called Elements, are necessary for preaching, etc. As for the rest, everyone will study what he can.

I have spoken of certain questions, such as the institution of marriage, etc. I have not done so in order to criticize N. . . . . I intended to write to him, for I do not wish outsiders to look upon us as fanatics, nor as would-be-learned men. Common opinions as a general rule are the most probable, and when we follow opinions that are common, we cannot be criticised.

Recommend to Frater [D. Giuseppe di] Lucia not to be uneasy about what he hears those say that are not Superiors; and when he hears the Superior speak, he should grow calm by conforming to obedience; and if obedience requires that he should not study, such will certainly be the will of God.

I bless all.

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] I do not wish that Purcozio[17084] should be any more criticised as I hear that he is, for the purpose of bringing him into discredit. This book has met with general approval; why should we criticise it? If any one wishes to find fault with it, let him do so privately; for my part I wish to be obeyed. If obedience ceases with us, it will be all over with the Congregation.

Privately: N. N. . . . writes to me in great trouble that the spirit is waning, poverty is practised only partially and charity is no longer disinterested; do not say a word to him, for he has written to me with great secrecy. Be careful. This subject makes me tremble. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO SISTER MARIA DI GESÙ, CARMELITE, AT RIPACANDIDA.[17085]

He exhorts her to patience and gives her other advice.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, July 22, [1757].

I have received your letter of July 4, with the letter of Marquis Brancone.

How great was the joy I felt when I learned that you had descended to the rank of a simple subject for the greatest benefit of your soul! But the harrowing fears that produce in your soul a sort of agony cause me still greater joy. If you had not these trials I should fear that you are not a true disciple of Jesus Christ; for Jesus Christ treats his cherished souls as he himself has been treated. Oh, how beautiful it is to walk in the way of the cross and to accompany our blessed Redeemer! Oh, how sure is this road on which one cannot go astray!

I feel very grateful to you for the remembrance of me in your prayers. Continue, I entreat you, to remember me always, especially now, when having fewer external cares, you can commune with Jesus Christ all by yourself.

I do not write specially to Sister Maria Celeste, but I communicate to her through you who knows all. Recommend to her, my dear Mother, not to say to Mgr. [Teodoro Basta] that she does not wish his direction; and induce her not to take another director: this would not be proper. Let her keep herself in peaceful indifference, and in her difficulties let her ask your advice.

I send you the portrait of Brother Gerardo;[17086] it is one of those that Don Benedetto gave me and that he had printed. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

The feelings of the king towards the Congregation are not those of Marquis Brancone.

NOCERA, October 2, [1757?]

A few lines only.—I have had the fever for many days past; but to-day, thanks be to God, I am free from it.

Canon Caselle has already arrived; but I have yet to speak to him at my leisure. Pray to God to grant him the necessary strength; for in the embarrassed state in which we find ourselves many privations will have to be endured.

In regard to Marquis Brancone, I thank you for the zeal with which you have recommended us to him. May Jesus Christ reward you for this! But, my dear Sister, if our affairs do not turn out well, it will not be Brancone's fault. He does all that he can to assist us. It is the king that does not wish to grant our request; this he himself has declared to the Archbishop of Naples who spoke to him in our favor. We must then ask God to change the heart of the king. However, may God bless his Majesty, and may we become saints!

Recommend me to Jesus Christ and salute for me all your Sisters. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

Letter 291

TO THE FATHERS OF HIS CONGREGATION

Explanations as to the vow of poverty.—Various Recommendations.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, October 3, 1757.

My dear Brethren in Jesus Christ: For the benefit of general observance I have thought it to be my duty to lay down the following rules:—

After having carefully examined with the Consultors whether it is contrary to poverty to receive uncertain restitutions, and whether the confessors can apply them at their pleasure to pious works, it has been decided upon the authority of Doctors and upon the authority of reason that to act so would undoubtedly be against poverty.

Father Lohner in his Bibliotheca manualis puts this question: Is it permitted (to a religious) to receive money or anything else to distribute among the poor?—and he answers: By receiving any object with the power of giving it to these persons or those, he that receives it would act against his vow if he distributed it at his own pleasure without being authorized to do so by his Superior; because it is out of order that he that is bound by the vow of poverty should act as if he had the ownership or the use of what has been put into his hands.[17087]—For the same reason Father Rodriguez says that "not only is it contrary to the vow of poverty to take a thing as one's own, but to have the use and free disposal of it without the permission of the Superior."[17088]

Azor says that this decision is conformable to the common opinion of authors. It is equally certain, he says, a religious cannot have any peculium of the second kind (that is, with the faculty of disposing of it at his own pleasure); for the use or the administration of a good is indeed repugnant to the vow of poverty as long as the Superior cannot direct in this the will of his inferior. In fact, a religious cannot possess anything as his own; now the power of using or disposing of property without dependence on the will of the Superior would be equal to the possession of a thing as one's own.[17089] It is for the same reason, adds Azor, that the Council of Trent has decided that the use of movable property belongs only to those who are officials, and that they are to act only according to the will of the Superior.[17090]

The reason of this decision is clear; because the use of an object that is made independently of the will of the Superior by him that is bound by the vow of poverty in an act of ownership, which is injurious to the vow.

This being established, in order to relieve myself from every scruple as to the oath that I have taken to permit no personal use independent of the Superior, and also to obviate many other inconveniences, I have found it expedient to ordain, and by these presents I ordain for each and all, that all uncertain restitutions received by our confessors, when they are at home, should be carried to the Rector, to be employed in pious works; and if they are on missions these restitutions shall be put into the hands of the Superior of the missions, who shall use it with prudence for the expenses of the mission, or to give them in alms. Finally, in order to avoid all violation and all misinterpretation of the ordinance I am giving, I expressly forbid confessors to suggest to their penitents that they should express the intention that the restitution be assigned to such or such a work; for this would be eluding this ordinance.

As for the obedience that is due to me, I am often obliged to repeat the same things in order to be obeyed. Where is then, my Brethren, this delicate fidelity that God asks of you? What peace can a subject have who acts contrary to the intention of his Superior? As for myself, I know not how this can be excused before God. I fear that some great chastisement from God will befall him. It is only twenty-four years since the Congregation has been established; and if such behavior continues, what will become of it a hundred years hence?

I recommend to you what the Rule says about letter-writing. I do not wish the subjects to receive letters unless they have before submitted them to the inspection of the Superior. He shall not read them if they regard matters of conscience; otherwise I charge the Superiors to open all the other letters without exception, and at least to glance over them before giving them to the religious to whom they are addressed.

I expressly forbid our religious to go to the houses of seculars without permission from the Superior, unless in a case of urgent necessity when there is no time to ask permission. I specially recommend that we should not go to the monasteries of nuns without the permission of the Rector himself.

I earnestly recommend that no one should make known to strangers the affairs of the Congregation or of the house. What misery it is to see strangers better instructed about our affairs than our own people!

I again advise and recommend that when there is question of allowing the subjects to spend the night outside of our houses, especially if it is for several days, you take care to give me notice if there be time to do so.

I recommend that obedience should be paid to the Superiors of the houses and of the missions as it is paid to myself. In regard to this I have heard many complaints.

The Chapter has declared that in reference to the question of knowing whether as to the expenses of more than twelve scudi the Consultors have a decisive voice, we should conform to the practice of the Pious Workers. Information on this subject has been asked, and the answer was in the affirmative. Let all the Rectors, therefore, be guided by this decision.

I earnestly request that no postulant be sent to me to be received, unless I have previously received notice.

I strictly enjoin that there be put in execution the ordinance of the Chapter prescribing that in every house a book should be kept of receipts and expenses also of the alms; moreover that in the sacristy, as the Sovereign Pontiff ordains, there be a table giving the Masses that have been founded.

I recommend above all that the Masses be not said with precipitation; for this would give more scandal in us than in other priests.

As to the missions, I advise (1) a day of retreat for each month. Let us (2) not seek to have particular food during the missions; provided we have soup and boiled meat, we should not ask for anything else. The observance of this rule will give great edification; if now we begin to relax in it, we shall in a short time relax in everything. (3) We should not, especially on missions, make confidants of strangers; let there be no useless conversation. We must always be polite although we should be reserved. (4) I recommend modesty of the eyes; it is even more necessary than the preaching of sermons. (5) The Chapter of faults should be held on all the missions. (6) We should guard against joking in the presence of strangers. Let the Superior always appoint a censor who is to take notice of faults and to inform me of them. (7) There should always be a Prefect of the church, and a Prefect of peace; the latter may at the same time take charge of those that are engaged to be married, and he should persuade them to marry as soon as possible. (8) I recommend to him that is charged to preach the principal sermons to recite with the people before the sermon, morning and evening prayers according to the formula that I have indicated in my little book. We should recommend the tolling of the bell to announce that someone is dying; let the manner of tolling be different according to the rank of the person. We should invite the faithful to recite then an Our Father and a Hail Mary for the dying. This practice is useful both for the sick and for those that are in good health.

I embrace you all in Jesus Christ. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 292

TO SISTER MARIA ANGELA ROSA GRAZIANO, IN THE CONVENT OF THE SS. ROSARIO AT NAPLES

He recommends to her obedience and perfect detachment.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

[NOCERA], October 16, [1757].

I answer your letter.

As regards your direction, I have assigned to you a good guide; obey him then, and you will become a saint.

As for mortifications, ask for them frequently; then do what you are told. I rejoice that you are detached from your relatives, but I regret that you are so troubled on account of my absence. All your affections, you should know, should be reserved for the infinite Good who alone merits all love. Moreover, when I go to Naples, all my time is taken up with business, and I afterwards try to go away as soon as possible without seeing relatives or friends. You will then do well to pray for me. On my part, I pray to Jesus to your intention that Jesus Christ may entirely possess your heart without any reserve. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO THE SAME

Recommendations in regard to obedience.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, 28, [October, 1757?]

Since Don Giovanni Battista is absent, provided he has not returned, begin to do what I have told you; but on his return, ask him for the necessary permissions. Pray to Jesus Christ and Mary for me. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

Letter 294

TO MOTHER MARIA CHERUBINA DEI SETTE DOLORI, CARMELITE AT RIPACANDIDA

He exhorts her zealously to maintain regular observance.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, October 29, [1757].

I have read your letter, and I see with regret that you are so timid, and that you have too much consideration when there is question of maintaining regular observance: for the loss of observance is the ruin of the monastery; and if you begin thus, what will happen later?

S. Andrea Avellino, when there was question of observance, always raised his voice against those Superiors on whom r egular observance depended. Speak then forcibly, and speak always, without troubling yourself about the fact that you are regarded as indiscreet and imprudent.

Yes, for a work of charity, the Prioress can sometimes omit the common acts, but if this happen often, it would not be well.

For you as well as for the others to have special conveniences without a particular reason, for instance, on account of sickness or the like, is a disorder that may ruin the Community. I say the same of other things.

Prayer is recited before meals, after meals, and at all times, even in the last agony; do not therefore fear to pray after having eaten, and even to read something, though this should be done without effort.

When you write, write briefly, and only what is necessary. Pray every day for me. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 295

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

He indicates to him the manner of treating a student who is tempted against his vocation.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

November 3, [1757].

My dear Don Gasparo: Frater Siniscalchi is very much disturbed, and I see that he has many faults. I shall answer him accordingly. But, what can be done? Let us apply the best remedy that we can.

I have written to him that he should depend on you; try to arrange this matter. He has, as far as I can see, a taste for the study of Moral Theology; but Father Leo wishes him to review arithmetic and those things that he has already studied, and requires him to spend the whole morning in this kind of study.

It is indeed useless to make him repeat what he has already gone through. Hence it is my wish that he should apply himself to Moral Theology according as you may judge best, as I am too far away and cannot attend to this matter. Act as if all this came from yourself and settle everything. Let us in this way remedy two evils.

Frater Siniscalchi says, moreover, that you as well as Father Leo cannot look at him, and that you tell Father Leo all that you know about him. I tell you this for your own guidance, but I beg you to keep this a secret.

He is a young man of much talent, yet at present he is weak and very much tempted.[17091] Let us help him as far as we can without prejudice to regular observance.

The retreat of half a day on Sundays should last till the signal is given for dinner, and no longer; after this time there is no longer any retreat.[17092]

Among other things Frater Siniscalchi complains that when he speaks to you, you scarcely answer him. I inform you of this that you may treat him with greater consideration; for you must know that he is violently tempted.

Tell Father Leo that I have ordered twelve copies of Tournely's Compendium; but these cost money and I am bankrupt. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA

He reproaches him for having revealed to him too late the unworthiness of a novice.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, November 25, [year uncertain].

I have received your letter, and I say: May God make you a saint!

Only now, you and Father N., etc., send me information in regard to Frater P. after he has made the vows! Had I known what I know now, I would have dismissed him a thousand times. But now what is to be done?

I had put off the profession, and still nothing was said to me. Well! may God make you all saints! I have restricted him so that he might take his departure of his own accord. I have sent him word that he should not think of Mass, etc.—In a word, may God make you all saints! to have waited till now to send me the necessary information! TO FATHER PIETRO BLASUCCI,[17093] PREFECT OF THE STUDENTS AT CIORANI

How he should act in regard to an indocile student.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, December 20, 1757.

Oh, what a fine remedy you have found for Frater Tamangi! I shall send him back to you at Christmas!

I absolutely forbid your Reverence and all the Superiors (and tell this to all, to the Rector, Father Saverio, etc.) never to send him to me; and I particularly forbid him to call upon me unless he has first humbled himself and comes to ask my pardon; tell him that unless he does this he shall never see my face again. Command him then in my name to come no more in search of me, if he has not changed.

If he wishes to write to me, let him do so; but I have already told him that if he speaks to me about a dispensation I will, at the very beginning while reading his letter, tear it to pieces and send him no answer.

I will therefore send him to you at Christmas! Now what more have I to say to him that I have not told him? If he begins to commit faults, and does not wish to study for the purpose of leaving the Community, make an arrangement with the Superior; have recourse to punishments, to fasts; keep him away from the society of others; take away his Communions.

In regard to Communions do what you think best; but as for so many Communions for one that is unfaithful, for one that wishes to abandon God, after God has called and accepted him, I know not what good they can do him. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

As for [the student Don Giuseppe] Paravento, of course send him with the others to Iliceto for the feast.

With regard to the young man of Cava, he has been accepted, but it will be necessary to have an understanding with Mgr. Borgia. He himself will speak to you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 298

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, MASTER OF NOVICES AT ILICETO

He earnestly recommends to him a postulant.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, April 5, 1758.

Read the enclosed letter which I have addressed to Father Rector [Francesco Giovenale], and send it at once to him by a messenger.

I recommend to you this young man; give him the habit, and show him great charity; listen to him every time that he wishes to speak to you, and assist him, for he is a subject of great promise. He is now well disposed, but he is greatly tormented by temptation, having led in the past rather a free life.

If he should unfortunately fall into sin, frighten him, but at the same time animate him with confidence for all that. Do not you yourself lose confidence if he now and then happens to fall. Say the same to Father Gisone[17094] or to any other Father whom this young man chooses as his confessor. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO THE PRIEST ANGELO MAIONE,[17095] IN THE NOVITIATE AT ILICETO

His fears in regard to the health of this novice.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, April 9, 1758.

My dear Don Angelo: I have read your letter; but I also received a letter from Father Master, in which he informs me that he has it from your own mouth that you have been suffering from this pain in the head for several years, and that you are troubled even with vertigo.

My dear Don Angelo, if it is true that you are subject to this headache, how could you remain in the Congregation in which one must give much time to spiritual exercises, and remain shut up during the novitiate, and then besides these exercises apply one's self to one's studies? If you fatigue your head by forced work, you will entirely ruin your health, you will become useless both to yourself and to the Congregation, and you will lead a miserable life; for if the pain has once become settled in the head, it cannot be got rid of.

However, I do not say that you should leave at once; let us wait a little while to see how things will turn out. Consult Signor N., and let me know what he says when he returns; tell him to write to me clearly what he thinks of your health. Recommend me to Jesus Christ.

Letter 300

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA

Various counsels relative to the Master of novices and to the novitiate.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, April 10, 1758.

I have received a copy of the long address against N.; and I have also received the reproof that you administer to me.

I well understand that the Master of novices would be more tranquil if he himself were the Rector of the house; that would be better for his own repose, but still greater inconveniences would result therefrom.

I shall write to the Rector and mark out for him a line of conduct, and let him know that he should not interfere in the internal concerns of the novitiate; but it will not be well to let others see my letter; it suffices that I write him privately.

As for the young man, I will briefly, as I am not well, point out to you what you should do. Keep him still on trial at least for a month; watch his behavior, and after this delay, if he conducts himself well, give him the habit.

As for the disease from which he has been suffering, the doctors write to me that he has entirely recovered. If this be not true, it will be a disease that one cannot hide, and then we have still one year for his probation. In the meantime it would be well to try him by mortifications; and then, if he receives the habit, we should always subject him to trial.

I also hear that the priest of Masi has a delicate stomach so that he cannot retain his food. Write to me what is his condition.

I bless you all. In summer you may permit the novices to go out evenings.

Letter 301

TO THE SAME

The saint makes some arrangements in the novitiate and the house at Iliceto.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, April 29, 1758.

As for Scalese,[17096] I wish him a happy journey.

In regard to Maione, inform me how he is doing. He has written me a very touching letter.

When your Reverence comes here, bring with you the directory, since the series of exercises for the morning appear to me to be too long; try to divide it. And now that the weather has become warm, it will be necessary for the novices to go out often.

When Father Polestra comes, tell him privately that I appoint him inspector of the house. He should inform me every month of any disorder that strikes him as important: I say important, because it will not be necessary to send word to me about trifles. It will be sufficient if he writes to me this one line: there is nothing of importance.

Tell Father Giovenale that I do not write to him, as there is no news.

Father [Stefano] Liguori has arrived in time; had he not arrived, there would have been great confusion, because there was no one to give the spiritual exercises to the priests.

The three novices[17097] that have been sent have been admitted to profession.

Believe me, dear Father,

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[Postscript by the secretary]: Our Father says that at table should be read li Disinganni[17098] till it is finished, but only the Lives, not the Reflections.

Letter 302

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

One cannot without the gravest inconveniences absolve a subject who has left the Congregation without having received his dispensation.

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

May 30, 1758.

My God! what news must I hear from that house! I learn that in consequence of a consultation held by several, N. has been absolved on condition that he asks for a dispensation! Now he has hundreds of times asked me for a dispensation; it was, therefore, not necessary for you to impose this upon him as an obligation. In short, what he could not obtain from Rome he has obtained from this house!

Oh, what pain has it been to me to hear such news! But what necessity was there for you to touch upon so delicate a point on which depends the maintenance of the Congregation? If you thought that he could be absolved on this condition, were there no other confessors in the world to absolve him? As to the one that has thus absolved him outside of the danger of death, I do not know how he could have formed his conscience. When there is question of doing difficult things, as has really happened, one does not give absolution before the accomplishment of that which has to be performed.

And then whence should this dispensation come? I for my part will never give it, if he that leaves without dispensation does not return to the Congregation. When he returns and has received the required penances, then I will reflect on what should be done. I judge that this is the way every Rector Major should act, if he does not wish to lose his soul and be the cause of ruin to the Congregation.

I have conferred with the Cardinal Penitentiary at Rome in regard to this matter; and if I should see that the Penitentiary would grant such dispensation, I would resolve to write and write again to the Sovereign Pontiff. But our house at N. does what the Penitentiary at Rome does not do!

Communicate the contents of my letter to all the Fathers of your Community, and especially to those that have given this beautiful advice. I also beg you to make known in accordance with prudence the substance of this letter to all our young men [students] and to the Brothers so that this example may not be the cause of ruin to others.

TO FATHER EMANUELE CALDARERA, OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE ORATORY

He testifies his friendship for him and recommends himself to his prayers.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, June 9, 1758.

My dear Father Emanuele: I am consoled to hear of the little present that you have received from Jesus Christ, of the mortification that he has sent you; but I am sorry on account of the loss of souls.

Be without disquietude; I will not omit to recommend you to the Lord; but I beg you do not forget our agreement.

About the middle of July we may see each other at Naples.—I have destroyed the letter. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

I have read with great joy what you tell me about the four novices.

Do me the favor of sending the enclosed letter to one of your Fathers at Palermo.

Letter 304

TO THE FATHERS AND STUDENTS OF THE CONGREGATION

(This letter was written in the name of the saint by Father Fabrizio Cimino.)

The Propaganda had requested missionaries for Asia; an appeal is made to the zeal of the subjects of the Institute.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, July 18, 1758.

My dear Fathers and Fratres in Jesus Christ: I have been requested by our Father to communicate to you the news that he has been asked to send young men to the foreign missions of Asia. There various people of the Nestorian sect have most earnestly asked to be instructed in Catholic dogmas in order to be united with the Roman Church in which the grace of our Lord makes us know that eternal salvation is to be found.

Behold there is opened to us a vast field in which the harvest is quite ready and is waiting to be gathered in by workmen animated with zeal. Look at those unfortunate nations who bathed in tears raise a suppliant voice to heaven, and conjure the Lord to send you to them. They extend their arms towards you and beg you to come to withdraw them from the fatal ignorance in which they have lived for more than thirteen hundred years. Unfortunate people! they do not wish to resort to those that have hitherto guided them in the ways of error, and they address themselves to you whom they regard as the true dispensers of divine wisdom. In their extreme poverty, they ask for nothing else but to be returned to the bosom of the Church. It is you whom they supplicate; you, I say, that show yourselves so generous towards your fellow-countrymen; it is you whom they conjure not to value their souls less than those of our own country. They have had the same Creator, they were formed of the same substance, and have as much right as we have to the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. One may even say that there is a species of justice that should urge us to carry the light of truth into the country whence we have received it.

If the journey frightens you, they promise to recompense you by a most affectionate reception; if the inconveniences make you shudder, they assure you of a rich harvest. If the fatigue that you would have to endure causes you to fear, you should be encouraged by the eternal reward that awaits you. And what reason could we have of not coming to their assistance?

My Fathers and Brothers, I am certain that several will express to me their desire not to lose the crown that the Lord deigns to present them with his divine hands,—a crown with which I wish to see that the forehead of each one may be adorned in the heavenly country.

In conclusion I recommend myself to your prayers, and while humbly kissing your hands I sign myself

Your servant and Brother in Jesus Christ,

FABRIZIO CIMINO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

TO FATHER PIETRO PAOLO BLASUCCI, PREFECT OF THE STUDENTS AT CIORANI

He answers the students and gives them important advice.

(Read this letter to all the young men.)

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, July 27, 1758.

My dear Brethren: The petitions that you have sent me have afforded me great joy; be assured that I say this sincerely. I should be most desirous to see several of our young men go among the heathen to give their lives for Jesus Christ; but I must first be certain of the spirit and the perseverance of each one. I therefore beg you to apply yourselves for the present to your studies; for you cannot set out without having finished your studies and having undergone an examination at Rome. You should, above all, become closely united to Jesus Christ. He that goes among the heathen without having provided himself with the love for Jesus Christ and with the desire to suffer, runs great risk of losing the faith and his own soul.

Those that persevere in these dispositions will do well to renew their request from time to time, say, every nine or ten months. In the meantime become closely attached to Jesus Christ, and pray to him every day that he may make you worthy of so great a grace.

Pay attention, my dear Brethren: Leo rugiens circuit, quærens quem devoret. [The devil as a roaring lion walketh about, seeking whom he may devour.—I Peter, v. 8.] You see that Frater [Maturazzo] [17099] is already out of the Congregation. In a short time God has driven away two that a short time ago were among you. Be on your guard against faults; for the devil acts in the following manner: At first he lets us commit faults, and then he causes us to lose our vocation. Be convinced that God wishes to have in the Congregation only those that have a true desire to sanctify themselves; as for the imperfect, sooner or later he will find means of expelling them.

I therefore beg each one of you to ask every day especially for the grace of perseverance in your vocation; by neglecting this many have lost their vocation. Let us always tremble and pray; he that does not tremble and does not continually pray cannot persevere.

Let us not count upon the spiritual fervor that we may experience; for if afterwards there comes over us rough and stormy weather, all the resolutions that we have made will disappear; and if God does not aid us, we are lost. Always sustain yourself by prayers, and ask without ceasing our Lord to help you to die in the Congregation.

I love each one of you as much as I love myself or rather I should say, more than I love myself; yet when I see any one no longer loving the Congregation, I am forced in spite of the pain that such a duty gives me to dismiss him even if he were my own brother. I bless you, and I remain, etc.

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] Please tell Fathers Pentimalli and Buonassisi to call on me one of these days as I wish to be informed of certain matters.

Another answer to the letters of the students.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 11, 1758.

I am gladdened and am consoled by the request made to me of going among the unbelievers. The going among these unfortunate beings should always depend on obedience, since I cannot send all those that have applied to me. It will however be necessary that the Lord should make known to me who is truly called to do this work, and who is not. . . . . .

Letter 307

TO THE NOVICES AT ILICETO

He urges them to render themselves worthy of one day going among the heathen.

[August 1758.]

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

My dear Children: Yes, if you always manifest to me by proofs that you really have what is necessary in order to go to evangelize the heathen, there will be no difficulty in sending you.

But these proofs are not seen in the contempt that we meet with purposely, but in the contempt which is patiently borne when occasions suddenly arise. The contempt voluntarily sought after, or when one knows that it is purposely given, will cause but little pain.

And so pay attention that from this day forward no one should say to you: Are you one of those that wish to go to Japan? Every day, especially at Communion, pray to Jesus Christ for me, and I say this to all the novices as a matter of obedience. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO THE FATHERS AND BROTHERS OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER

He inculcates upon them the observance of various points of the Rule.

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

NOCERA, August 13, 1758.

My dear Fathers and Brothers: I again recommend to all the observance of the Rule, and especially of obedience in regard to which I learn that many are delinquents.

Endeavor to have always before your eyes the happy death of so many of our departed brethren, young men as well as Fathers'; and on the other hand, consider the unhappiness of so many still alive, who live, or rather who drag a weary existence outside of the Congregation; and if someone among them far from deploring their condition, congratulates himself, he is only still more deserving of compassion and of tears. Let us, therefore, be on our guard, because a repetition of the faults of which they have made no account has been the cause of their ruin and has made them lose their vocation. This is the reason why I here recall several things that I have already spoken of and published, and that will be of service to the new-comers.

In the first place, I will never give, and I cannot in conscience give a dispensation from the vows to him that asks it without a necessary and just cause; but it is not the business of the subject to judge of this necessity and of this justice; for when he is under the influence of passion, it is not he, but his passion that will judge. Therefore, I renew the formal prohibition, under pain of grave sin, that no one leave the Congregation without my permission. If anyone from the other houses wishes to call on me, let him ask permission of the local Superior; if he cannot obtain permission, let him write to me, and let him not leave the house without my express permission. This command I also give under obedience, but not under formal obedience; only it should be known that he that acts contrary to it will be subjected to a penance.

In case anyone without a just cause asks for a dispensation to leave the Congregation, I renew the order already given; namely, one should first endeavor to quiet him who is thus agitated by temptation; and if after that he does not wish to be satisfied, let him be kept in strict seclusion for a month, with three days of fast on bread and water every week. Moreover, let each one know that if anyone without just cause, through caprice or passion should ask a dispensation from his vows, by that very act he renders himself unworthy of remaining in the Congregation, and can be justly expelled from it even against his will.

You know the case of the Brother who, having gone away without permission several months ago, continues to live at enmity with God, with a sacrilege on his soul, without finding any one to absolve him. His example should make all those tremble that still have a fear of sin. Again, when the temptation comes, communicate it at once to those who you know are able to help you. Understand well, that the temptation against our vocation is for each one of us the most hurtful that the devil can offer, because of its sad consequences. Therefore, my Brethren, let each one of you, every day, while visiting the Blessed Sacrament and the Blessed Virgin, ask in a special manner for perseverance in your vocation. I advise each one in particular not to trust his own good resolutions or feelings. When passion comes, light is lost, and everything seems changed. To speak the truth, I have seen enough in others to make me tremble for all of you.

All, and especially the young members, should know that it is a grave fault to ask in case of sickness the permission to go home to breathe the native air. General experience teaches us that when one lives in Community and according to regular observance, the air of one's native country and of the paternal home is an air that is pestilential to the interior spirit and to one's vocation. For this reason let each one know that in cases where a change of air has been ordered by the physicians, the Superiors, according as they think best, shall send him to one of the houses of the Congregation situated in another place, and let all henceforth renounce the idea of even going elsewhere, because experience has shown what temptations may be introduced by such indulgences.

I would remind all that it is not permitted to go to the houses of seculars, and still less of relatives without a just cause and an express permission. Such is the rule, and I wish this rule to be observed with even more rigor than other rules. Only in case of the mortal illness of a father or a mother the Rule permits a visit. But there have been several who in similar cases have sent word to their dying parents that their presence and their care were not necessary, and would only serve to increase their sufferings, and that they would recommend them to God where they were. They have abstained from going, and I have been greatly edified by their conduct. It is certain that on such occasion: they have rendered themselves very agreeable to God by the example that they have given to others, as well as by the mortification that they have practised.

I recommend again to all, to Fathers, young men, and Brothers, obedience to any one that may be the Superior of a house, even to him whose functions give him for the moment a right to command, and were he even the least of the brethren of the Congregation. It is on such occasions that we see who is truly obedient. I am not edified so much by the obedience given to me, as by that shown to local Rectors, Prefects, Ministers, and other officials that preside over the work of which they have charge. Faults are committed against obedience. I trust that for the future, with God's help, certain things of this kind that give me great pain will not occur again. Obedience is the only thing that can preserve the Congregation, since it is that which inspires fervor; but obedience, I repeat, is to be paid him who may hold the place of Superior, otherwise it will be all over with the Congregation. All other faults can be more easily pardoned than the faults of disobedience.

The faults against poverty are not less serious. Hence I recommend to all the local Superiors, present and future, that when anything is given through friendship to a member of the Congregation, such as a snuff-box , a skull-cap, handkerchiefs, stockings, and such like things, they should not let him use them, but should it be necessary they should give him something else of the same kind. This precaution is necessary in order to maintain the spirit of poverty in its purity; otherwise many inconveniences would result therefrom, and a door would be opened to the destruction of poverty, and poverty is another virtue that preserves the spirit of the Congregation. As to the garments, habits, simars, and cloaks, when they are old and torn, let the Superiors be careful to have them mended as long as they are worth being mended. The Congregation is to be pitied if the subjects are ashamed to appear in patched garments. I hope that we may not have to deplore a like misfortune.

As to what concerns myself, I again say, let all write freely to me without fear of importuning me or hindering the publication of my books. As Superior I am obliged to listen to the humblest Brother of the Congregation, and to read the letters that are addressed to me; this I am obliged to do, but I am not obliged to publish books. I can only employ myself in this way when I have spare time in the evening, after having listened to all that wished to speak to me and after having answered all the letters that have been addressed to me. If anyone, notwithstanding, abstains from speaking or writing to me concerning his own welfare or the welfare of the Congregation I make this a case of conscience, and will ask an account of it from him on the day of judgment. I protest with regard to this that if I were actually on my death-bed, I should have nothing to reproach myself on this score. When it happens that any one writes to me or comes to speak to me on things that are of interest to himself or the Congregation, I lay aside everything. I do not write with my own hand, because ever since my late illness the weakness of my head hinders me from writing; and when a religious wishes his name to remain secret I so manage that it is not known even to him that writes for me; for when it is necessary I address it myself; I force myself to write the whole letter at intervals with my own hand.

Let everyone remove from his mind the impression that I manifest the secrets that have been confided to me either orally or in writing. I am very careful what I say, and I tear up the letters. This fear often arises, for example, from the fact that when I correct anyone or do anything that displeases a subject, the circumstances are easily combined in order to conjecture who it was that has written or spoken to me, and at times it is rightly conjectured. Then the complaint is made that I reveal secrets. However, let no one pretend that I am obliged to keep a thing secret so that it may not injure him that writes or speaks to me. To complain that I tell others certain things that do not require secrecy, is ridiculous. If however anyone desires that I should keep a thing secret that of itself requires no secrecy, let him tell me so expressly, and I will comply with his wish.

In general, I recommend to you a few things, namely:

1. Let the Mass be said with gravity; for I hear that many say it without observing order and decorum in the ceremonies, or say it too precipitately. We preach to others; and then. . . . .

2. As to the Fathers that have travelling bags that may be locked, they should, when at home, always leave them open, so that the Superiors may examine them as often as they wish; otherwise they may keep them locked.

3. No one should take away the writings of another without the express permission of the Superior. On this subject I have heard many complaints on the part of some who have lost their writings.

4. When a punishment is inflicted on the subjects by the Rector Major or other Superiors, let no one endeavor to find out by captious questions who gave information to the Superiors of any disorder or any fault by addressing those who he suspects have given the information; for this would injure the common good, since some fearing that they would not be able to know how to answer when questioned, would abstain from telling the Superiors what they should tell. This especially holds good for those subjects that have been appointed Zelators, or those that are suspected of being secret inspectors.

5. I recommend anew, that all should hand over uncertain restitutions to the Superior of the mission, and to the Superior of the house when they are at home.

6. It is also again recommended not to make known our affairs to strangers who through the fault of the subjects are better informed than we ourselves. Even disedifying things are communicated to them, and they afterwards spread them everywhere.

7. Finally, I again remind you that when any of the Fathers go to preach novenas, triduos, special exercises, etc., or when they have to discharge any similar duty, they should observe the same regulations as to food as when they are on missions. I recommend this particularly to the one that is chosen Superior, because he must render an account, and on him the penance will be imposed.

I embrace you all in Jesus Christ. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 309

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE, RECTOR AT CAPOSELE

He exhorts him to moderate his labors, and gives him advice in regard to an important matter.

Live Jesus, Mary, Michael, and Joseph!

NOCERA, September 24, 1758.

I am obliged for just reasons to confirm you in your office of Rector for the coming three years; but I do not wish you to undergo excessive fatigue as you have been doing. I say no more for the present. You must come here after we find out the result of the illness of the archbishop and after you have regulated your affairs conformably to my instructions. We shall then speak of several things, and in particular of the moderation with which you should apply to your work; for your health cannot endure so great fatigue.

We shall speak together among other things about Brother Matteo. In fact he or Brother Pasquale is to come here; but I think Brother Matteo would be preferable, since Brother Pasquale has of old ruined his health in this house. If then you could send Brother Matteo beforehand, it would be well.

I expect you and Father Apice, as soon as you can set out. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

As for the affair of Postulation,[17100] I have maturely reflected on it, and this is my advice. Not only would it be necessary to wait for the death of the archbishop, but we should have to proceed in everything with great secrecy; for if the proposal is not accepted the new archbishop will always feel incensed against us for having interested ourselves in favor of another. The strictest secrecy should be kept. Perhaps it would be better to abstain from all intervention. For postulations are, I think useless. Live Jesus and Mary!

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 310

TO THE RECTORS, MINISTERS, PREFECTS AND SUPERIORS OF THE MISSIONS

Various recommendations.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, September 30, 1758.

1. I recommend that the Prefects of the Brothers should be appointed, and when one is wanting another should be substituted.

2. I recommend that according to the Constitution a consultation should be held, in conformity with the Rule, as to the necessary expenses. In view of the actual poverty and embarrassed circumstances, when the expenses go beyond the sum of forty ducats,[17101] I request the Superiors to give me notice beforehand, since many useless expenses have been incurred in certain houses. This, however, is not understood in regard to the provision that is to be made for subsistence. If the Consultors, who have been appointed are not at home at the time when the consultation is to take place, there shall be called in those Fathers of the house that are the oldest in the order of their entrance into the Congregation.

3. All the shirts shall bear the mark of the house, so that on missions there may not be any confusion on this account; however, one should not be so uncharitable as to refuse the use of shirts to others that may stand in need of them.

4. I recommend in general to all Superiors that they should avoid all blameworthy partiality.

5. The Minister shall not give to the subjects of the Congregation anything to eat outside of the house, excepting fruit that is owned by the Congregation.

6. I earnestly recommend that in regard to food you treat well the strangers that make the exercises; for I hear that for some time there have been great complaints in regard to this matter. On account of a little expense one endangers the great good that the exercises produce.

7. I recommend to the Rectors to remind their subjects that every month they should make a manifestation of conscience. They should also have bread made twice a week, if possible.

(What follows should be read only to the Fathers, and should not be communicated to the young men.)

To you especially, my dear Fathers, I recommend the practice of holy obedience, not so much towards me as towards the Superiors of the houses and of the missions. On this point I experienced last year many annoyances; I do not enter into particulars, because I hope that these annoyances will no more be given. It appears that at present the Superiors must repeat an order a thousand times in order to be obeyed; and even then on the part of some subjects there are so many excuses, so many objections that, finally, the Superiors are obliged in order not to trouble them to relieve them of obedience. I repeat, I do not wish for good reasons to reprove in particular any one of those who I know has committed faults; but I remember and will remember what I know.

Hence I recommend above all to the Fathers that they should obey, especially on missions, any subject, whoever he may be, that takes the place of the Superior. We have at present so many young men full of talent and piety, who can do a great deal of good. About twenty-five of them have asked me to go among the heathen, and they have asked me so courageously and fervently that I have been filled with joy. But when they go out to work in the ministry and continually see objections, excuses and the unwillingness of the old Fathers to obey the Superiors, they will do the same thing; and then how will the Congregation get on?

I also recommend that on missions one should not be too free with the people of the place. We should act towards them with the greatest politeness, but we should never be wanting in gravity, so that they may learn and preserve towards us the veneration that is due to men who are holy and without blemish; this being necessary for their edification. Otherwise, if we unbosom ourselves in conversing with them, in talking about things that do not concern the soul, they will discover in us a thousand defects, and will by no means be edified. This is a thing that has already been spoken of more than once; but I regret that faults are always committed in this matter. If anyone should not correct himself on this point, I shall be obliged to keep him away from the missions. Let no one, I beg you, meddle with the affairs that do not concern the conscience of the people that attend the mission. As to certain things that might cause some disorder or inconvenience, let them never be done without counsel and without obedience. Non omnia expediunt, [all things are not expedient].

I recommend moreover that the sermon on prayer should never be omitted, and in case this cannot be done, let the subject be treated at length in the last discourse at the close.

It must be remarked, as is said in the Constitution, that on the missions it is not allowed to partake of dainties no matter in what manner they may have been received.

Letter 311

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

Details relative to pecuniary matters and to the purchase of books.

[November 1758.]

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

I have received twenty-one ducats, that is seventeen and a half for Tournely, twenty carlini for the other books, and fifteen carlini for the Novenas.

As for the Novenas, I send twelve of them. Of these twelve, six are paid with the fifteen carlini, and for the six others, if you succeed in selling them, keep the money for me, for I am overwhelmed with debt.

As for the copies of Tournely, we had already written to Venice for the ten copies, because there are none here; but ten copies cost at least twenty-four or twenty-five ducats; it will therefore be necessary that you have an understanding with Father Apice, because I cannot now remit even three carlini to pay the debt that I owe.

I was also expecting you here to speak to you about the manner in which you might spend the money that has been bequeathed;[17102] but now I hear from a letter written by Father Ferrara that you have a debt of three hundred and fifty ducats. Now there is no remedy; this money must be paid. The bedsteads must also be made, and the rest of the money will be spent on the building; hence it is not necessary for you to come here about this matter, because I did not know anything about the debt of three hundred and fifty, ducats. However, that the order given in the letter may be observed, inform me in what way you intend to spend the rest of the money, after having deducted that debt and the expenses for the bedsteads. I say only this to you: if even I should need to borrow fifty ducats to pay off a certain debt, I shall send you word; but I hope to remedy this in another way.

Those copies of the Moral Theology, bound in two volumes, which I have sent you, are worth twenty-six carlini; but I shall be satisfied with twenty-five, and even with twenty.

I have made a mistake: those copies of the Moral Theology are still here; I will, therefore, send them to you on Saturday through the carriers of Teora; when they reach you pay the freight and I will settle with you when I write.

As for the young man from Avigliano,[17103] it is not necessary to have him come here; you may send him at once to Iliceto, since he has been already received. Send with him twenty-five ducats, and tell the Superior of Iliceto expressly from me that without interpretations he should immediately have some new clothes made for him, namely, a cassock, a simar and a cloak.

Yes, I will write to Father Margotta; but I hear that he is now prevented on account of the money that has to be collected from Gessari for Grazioli. I shall tell him to hurry. I bless your Reverence and all.

Do not forget to have copied for me the treatise on Sacred Scripture by Genovese, which I mentioned to you.

I send the image of the crucifix with that of the Madonna for Frater de Iacobis, the other pictures of the Madonna are for the other students. Tell this Frater that in regard to the other thing about which he writes to me I have heard nothing, and therefore I do not write specially to him. I have none of the little rosaries that are carried in the hand.

A copy of Duplessis[17104] I have tried to procure at Naples, but I have not succeeded. I would therefore wish you to endeavor to obtain it from the Frenchmen.[17105]

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] In regard to Frater Nigro I must here add that I will not have him take any Orders, unless he makes an assignment of his property, because I do not wish the Congregation to be disquieted.[17106]

Letter 312

TO THE SAME

He speaks of the utility of having critical spirits in the Community, of his poverty, and of some other things.

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

NOCERA, November 22, 1758.

I never appointed Fr. de Iacobis I never dreamed of appointing him, nor do I intend to do so. But I say that I could have appointed him, and in case I had appointed him I should not have recognized you in the remarks that you have sent to me.[17107] Moreover, to none of the subjects can it be forbidden to write to me. As to the visiting the rooms, I never gave permission, nor do I know who gave it. And the affair about the Bambino [Infant Jesus] has also displeased me.

Besides, speaking in general, I must say that these critical spirits, as long as they do not go too far and do not assume an authority that they have not, are very useful to the Community, because they serve to keep everyone on his guard. This is exactly the case of Father Ferrara who by his censures is very little loved by others, but, to speak the truth, he greatly assists me in maintaining regular observance. Now what is to be done? In Communities one must swallow these bitter pills, but omnia cooperantur in bonum [All things work together unto good—Rom. viii. 28.]

This evening I dismissed from the Congregation Father Barberio[17108] not on account of grave faults, but for just reasons.

Let us now come to another pill. Here on account of the litigation that is going on with that blessed priest of Calvanico, we shall have to come to some agreement, so as to free ourselves at least from vexation; and I fear that there will be no other way of obtaining money. Hence I beg you to lay aside for this purpose one hundred ducats. I do not wish to say that the house is to lose thereby, but assistance must be given to me, and afterwards I shall have you re-imbursed.

Tell Frater [D. Giovanni] Lauria that I have received his letter; that I have no more to say at present; when the time comes we shall speak about the matter.

Tell Frater Nigro to drive away all fear. He has made the vows and has been accepted. How foolish is this fear of being dismissed! As regards other things let them be settled by the Prefect, and in default of the Prefect by your Reverence.

I have written in the meantime a reprimand for Frater de Iacobis. Indeed, my dear Gasparo, you will have to bear these contradictions in every Community, even if you were a St. Francis. How many of them have I to bear! How many anonymous letters containing reproaches and insults!

Moreover, I must inform you that Don Silvestro, a nephew of Abate Ciceri[17109] is going to the seminary, at our expense, and money is required. Every house shall pay its share; at present send ten ducats. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

BROTHER ALFONSO.

Letter 313

TO THE SAME

Various recommendations relative to the Community at Caposele.

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

NOCERA, December 12, 1758.

As regards the missions, your presence is more necessary at home than on the missions; hence govern yourself accordingly, but under present circumstances the less you have to go out, the better I shall be pleased.

As for Father [D. Ignazio] Fiore if he is not yet twenty-nine years of age, I cannot grant him permission to hear the confessions of women.—But you will say why can others do so? etc.—But this would take too long, and so it is not necessary to speak of it.

In reference to the quartan fever with which Father [Domenico] Caputo is afflicted, try to procure the recipe from Don Domenico Antonio Cappuccio; the medicine consists of brandy and chincona bark; it is a great remedy and cured Father Landi at once; but if I mistake not, ten paroxysms of fever have to be gone through.

I have received the ten ducats. Here we are engaged in litigations and greatly involved. The Lord is chastising us.

Father Fiore will likely have to return to Ciorani to teach the humanities; although I should wish to have him stay there as little as possible.—And as Father Margotta says, it will not be improbable that your Reverence will have to go to give the exercises to the clergy of Cava two weeks before Septuagesima Sunday, the exercises to begin on Tuesday. I bless all.

The Brother tailor has not yet come, and here we have been expecting him.

Father Brescia's work, which Father Leo at your house procured for himself saying that he would procure it at the expense of Caposele, costs five carlini and a half; you will please therefore send the money.

In regard to Frater Nigro, you have sent me no answer. What have you concluded to do? I answer: if he does not assign his entire portion to his relatives, I cannot have him ordained at Benevento. He must give up all; so that those interested can no longer lay claim to anything. See that this affair be concluded as soon as possible.

I hear that you have procured the works of St. Bona-venture which will perhaps cost more than twenty ducats. Have patience; henceforth when the expenses for books are considerable, I wish to be informed about the matter; so I have written to the other houses.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 314

TO D. GIOVANNI BATTISTA GARGANO, A STUDENT OF THE CONGREGATION

Various points in regard to spiritual direction.

Live Jesus and Mary!

NOCERA, December 13, 1758.

In respect to remaining up in the evening, if I mistake not, I have already written to you my way of thinking about the matter, namely, it matters little that you have to study; I wish you to go to bed like the rest.

In regard to fasting, if there is question of fasting on bread and water, I permit it only once a week; you may on another day restrict yourself to bread and soup [minestra].

As for direction, it is true that the use of discipline and little chains belongs also to the interior, but as these are things that may afterwards be indirectly found out by the Prefect, it is also necessary to have his permission for using them. I bless you.

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] I cannot grant the request that you make, because it is against the Rule, and because it would establish a precedent, so that if I grant it to you, I should afterwards have to grant it to others.

The Rule requires that the students should be directed by the Prefect. . . . . It is my wish that all the students should submit to his direction; for I hold for certain that God gives the Prefect special assistance because we keep the Rule; even if we feel repugnance in keeping it. God favors not what is agreeable to us, but what is done out of obedience.

TO AN ECCLESIASTIC

He congratulates him on his promotion to a dignity.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, January 9, 1759.

Very Reverend and Dear Sir: It was to me not a wonderful, not an unexpected thing, to hear from you that the election has turned out in your favor, because I foretold this not less on account of the merit acquired by the innumerable good qualities that adorn your mind, as on account of the very high opinion and good will that everyone entertained about you in this city. Hence the Canons have acted in accordance with your merits.

I rejoice with you, Very Reverend Sir, and in the meantime hope that the Lord will assist you and help you to gain merits for eternity.

Kissing your hand, I remain most respectfully,

Your very humble and very devoted servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 316

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA

Various communications.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, January 9, 1759.

Since Frater Buonopane still remembers his philosophy, I say yes, and it would be well to send him to Ciorani,[17110] so that he may at least refresh his memory. Write to Father Blasucci to arrange the matter.

In regard to Father [D. Alessandro] de Meo, I have already written to Father Caione, who holds a different opinion; it is therefore necessary to have patience. Father Caione will have to come himself in a few days to arrange definitely the mission at Trani. I do not know whether the date can be fixed before the first day of Lent.

I rejoice that Santorelli is doing well; but we are forced to send him to some monastery to find out his inclination while the "Writer" at Naples is creating an uproar and threatens to have recourse to the king. With Mgr. Volpe [Bishop of Nocera] who has t he affair in hand we have been thinking of sending him to the monastery of Father Druisi which is under his direction at Solofra. A better monastery than this we cannot find. But there will certainly be many a struggle,[17111] because others sent by relatives will come for the purpose of finding out things and of tempting him. Hence let him prepare himself, because after a short time, when I shall send him word, he will have to set out.

Yes, I will send the package to Brother Francesco [Tartaglione at Naples].

As to the stipend of the Mass of Father Maione, what does Father Mazzini think, since after the month of May the students are to come to Caposele to study Moral Theology? The most that I have settled with Father Ferrara is that secretly one half [of the stipends] of the Masses be given to you and the other half to this place.

Perhaps about Lent Don Domenico Cacciatore will come to you to make a short novitiate of four or five months, because he has again been received on account of the many good signs that he has manifested to me.[17112] He is now on missions with our Fathers. I bless all. Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

I particularly recommend to you to send the enclosed letter to Monsignor d' Amato in Lacedogna, and to procure for me an answer. I wish to obtain a document from him; for the people of Caposele have prepared for us a fine lawsuit on account of the thousand ducats bequeathed to us by the archbishop.[17113] Live Jesus and Mary! I beg you to have the answer delivered as soon as possible in a safe way.

Of those books, on Death,[17114] send some to some friends at Foggia and at Melfi, so that they may at least examine them.

I am sending more copies, now that there is an opportunity, so that you may have them sold during Lent when the spiritual exercises are given at the house at Iliceto. And when you have an opportunity, send a copy to Corato.[17115] Live Jesus and Mary!

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] I send the little books on Death, and Counsels [on religious Vocation], in order that when an occasion offers, you may spread them through the countries of the Puglia; place them therefore on your table.

Whoever examines well this little work on Death will certainly purchase it.

Letter 317

TO SIGNOR PIETRO DE ROBERTIS, AT NAPLES

He announces to him a visit and thanks him for an important service.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph!

NOCERA, February 23, 1759.

Dear Sir: In compliance with your request I long ago charged Father Celestino [de Robertis] to inform you that he would go to see you at Naples immediately after the mission given at Bosco; but the day before yesterday, at the moment when I was leaving Nola I learned that he had not yet paid the visit.

I have reprimanded him for his want of regard for which he rendered me responsible to you, and to-day I take this occasion to assure you that he will call upon you the second week of Lent.

I must also offer you my most sincere thanks for your memorial relative to our process; this will take me to Naples the first week of Lent, and I will not fail to go myself to consult you once more in regard to this affair. Baron Sarnelli pretends to have the wind in his favor and his little vessel is vigorously managed by him; but I have found new reasons that militate in our favor. We shall examine them together, please God.

I remain most cordially, my dear Sir,

Your very devoted and very grateful servant,

Letter 318

TO A FATHER OF HIS CONGREGATION

Recommendation of a person tormented by interior trials.—He blames him very much for entertaining an opinion contrary to the infallibility of the Pope.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, February 27, [1759?]

In reference to that beautiful property, I do not wish my conscience to be charged. . . . . In a word, deliver me from all scruple.

If you are going to give the retreat at N., remember that there lives there a good soul, I should say, a great soul, who is in the habit of writing to me. It is an afflicted soul who thinks that she hates God, and the like things. God conducts her by the way of the cross. Encourage her; if you think fit, do not allow her to be present at soul-stirring sermons. Persuade her, above all, not to omit the daily Communion that I have allowed her.

I love to think that you are not a disciple of Arnauld, as you are, I am told, already of Giovenino, who refuses to believe in the infallibility of the Pope, nisi consensus Ecclesiæ accedat [unless with the consent of the Church]; this, I confess has scandalized me. The French are known to do such a thing; but it is too much to hear that an Italian priest holds the definitions of the Pope to be fallible while Bellarmine, Bannez, and Suarez regard our opinion as almost an article of faith, Bellarmine saying that the contrary opinion videtur omnino erronea et hæresi proxima! [seems to be altogether erroneous and next to heresy!]

You see then what it is to be a probabiliorist: it is to hold as more probable opinions that are near heresy!

Enough of this. If you wish to hold this opinion, I beg you not to tell anyone that you hold it, otherwise some young man resting on your authority may also hold it to be probable.

I salute and embrace you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 319

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

He asks his aid in order to oblige a bishop.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, March 19, [1759?]

Mgr. di Melfi has written to me, begging me most earnestly to send a Father to give the spiritual exercises to dose whom he is to ordain on Holy Saturday.

I have written to him that this will be impossible, though I would write for a Father. I also write to your Reverence to ask whether you can give a Father of your house; but I write to you only for the purpose of saying that I have written.

See whether you can send Father Agostino. I should not like to displease the bishop, as he has written to me three times. Perhaps Father Strina would do better.

O God! what perplexity and what confusion during this year, and how many requests and how many are displeased! Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 320

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT ILICETO AND MASTER OF NOVICES

He speaks of the date to be fixed for an important mission.

(Read at the end.)

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

NOCERA, April 12, 1759.

These large missions about which we should confer oftener, should first be applied for and should have the time fixed, not once, but several times.

Yes, the first mission applied for the past winter was the mission at Ariano; but I answered that there was question of giving it at Easter, and I also said that if this mission could not be helped along in regard to the expenses, it could not be given.

Afterwards I had no other application, and not even a letter from the bishop; hence I thought that the mission would not be given, and I appointed other missions. Now all at once I hear that the mission is being given, and that the time fixed is immediately after Easter.

Now I cannot send you any help, because two other missions have been promised, and especially the mission at Mercato S. Severino, which is to be a large mission. At the most, I shall be able to send you help if the mission of Ariano begins on Saturday, not on the 21st, but on the 28th of this month.

Let this arrangement be made: You will begin the mission on the 28th, and during the mission of Ariano I will send you help.

If then you should think of beginning the mission after the said time, you will have again to inform me, so that I may arrange the matter. In the meantime you may finish one or two little missions so as not to lose time.

When the mission has begun at Ariano it will be well to begin, two or three days afterwards, the exercises for the nuns, as there are no more than two monasteries.

Let me know what Father Fiocchi has done in regard to Maffei, whether any agreement has been made.[17116]

We are again in conflict with Baron Sarnelli.[17117] In regard to the other affairs, Father Ferrara will write to you.

I bless you all.

In fifteen days you may send for the other books which I have promised on account of the clothing that was furnished. But let me know how many books you have received on my account.

After the mission Father Garzilli will go to Caposele, and Father Nittoli to Iliceto.

I bless you.

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] Having reflected more carefully on the matter, I think that in order not to lose the time that is to elapse before the 28th of this month it would be better for you to begin the mission, as you have written, on the 21st, Holy Saturday, because I will begin here a little mission on the Tuesday after Easter, so that when the latter is finished the Fathers may go to Ariano.

It is understood that I will send you among other Fathers [Stefano] Liguori and Father [Carlo] Gaiano, so that they may assist you in giving the exercises to the nuns or the priests. But you will have to wait for them, since they will not be able to join you before the Tuesday or Wednesday after the Sunday after Easter; this will be on the 24th or 25th.

Letter 321

TO SISTER MARIA GIOVANNA DELLA CROCE, IN THE MONASTERY AT CAMIGLIANO

Reasons for which the foundation at Villa degli Schiavi cannot be resumed.

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

NOCERA, May 25, 1759.

I have received your letter and the letter of the Princess of Colombrano. This lady, I see, would be most anxious to see us return to Villa, and I know that she is very pious.

But the affair is very difficult; since, in the first place, Villa has not a sufficient income for the support of a Community like ours, which counts no fewer than twelve priests, as we do not accept small convents.

In the beginning, it is true, we accepted this foundation; but the Congregation is at present in a different state, as it possesses already four houses.

Moreover, the greatest difficulty at present is to obtain the royal approbation. From all sides many foundations are asked of us, but God knows which of them will be accepted.

I should myself most willingly comply with the desire of the prince or rather as I have now left Naples and I am not well, I would have one of my companions to take my place, but at present it will not be possible.

Recommend me to Jesus Christ. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 322

TO FATHER CELESTINO DE ROBERTIS, AT SALERNO

He asks him to go to the mission at Agerola.

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

NOCERA, May 29, 1759.

The Fathers at Agerola have written to me that they do not know what to do, because through a mistake they find that they are now engaged in giving a large mission. Hence you need not now go to Perdifumo, but go to Amalfi and thence to Agerola.

If the sea happens to be too stormy so that it will not be possible for you to travel by sea, come here, because you may go overland through Gragnano; but I hope that the sea will be navigable as far as Amalfi; yet according to my opinion, this Tuesday evening, it will not be possible to pass over the gulf as far as Perdifumo. TO SISTER CARLOTTA FRAGGIANNI, IN THE MONASTERY AT SARNO

He accedes to her request.

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

NOCERA, June 9, 1759.

When Father Celestino [de Robertis] returns I will send him to you, but only for three days. Live Jesus and Mary!

I recommend myself to your prayers and I remain

Your very humble servant,

Letter 324

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA

Earnest request for prayers.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, June 14, 1759.

I am glad that the statement of the Brother is not true.

I am sorry that you are so unwell. Probably Father Ferrara with Father Corsano will arrive at your place to drink the waters of Monticchio.

Let the novices pray in a special manner to my intention for three evenings. One annoyance after another together with law-suits against the Congregation are coming upon us, and particularly do I fear that a great trial will befall us if God does not come to our assistance. And with [Baron Nicola] Sarnelli our troubles have begun.

Father Fiocchi remains here at Ciorani, but I will not fail to send him to Iliceto to talk to you in order to have an understanding with Maffei. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 325

TO CANON GIUSEPPE SPARANO, AT NAPLES

He declares himself ready to grant the requests of the Archbishop of Naples.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, September 7, 1759.

Since his Eminence [Cardinal Sersale] and your Reverence wish me to give some occupation to the young man Don Giuseppe, I have thought of keeping him here with me in this house at Nocera, since the young men that have finished scholastic philosophy are just now going through the course of Moral Theology.

I shall however send him to the house at Ciorani when the exercises are given there; and then I shall have him return to this place.

I have also received the order of his Eminence to give the exercises to the Pellegrini;[17118] I hope that I will, be able to do so; but we must ask God to give me the necessary help during that time, since as soon as winter sets in my troubles in the chest begin, and for this reason my stay at Naples will weigh heavily upon me at such a time, and the time of Lent may perhaps be more injurious to me.

However, I cannot oppose the wish of his Eminence and the honor that the gentlemen of the Congregation wish to confer upon me.

As for the book,[17119] we have arranged everything. It will be necessary for me to have certain pages re-printed; but we must have patience! Enough; I did not wish to yield at all, as the revisor desired me to do, and I did not insert a word that could redound to the injury of the Church.

Humbly kissing your hand, I remain,

Your very humble, devoted, and grateful servant,

Letter 326

TO MGR. ISIDORO SANCHEZ DE LUNA,[17120] ARCHBISHOP OF SALERNO

Request for faculties for all the missionaries of the Congregation.

[November 3, 1759]

Most Reverend and Dear Sir: Don Alfonso de Liguori, Rector Major of the Congregation of missionaries of the Most Holy Redeemer, suppliantly exposes to you that in view of the occupation of the priests of his Congregation who are always engaged now in the holy missions, now in every kind of exercises of piety during the whole course of the year, he obtained from your predecessor Mgr. Rossi of happy memory the general communication of all his faculties as to the administration of the sacrament of penance and the preaching of the divine word, without any limitation, not even of cases that require special mention, and without exception, not even of nuns, through the whole diocese of Salerno, together with the power of communicating these faculties to the subjects of his Congregation according to the dictates of prudence, in imitation of his predecessors since the time of Mgr. Capua of illustrious memory. In asking for these faculties the petitioner also takes into consideration that as the subjects of said Congregation are distributed among many houses, and by order of the Rector Major have frequently to pass from one house to the other, and as frequently the subjects of the different houses have to unite as is required on the occasions of missions, of retreats, and other exercises, which are ordinarily given by said Congregation, it would be impossible to accomplish all these works if they would always have to return to make requests for new faculties to be presented now by this one, now by that one.

The petitioner therefore asks your Grace for the communication of these the above-mentioned faculties, granting them in the aforesaid manner as is done by all the prelates in whose dioceses the Congregation labors, just as it has and always will be ready to serve your Grace in your diocese of Salerno and to obey your every command.

To the petition the archbishop thus answered:

Mindful of the well-known virtues, the exemplary conduct, the learning, discretion, and great prudence of the petitioner, we grant to the same, on the occasions of holy missions and exercises which he may give in our whole diocese, the power, whenever it may seem suitable to him, to communicate our faculties of reserved cases to any of his subjects to whom he may see fit to give them; these faculties being granted as long as it seems good to us.

SALERNO, from our archiepiscopal palace, November 3, 1759.

Letter 327

TO SISTER MARIA GIOVANNA SPARANO

He marks out for her a practical rule of conduct in regard to a particular case.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, November 26, 1759.

I answer your letter. I would do so in a more precise manner, but in order to do so I should have to put some questions to you. I therefore answer you in a general manner, according to the rules applicable to everyone, and I say that neither temptations nor bad inclinations are sins, but the consent averted to and desired is a sin.

Every time that you have not consented to a bad thought in a grave matter, even though you should have some inclination or pleasure to speak, you have not committed a mortal sin. It is true, you must avoid speaking through a natural inclination. In this kind of interviews you should direct your intention only to God and to your spiritual profit. While thus engaged in this conversation with a right intention it might happen to you while speaking that you feel a certain natural complacency. As long as you do not give consent in matters that are grave, you may be certain that you do not sin mortally; you are not even obliged to confess the circumstance. At all events it will be sufficient for you to say: I accuse myself of all the bad complacencies in matters not grave, without saying with whom; and in doubt whether your consent was deliberate, you need not confess it.

Do not therefore confess any more the past doubts which you mentioned to me, if you have not given consent, and a certain consent, in the matter of mortal sin.

But tremble, for I fear that this is the last appeal that God makes to you. Then when you see any natural inclination, use all possible circumspection in order to avoid every attachment. You are on "the cutting-edge of the knife:" either a saint, or in hell! But God wishes you to be a saint. Flee then with all your strength from natural attachments, and pray without ceasing while saying: Mercy, O Lord! Do not allow me ever to abandon Thee. To Thee only do I wish to give my heart, and to give it entirely.

If God gives you consolations in your prayer, be thankful to him; but do not seek these consolations. You will have to pass through many great trials; this is at least my opinion. In prayer you should repeat again and again the words: Mercy, O Lord! mercy, O Lord! Have also recourse to the Madonna. Go to Communion often, and as often as possible, for you need strength. Never omit to make a two hours' meditation, even though you should feel therein the agonies of death.

Father Mazzini is not here. He is giving a mission and will return, December 8.

Recommend me to Jesus Christ, and take courage. That you are in the grace of God; I have a firm belief; and I am morally convinced that in the case of which you speak, you have not committed any mortal sin; if you had committed a mortal sin, you would be certain of having done so. I believe, on the contrary, that God will give you the grace to fear mortal sin, and that he will give you the desire to love him. Therefore, take courage.

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

TO FATHER PASQUALE DE MATTEIS,[17121] OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS AT NAPLES

Grief of the saint on learning the trials of the Society.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, December 3, 1759.

Very Reverend and Dear Father: I received the information that you have sent me about the book, and I thank you for it.

In regard to the news from Portugal,[17122] I have always felt great sorrow on account of what has happened; all those to whom I have spoken were also greatly distressed. There were some that appeared to be glad; on the other hand, when I heard the fatal news I felt as if it concerned my own Congregation. I have been at least consoled to hear from your Reverence of the great constancy exhibited by those that are not professed; this is a sign that the spirit of God reigns in the Society.

I am, however, in hopes that the Lord is to derive from this storm something great that will redound to his glory and to the welfare of the Society. I know, moreover, that the Pope and many Cardinals who are around the Pope are greatly in favor of the Society.

I send you two copies of my little book about forbidden books;[17123] one of them you may keep, and the other you may put on the shelf of your library.

I am now engaged in a larger work which is divided into three parts, in which I treat at length of the exercises and instructions for priests.[17124] It is a work that has cost me much labor.

Next Lent I am to go to Naples to give the exercises to two Congregations, and then I shall kiss your hand and speak to you about many things. In the meantime, recommend me in your holy Mass, and believe me, dear Father,

Your very humble and devoted servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

PAGANI, December 6, [1759.]

Yes, Fratres Palumbo, Santorelli, and Mazzarelli[17125] may make their vows.

The young man from Bosco should be sent to Caposele to see whether the climate will afford him some relief.

The doctor's brother gives very bad example; let him know that he will be sent away.

As for Father [Mauro] Murante, fiat voluntas tua! [May thy will be done!] See whether it is necessary that he should have a change of climate, I feel sorry for you on account of the expense, but I console myself that the Rule and Constitutions are pushed forward.

I bless your Reverence and all.

Letter 330

TO THE SAME

He announces the arrival of two novices.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, December 9, 1759.

The priest, Canon of Montecorvino [D. Bartolomeo Corrado] will come.

I had refused him admission on account of his want of constancy; then, finally, after many petitions and lamentations on his part, I admitted him, but on condition that in regard to him there would be question of a novitiate of two or three years, and as long as I should think fit.

I write this that you may be informed of the matter. Besides, he has been here about two months, and has behaved very well.

After he has passed one year with you, let me know how he is getting on, and then we shall see what is to be done, but not before a whole year has elapsed.

Don Angelo Antonio [Grazioli] will also come. He made application to me to be received. I told him, and told him again many times, that he was welcome to remain in the novitiate or in another house, to come to the mission whenever he finished his studies; to remain as a guest, to make even the vow of perseverance and of poverty to his confessor; but to be received as a Father with the vows of the Congregation, he should not think of such a thing.—Now this is for your own information.

See that at the beginning of Lent, that is on Thursday or Friday after Ash-Wednesday, Father Strina comes here for certain exercises that have to be given to the nuns of Nocera. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 331

TO FATHER MAURO MURANTE, AT ILICETO

He forbids him to go to his family to be cured, and deplores his want of fervor.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 14, 1759.

My dear Don Mauro: I answer briefly your long letter, which has been a source of very great sorrow to me, because I read therein not so much about the infirmity of your body as about the infirmity of your soul by wishing a change of climate, and thereby living outside of our houses.

I also received a letter from your mother. She tells me to send you to Melfi. I answered her that this would not be possible, and that she should not urge the matter as I would never be turned away from the resolution taken in regard to our subjects, namely, that the sick should not remain outside of our houses.

In consequence of the disorders that have arisen from granting a permission such as you ask, I have taken a resolution from which no one will be able to dissuade me.

In the meantime, I am greatly afflicted because the desire of becoming well has made you lose your fervor,[17126] so that if you were to die now, you would not die as a saint, as I had hoped.

I ordered you to Iliceto because I saw that you were anxious to go there; besides, I had already been thinking that the air of this place was doing you no good. Here, by means of the baths, you have improved a little, and I hoped that afterwards you would continue to improve, since your disease needs a long time in order to be cured.

It is true, you end your letter by submitting yourself entirely to my will; but I see that you write in this manner only by way of ceremony, because you have clearly made known to me your wish. May God bless you, because I do not dare to bless you. Live Jesus and Mary!

I may well suppose that you had an understanding with your mother in regard to the letter that she wrote to me. May God forgive you! To tell the truth, I was amazed.

Believe me, your Reverence,

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

My dear Frater: In these things commanded by the Rule I cannot give a dispensation.

If every student wished to have his own particular confessor, the Rule would be overthrown. If I gave you a dispensation I would not be able to refuse it to others.

Let us do this: Ask counsel of Father Leo; but then continue to go to confession to the Prefect.

Encouragement to fervor.

[End of the year 1759.]

Live Jesus and Mary!

I have read your letter, and I say to you be cheerful. Perform the usual exercises, and it does not matter whether you perform them with tediousness and pain. It is sufficient that you perform them, practising them as they come, such as the exercises of Communions, etc., and do not be afraid. By means of the snow in winter grain becomes more productive.

Letter 334

TO MGR. ISIDORO SANCHEZ DE LUNA, ARCHBISHOP OF SALERNO

He asks him for faculties for reserved cases.

[January 22, 1760.]

Most Reverend and Dear Sir: Father D. Alfonso de Liguori of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer suppliantly exposes to your Grace that it frequently occurs both in regard to seculars as well as ecclesiastics in the spiritual exercises that are given several times a year in our house at Ciorani, in your diocese, that the Fathers of his Congregation hear the confessions of penitents guilty of sins to which is attached a censure in accordance with the reservation made by your Grace. He therefore begs you to deign to grant the faculty of absolving such sins in the manner and form as shall be pleasing to your Grace.

Moreover, as it is frequently necessary on the occasion of the aforesaid holy exercises to call for Fathers living in other houses to assist in hearing the confessions of those in retreat, he asks your Grace to grant to them the faculties to hear confessions and to absolve from the reserved cases, in the same manner that they have been granted to those Fathers that have received the list of faculties from your Grace.

To this petition the archbishop gave the following answer:

Having noted what has been exposed to us, we willingly grant to the Most Reverend Alfonso de Liguori, Rector Major of the Venerable Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, all power (revocable at our will) to absolve cases that are reserved to us with or without censure.

As for the Reverend Fathers, religious of the house at Ciorani, in our diocese, and approved by us to hear the confessions of persons of both sexes, we grant them the same powers, except however the following cases: the fourth, the sixth, the tenth, and the twelfth with censure.

The same rule applies to the Father confessors of other houses of the said Congregation approved by their Ordinaries: we grant them the faculty of absolving from the same cases, and moreover that of hearing the confessions of persons of both sexes in our diocese. All being revocable at our will.

Letter 335

TO A NUN

What one must do in order to love God.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 27, 1760.

I have just received your letter with the letter of Sister Mariangiola and of Sister Maria Ventura. Without asking me any particular question you all three ask me what you must do in order to love God.

As I am very busy and have hardly time to breathe, I answer all three of you briefly, and in a general way. To love God with one's whole heart one must do two things: first, one must empty one's heart; then, one must fill it.

The heart is emptied by detachment from the goods of this world, from relatives, from the parlor, and from every sensible satisfaction. The heart is filled by means of meditation, of Communions, and above all of prayer. Let us pray without ceasing: he that prays, will receive.

I recommend to you obedience to your director. Try also to receive Communion as often as possible: every day, if your director allows you; but it is not necessary to confess every day.

Recommend me to Jesus Christ; I will on my part pray to him for you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Letter 336

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA

Zeal of the saint for the practice of obedience.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, February 22, 1760.

I thought that your Reverence had not carefully read the letter in which I told you that Frater Pompilio should remain there, because the air of this place is injurious to him; meanwhile you have sent him in haste to us. But if your Reverence did not read the letter, then Brother Domenico deserves a severe penance, for he knew it was my express wish that the Frater should remain there. When he saw the Frater departing, he should have informed us. Be that as it may, the orders of the Superiors are to be obeyed without seeking or knowing the reason why.

To tell the truth, when I saw him coming against my express command, I was beside myself, and said that you had not perhaps read my letter. But it displeased me very much to hear that you had read it, had understood, and still had done the contrary, perhaps with the approval of others.

Let him [Frater Pompilio] return immediately and as some atonement [your Reverence] will pay the expenses of the journey. I give you all my blessing.

BROTHER ALFONSO,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] Send me without delay a list of your subjects.

Live Jesus and Mary! I wish your Reverence to give me a plain detailed account of Frater Pompilio's departure, and to tell me which Fathers counselled you to send him against my orders.

If we cast obedience to the winds, it is all over with us. Live Jesus and Mary!

I have already told you that I could not believe you had read the letter, and had then acted contrary to my orders. Frater Pompilio's assertion frightened me. Now I am calm again.

With regard to changing his place of abode, I beg you to remind me of the matter when I return to Nocera, as I am not in a condition to settle such things now.

Recommend me to Jesus Christ, for here [at Naples] as well as at Minervino, I have my hands full of trouble.

Letter 338

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT CAPOSELE

He asks him to obtain information about two postulants.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, April 2, 1760.

I answer your letter in reference to the two priests. In regard to receiving them I have my doubts, since they are over thirty years of age, and as your Reverence writes, they understand only the Latin language, so that they would have to begin anew their studies for the purpose of hearing confessions and of preaching.

However, seeing the manner in which they write, which appears to me quite refined, knowing them to be gentlemen, and having heard of the mode in which they obtained their vocation, I will not refuse them admission. Still, I say this to your Reverence, privately, that I should like to have it made clear that in their native place they have not given scandal. Hence if your Reverence becomes sure of this, I will receive them, and they may be sent to Iliceto to begin their novitiate.

If however you are not certain that they did not lead a scandalous life, I beg you to write to the city to a faithful friend or to the Vicar-General Giannini, so that he may secretly give you notice of the conduct of said priests, begging him moreover to inform you in a prudent way whether he has not heard anything. I say this, because without knowing it we might get ourselves into some predicament.

Finally, I entrust this case to your prudence so that you may not receive into the Congregation anyone who has led a scandalous life. See that they bring with them to the novitiate twenty-five ducats, at least let them bring with them what they can give.[17129]

I bless all. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO SISTER MARIA GIOVANNA DELLA CROCE, IN THE MONASTERY AT CAMIGLIANO

Devotion to the Blessed Virgin a guarantee of a good death.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, April 30, 1760.

Sometimes I answer you, and my answer does not reach you.

As for that religious, tell her in my name not to be uneasy. Certainly it was God who wished to have it so. Had she entered she might have been a cause of temptation to her brother; besides, how could her entrance have prevented death from taking place?

After all, why does she fear for her brother, who was a good priest, and who died while invoking the Blessed Virgin! He that dies while invoking the Mother of God cannot be lost.

As to yourself, continue to practise obedience by bearing up under adversities, and be not uneasy. Furthermore, as long as we live we cannot be entirely without fear.

Always recommend me to Jesus Christ; this is what I also do for you. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

Your very humble servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

TO FATHER GIUSEPPE MELCHIONNA,[17130] AT ILICETO

The saint reproves him very gently for his indiscreet request.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, April 30, 1760.

Yes, my dear Father, tell Father Rector [Don Antonio Tannoia] from me that he should send you hither, to Nocera as quickly as possible.

When St. Anthony begged St. Paul the Hermit to open the door, saying that he would otherwise die outside, the latter answered, as he opened the door: That is a very fine way of asking with a threat. I must say the same to you. I sympathize with your condition. Are you dreaming? Who said that you were sent to Iliceto as a punishment?

How could the Brothers have blamed you, since all Iliceto knows about that affair of Brother Domenico?

You say: otherwise I will ask for a dispensation!—You will ask for it, but who will give it to you? O Master Giorgio, why lose so much time? Do not trouble yourself about the temptations; they are not sins. Have recourse to our Lady, and fear not.

Rest assured I shall not send your letter to Father Ferrara. But for charity's sake, do not show such anger again. If I did not know you well, I would give you a good whipping. Now, come quickly; I am waiting for you.

Let me tell you that subjects are changed from house to house, not only on account of their faults, but for any reason whatsoever. Are we then monks properly so-called? I answer: I pity you for it is not you who speak, it is your imagination. However, tell your imagination to speak with a little more discretion the next time.

I bless you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT CAPOSELE

Various counsels.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, May 2, 1760.

Know that I have forbidden Father N. to hear confessions on account of his strange notions.

I am troubled about Father X. at present; for, if I mistake not, Father A. told me that the former entertains some very extravagant ideas. If you should notice this, forbid him to hear confessions, and send him to me that I may get rid of my scruple.

When Father Apice returns from the missions, please send him to me; I need him for a very urgent affair; do not forget.

In future, do not take any Brothers [postulants] on trial in your house without my permission, for after they have been there for some time, we dislike to send them away; and so they live on us.[17131]

Father Leo wrote to me about the young man from Tito.[17132] When the Father returns, send for the young man and examine him thoroughly.

I bless you all. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 343

TO FATHER CELESTINO DE ROBERTIS

He names him Superior of a mission.—Various counsels.

[About May 16, 1760.]

Live Jesus and Mary!

I have destined you to be the Superior at the mission at Sava, and you are to preach the evening sermon.

I learn that at Giffoni more than one disagreement has taken place; but I know not between whom or on what account. I should be glad if you would send me particulars.

At present I recommend to you regular observance, but especially kindness to all. If there should be anyone that is stubborn it will be sufficient to let me know this after the mission.

The sermon should not last longer than an hour and a quarter, or sometimes at the most an hour and a half.

I bless your Reverence and all the others. Live Jesus and Mary!

As for the expense that you will incur, ask help of Ciorani. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO FATHER EMANUELE CALDARERA, OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE ORATORY

He declares his opinion about a foundation in Sicily.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, June 30, 1760.

Very Reverend and Dear Father: I have received your second most esteemed favor, and I feel grateful to you for it. But my dear Father, how could I wish to send subjects to that place when the Archbishop [of Palermo] has declared that he does not want us?—We must wait and procure, first of all, the consent of the archbishop. See whether there is any one there who could obtain it from him; but I already see that it will be difficult, since he is not popular with the Sicilians.[17133]

Signor Bonano, the bailiff, insists strongly that it will be first necessary to have a representation emanating from deputies of the kingdom.

What makes me afraid is that the Fathers of the Mission after having been called to Sicily by the bishop with so many pressing solicitations, should afterwards have to leave it.

Before, therefore, sending the Fathers I do not wish a certainty but at least some solid probability, that they will not have to return home, to our great shame; the more so, since the expenses of the journey are great, and the income of that place is at present small. I am not opposed to the matter, but I should prefer to have some security for the future.

I therefore inform you that just this week I received a letter from Mgr. [Andrea Lucchesi] of Girgenti in which he tells me first that he cannot send me the alms, in accordance with my request because his treasury is exhausted.

There is no doubt some mistake, someone having asked for alms in my name; since I have never dreamed of asking for such a thing.[17134]

Monsignor also writes to me that he has established a revenue of one hundred and fifty ounces,[17135] that he hopes soon to increase this amount to two hundred, that he wishes to have a house of missionaries for spiritual exercises and missions, near his palace, and that he desires our Congregation to be established there.

I have answered him that I was ready to send him subjects, but I begged him to have, if possible, the house outside of inhabited places, according to the poverty of our Institute, with cells of twelve palms and corridors of eight. I know not whether this affair will be successful, because the bishop is old, and he moves slowly.

Please inform me whether you know anything, and give me some instruction about this matter, and recommend me above all to Jesus Christ.

I am glad that the affair has been deferred to some other time. Who knows, perhaps matters may turn out better in the meantime.

Kissing your hand, I remain,

Your very humble and very devoted servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 345

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, RECTOR OF THE HOUSE AT ILICETO

Recommendations relative to various subjects and to studies in particular.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, July 18, 1760.

I have received Father Ferrara's letter.

Yes, my dear Father, let Father Polestra be sent to Caposele and then Frater [Don Amato] Ricca can stay a little longer. It displeases me also to send him. But please try to find out whether his father has the means of supporting him, for he has the dowry of his wife and the aid of his brother who promises to assist him; for this reason it would perhaps be well for Frater Ricca to write to his uncle.

Mgr. [Bernardo Onorati, Bishop] of Trevico writes to me and begs me to send Father Melchionna to the renewal at S. Nicola; but as I had already thought of sending him to another house, I am asking the Monsignor to excuse me if I send another Father. See, however, whether you can send two subjects to the places where missions have already been given.

Father [Celestino] de Robertis will probably go there to make himself a true Carthusian, as Father Villani and others say that it is not becoming for him to stay at Caposele where he has been so long a time and where he has had a large number of penitents. Let Father Ferrara tell you of the formal obedience which I gave to Father Celestino and of which I should like to hear something.

I bless you all.

I advise Father [Don Giovanni] Rizzi to exercise the students in arguing and in sustaining theses, and on the question of grace to adopt the system laid down in my little book on prayer;[17136] let him read carefully to them the third and the last chapter of the second part, and let him compose theses on this point.

If he wishes to have a number of copies for this purpose I will send them; but I believe there are already some copies there. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO FATHER PASQUALE DE MATTEIS, OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS AT NAPLES

Sentiments of the saint on account of the persecutions of the Society of Jesus.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, August 17, 1760.

Very Reverend and Dear Father: I am exceedingly thankful to you for the beautiful work of Father Natale.

I have still heard more bad news about Portugal. Poor kingdom! I pity it.

During the coming October I shall pay my respects to you at Naples. In the meantime I do not omit to dispute with those that are anxious to accept as true all that is said against the Jesuits. I at least say that even tyrants do not neglect to interrogate the guilty before condemning them; only the Jesuits are condemned without being heard.

I however console myself by saying that there is a God who will one day manifest the truth.

I recommend myself to your prayers; may we meet again in October. On the morning that I arrive you must know that I shall arrive with the thought of dining with you whether you wish me to do so or not. Live Jesus and Mary!

Believe me, dear Father,

Your very devoted and very grateful servant,

Letter 347

TO THE MOST REVEREND FATHER LORENZO RICCI, GENERAL OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS

He asks him to have someone to refute the calumnies spread against the Society of Jesus.

[The year 1760?]

Although I have not the good fortune of belonging to the Society, yet I love it as if I belonged to it; seeing it, therefore, so much accused by what Father Norbert[17137] relates in his book, which has been condemned. I have begged your subjects, especially those at the college at Naples, to make a reply so as to be able to refute the learned men of the present day, to whom it appears impossible to obtain the diploma of doctorship without speaking ill of the Jesuits.

Your Paternity must excuse me for saying so much. Your Society has been placed by God in his Church for the general welfare of Christianity; and we see the good that it has accomplished the past two centuries, and does still accomplish in the whole world through the labors of its members. Apostolic laborers need a good name, must have a good reputation. Now this good name the enemies are striving to take away by pointing to Father Norbert's book, which is to be found everywhere, and in which as your Paternity knows are related horrible facts. Now as no reply is given to disprove these facts, there exists this dilemma: if the facts are not true; why do not the Jesuits answer, and bring out the truth in a clear light? or if the facts are true, why do not the Superiors punish and condemn the evil-doers rather than defend them?

Other horrible imputations are added to the events that are said to have happened in Malabar and China; I feel like dying when I hear of such things.

Hence, for the honor of the Society and for the glory of God, I feel myself urged to send you this request in which I beg you to write to all those places to which it is necessary to write, and to give orders that those things should be explained so that the. Society may be cleared of these charges. Such efforts and such diligence on the part of the Society appear to me to be necessary. I hear that in France there exists a publication that was written against Father Norbert. Your Paternity should at least send for it, and have it printed either at Rome or at Naples.

Pardon me, I again beg you, for having written these things. I repeat: the affection that I bear towards the Society urges me to write to you. Though I am good for nothing, you may know that I am still the publisher of the praises of the Society.

Letter 348

TO FATHER GASPARO CAIONE

Recommendations regarding certain members of the Institute and various apostolic labors.

[November 1760.]

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

Father Corrado who is troubled with his stomach[17138] is going to your place. Let him go on all the missions which are given there; let him preach, give the instructions, etc. as the time has not yet come for him to hear confessions. The travelling and the attendant excitement may restore him to health; otherwise he is lost.

Father [Alessandro de] Meo has written to me that according to the opinion of medical authorities the air of Iliceto will hasten his death, as he is in very poor health. Whereupon I wrote to him to come to Pagani. Meanwhile let Father [Francesco de] Leo continue to teach theology; as for the missions, it will be impossible to send out two bands of missionaries, since we stand greatly in need of more subjects. Let your Reverence act as seems best to you.

Please let me know whether [Don Francesco Antonio] de Paolo has had two attacks of the gout, as Father de Meo wrote me. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

Do not forget to send the two subjects to Minervino, as I wrote to you some time ago, namely, Father Picone and another Father to give the exercises to the priests.

The Bishop [Mgr. Stefano Gennaro Spani] answered me and said that he is anxiously awaiting the Fathers. They must go before Christmas. If you could send three, I should feel highly pleased. It would be well if they could start during the novena of the Conception; if at all possible, let them start before that time, though according to the letter of the bishop he would like to have the exercises during the novena of Christmas. But I think it better to give them before that time, for during the novena the poor people are overburdened with work. I do not know exactly what to say; let your Reverence act as you see fit.

It would be good before setting out to send notice and to ask for horses; they will be given with the greatest pleasure. I bless all.

Father Blasucci has insisted several times that we should admit to religious profession Don Pasquale Giuliano, the doctor who studied at Ciorani and who is now a novice; he tells me that the latter has behaved very well all this time. Your Reverence will send your vote.[17139]

I received your letter concerning the accusation of three gentlemen of Acerenza. I am of your opinion; it is necessary to acquaint the Vicar-General Ganini with everything.

As for that mission, I wrote to Father Margotta that he should go to the Archbishop of Matera [Mgr. Serafino Filangeri] to tell him that I place the matter entirely in his hands; your Reverence will please act according to the answer of the archbishop which Father Margotta will send to you.

Pay no attention to the accusation. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 349

TO FATHER PASQUALE DE MATTEIS, OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS

Zeal of the saint in defence of the persecuted Society.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, November 21, 1760.

My dear Father: I send you those lax opinions which Father Concina[17140] holds. If they are not lax they do not at least appear to me to be sufficiently probable.

I have begun to read those books published at Venice in defence of the Jesuits, and I have given them to others to read and even to those that dislike the Jesuits; and all are astonished at the insolence of the author of the Reflections. Especially does Mgr. Borgia [Bishop of Cava] praise these books most highly.

During Lent I shall be with you to kiss your hand. In the meantime recommend me in your holy Mass. I remain,

Your very humble and very devoted servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] I shall have as many as possible to read those books, and I am also making a synopsis of the most remarkable things that they contain. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 350

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, AT ILICETO

He speaks to him of an important affair.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, December 12, 1760.

I have received the answer of the Duke of Andria[17141] in which he says that he has this foundation very much at heart; in fact he would be ready to give all, even his own blood, to bring it about. Hence you can write to Corato.

I have already written to him that we cannot come forward in this matter even if an income of four hundred ducats a year is assured. It is the archbishop[17142] and the commune that must make the first offer by asking not only for a foundation, but also they should see to it that the Fathers have a house to live in by giving them the superfluous revenues of a chapel and of other special funds. Enough for the present; I shall send you a sketch of the memorial which is to be presented by the archbishop and by the commune.

It is not true that I said I was thinking of the royal approbation. I said that if the question about the revenues were settled, I should know how to obtain this approbation.

It grieved me very much to hear that the house [at Iliceto] is in danger of falling, owing to the awkwardness in taking away one of the foundation walls. Fiat voluntas tua! [Thy will be done!]

I bless you all. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO SISTER MARIA ARCANGELA LIPPO[17143] IN THE MONASTERY OF THE SS. ROSARIO AT MONTICCHINO, DIOCESE OF MASSALUBRENSE

He complies with one of her wishes, but reproves her for insisting.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, December 22, 1760.

So, then, if Father Apice should die, would there be no more hope for your salvation?

Father Antonio and Father Chiesa[17144] have spoken to me of your desire, but it has not been possible for me to satisfy you; for Father Apice is at Gaeta whither the President of the Council has sent him. He there devotes all his care to the conservatory which you know shelters three hundred persons,[17145] if I mistake not; and he cannot absent himself. I have tried to recall him, but have not succeeded.

But, O my God! you have at your disposition, quite near you, so many confessors who can take away your scruples, and you are thinking only of Father Apice! If however the latter were not now at Gaeta, he would perhaps be at a mission at Conza, at a distance of several days' journey, and would then not be able to see you. It is the devil who in order to destroy you makes you so obstinate.

Yet I feel compassion for your soul and I send you from this place another of our subjects, Father Celestino de Robertis. He is a good Father and nowise inferior to Father Apice. Ask immediately the bishop for permission necessary for the Father to hear your confession, and at once tell the latter all your scruples.

This Father could be of great service to me at present; but for the good of your soul I make a sacrifice and send him to you. Profit by his presence, I entreat you, now while you have him; and if you do not wish to manifest your conscience to him after I have put myself to so great inconveniences to send him, you must no more ask me for Father Apice or any other Father of our Congregation; for I will no longer answer you.

Tell then all your troubles to this Father, and I beg you to get through with him as soon as possible, for he is needed here. And in future, never think of making this request either for him or for others. The journey to Massa is very inconvenient. I remain, etc. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

My companions are continually going about preaching in distant villages. If I should have to send them to remove the scruples of the religious in all the monasteries which they have had occasion to see, it would be a fine thing. Once that we have evangelized a place, we have no longer anything to do with it.

I say this in order that you may no more speak to me about Father Apice, whom it is utterly impossible for me to call away from Gaeta. Would to God I could have him come to assist me. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

TO THE BISHOPS

He forwards his little work entitled "The Mass and the Office that are Hurriedly Said."

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

December 27, 1760.

Right Reverend and Dear Sirs: Seeing the haste and the little account that the priests make of Jesus Christ in the holy Sacrifice of the Mass, I have been urged by some good friend to publish the little work on the Mass said in haste.

I have endeavored to make the treatise short, so that priests may be more easily induced to read it.

Hence I take the liberty of sending to your Lordships a few copies, that you may deign to glance at them, and at the same time may give them to the priests, your subjects, to read, so that they may understand the attention and the reverence due to so holy an action, which at the present day is ordinarily thought too little of by those that perform it.

Finally, there has been added a brief treatise on the manner of saying the divine Office with devotion and fruit.

And herewith offering to you my humble services, and kissing your hand, I remain, etc.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, 9, [January] 1761.

As Father Villani has not called you, it is a sign that you are not needed.

Father Meo wished to return immediately [to Caposele] to begin again his studies; but I have sent him on a mission. May God make Father Gallo a saint!

When you find it convenient, send me the money for the books.

With regard to the vineyard, I told Father Ferrara to write, in order that everything needful may be done. I bless you all.

Letter 354

TO SISTER CHIARA GAIANO,[17146] IN THE MONASTERY OF RAVELLO

He prescribes for her a rule of life.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, January 11, 1761.

It consoles me to hear that you are grateful to Jesus Christ for the grace that he has given to you, namely, the grace of vocation to the religious state. The Lord wishes that we should testify our gratitude for similar graces; for these are favors that he does not grant to everyone.

I recommend to you prayer. When you have free time give it entirely to Jesus Christ; and when you are in aridity, use a book. Be on your guard; a time will come when you will experience disgust, darkness, and perhaps temptations, regretting to have come to this monastery. Heed not this temptation, and say then: My Jesus, I have come to this place for Thee, and I wish to die here at Thy feet.

Preserve this letter, and read it when the devil wishes to trouble you. I tell you this because I have not always time to answer; this is the reason why. I write to you to-day at length, so that this letter may be of service to you in future.

Love therefore prayer; but when obedience imposes anything upon you, leave all and obey; by obedience you will give more pleasure to God.

Be also careful to accept cheerfully contempt and correction; offer them immediately to Jesus Christ, and make no reply.

If you commit a fault, make an act of love for God, and remain tranquil.

Flee from the parlor as you would from death. Always love to be either in the choir or in your cell, as long as obedience does not ordain otherwise; and in everything keep yourself united with the will of God, saying always: My God, it is Thee only that I desire; I desire nothing more; and all that Thou wishest, I also wish.

Always pray to Jesus Christ to give you his love, and ask without ceasing the same grace of Mary by saying to her: My Mother, help me that I may love Jesus Christ.

Communicate often, and after Communion recommend me to Jesus Christ; do this out of charity, and also because I have seconded your vocation.[17147]

Good-bye till we see each other in Paradise. I am, etc.

Letter 355

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, AT ILICETO

He expresses astonishment at not having received certain news.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 22, 1761.

There was an opportunity of sending me the manuscript for the Life of Frater Blasucci and for that of Father Don Cesare,[17148] by the man whom you sent to me; but I saw nothing, although I wrote to you several times; and again, you write me nothing about the new foundation at Corato, though I told you that the duke[17149] was highly delighted with the idea, and that he said he would even shed his blood for it.

What is the matter? Do you never take any letters from the post-office?

I am sending you six packages of the little books entitled Messa strapazzata [Mass hurriedly said] together with the letters [to bishops]. Your Reverence will please send them to the bishops as quickly as you find it convenient.

The two single copies are for you and your Community.

As for the foundation at Corato, they have to attend to it, for I cannot meddle with the affair.

Very Reverend and Dear Sir: I have received your very kind answer about the works of Father de Leonardis, but your kindness makes me importunate.

I beg you to get for me the book or directory of the present year 1761, in which are given the names of all the Cardinals, bishops, officials, Congregations, etc. It bears the title "Notizie per 1' anno."

Letter 359

TO THE BISHOPS

He sends them his Letter to a religious on the manner of preaching.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

[NOCERA], May 10, 1761.

Right Reverend and Dear Sirs: The compassion that I feel for so many miserable, uneducated persons who go to hear sermons, but derive but little profit from them, because the preachers speak in a lofty and florid style, and scorn to lower themselves to break to them the bread of the divine Word according to their comprehension, has impelled me to publish the present letter, which I have the honor of sending to your Lordships.

I beg you to read the letter first, and then to have it read by the priests of your dioceses who are engaged in preaching, and also to send it to the convents of religious men, recommending it to the Superiors to have it read by those that usually preach.

I also request you to have it read by the preachers who come to preach the sermons of Lent and of Advent. It is true, these already come with their sermons prepared, but who knows whether they may not correct themselves in future, thinking of the great account that has to be given to God by those who do not make themselves understood by the poor people?

For this end I send you several copies. And if you need more, you will oblige me if you write to Nocera, whence they will be sent to you immediately; for I had them printed for the purpose of distributing them.

Renewing my obligations to you, I recommend myself to your prayers. Humbly kissing your hands, I remain, etc. Live Jesus and Mary!

TO A PRIEST OF BISAQUINO.[17152]

He recommends to him to practise filial piety under very difficult circumstances.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA DE' PAGANI, May 19, 1761.

Reverend and Dear Sir: I have heard of your reasonable anxieties, and I feel sorry for you; but from afar counsels cannot be given to you: what can be given are general rules, because there are always circumstances that change cases. Therefore, to give you my opinion as I know it to be before God, I hold that in the case that you point out, you should by no means neglect to assist your father, who, the more troublesome he is, the greater will be the merit of your charity and filial piety.

We know by faith that God has commanded that our parents should be honored; no exception, whether they are good or bad; and we read in the Lives of so many saints having either heretical or infidel parents, to whom they were however most respectful and gave them temporal support.

Your Reverence should, therefore, do the will of God who ab æterno [from eternity] has destined you to be the son of such a father and who he knew had such a disposition.

St. Charles made a beautiful answer, quite worthy of himself, to one who was trying to dissuade him from using so much tolerance towards certain perverse people who, the more good that was done them, the worse they became. He said that the mercy of God is occupied with those that are miserable, but who is more miserable than the one who knows not his misery?

This remark I suggest to your Reverence. You already know that your father is reduced to such a state that he hardly distinguishes good fr om evil; you should therefore always assist him charitably and patiently so that you may either have more merit before God or that you may see that perhaps by your virtue you may overcome his obstinacy, thereby imitating the angel guardians who do not leave souls, although they see that they do not profit by their inspirations.

Be strong and full of courage; I remain,

Your very devoted and grateful servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

[P. S.] Live Jesus and Mary! In case, however, your father needs not your temporal assistance, and in case that he hinders you from God's service and from duly attending to the duties of the priesthood, you could leave him; yet you would be obliged to examine many other circumstances. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 361

TO FATHER GIOVANNI RIZZI, AT ILICETO

He asks him to aid a Father in his studies.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, May 21, 1761.

You did well to send Father Melaccio. When the matter admits of no delay, do not wait for my permission.

It displeases me very much to hear that the Rector [Father Tannoia] kept at home not only Father Picone, who had to remain on account of Canon Maffei, but also Father Michele. He has thus been the cause why an important mission has been a miserable failure. Yet the Rector has been asked in a special manner for this mission by Father Michele.

At the time of missions, it suffices if the Rector and one or at the most, two Fathers, remain at home; but when there is a necessity, one Father will suffice.

I am sending the little chains to the novices, and I give them a special blessing that God may make them saints, and that they may recommend me to Jesus Christ.

I am also sending five bundles of cord; it is all we have at present; I shall order some from Naples.

Father Corrado is going to your house, as the air here has not proved beneficial. I ask your Reverence to help him in the conferences on Moral Theology in some treatises which he has yet to study, especially, de Pœnitentia, de Matrimonio and de Censuris, and parts of de Contractibus. He is an able young man, but he has not gone through a course of Moral Theology. I beg your Reverence to do him this favor.

I bless you. Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 362

TO HIS BROTHER D. ERCOLE DE LIGUORI, AT NAPLES

He asks him for the payment of the interest on his life-annuity.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, May 24, 1761.

My dear Don Ercole: Have patience, because now as Brother Francesco writes, there are three payments due, which amount to sixty-seven ducats, and he says that he has received no more than seventeen ducats: at one time thirteen; and at another four; according to what he keeps marked down in his books there are fifty ducats still due.

God knows in what straits we are. We have to buy grain, and we know not how to do so. Hence I wish to have the interest of my life-annuity, for I cannot bear the idea of seeing these maturities accumulating, as they have done.

Have patience with me; try to settle our account, because I am in need.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Brother ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

TO SISTER CHIARA GAIANO, IN THE MONASTERY OF THE SSMA TRINITÀ AT RAVELLO

Rules of conduct amidst trials.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, May 28, 1761.

Don Carlo,[17153] your uncle, has gone to Naples. He asked my permission to go to see you; but I refused him, because it is forbidden by our Rule to visit relatives without necessity, and because this necessity does not exist in this case. You could not confess to your uncle; as for other things you may write to him. This is what I have told him and what I am also telling you.

In regard to the trials that you experience in the convent, I am more pleased than if you performed miracles and had ecstasies. Persecutions closely attach us to Jesus Christ, and help us to love God only.

Take care not to complain about them to any one, whoever he may be; and when you feel them, offer them to Jesus Christ without defending yourself.

If sometimes it happens that you are uneasy, do not then trouble yourself, for having been troubled; humble yourself, make an act of love for God, and recover your spirits. Pray every day to Jesus Christ to permit that you be despised as he himself has been for the love of you. What will the entrance into the convent help you, if you do not know how to suffer to be despised for the love of Jesus Christ?

This is the very great advantage that you have in being in the convent.

Devote yourself to bearing all for Jesus Christ, and recommend me in holy Communion. Live Jesus and Mary!

Letter 364

TO FATHER GIOVANNI RIZZI

He combats his scruples of conscience.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, July 5, [1761].

I learn that you are afflicted by scruples.

You are a prey to this torment because you do not wish to do what I have so many times recommended to you.

All those temptations, the consent, the pleasure, etc., that occur, as you say, you must not confess; no, no, no; and this I take upon my conscience. I assure you on the part of God, that these are only trials, not sins; no, no.

And what I tell you would be told to you not only by the probabilists, but even by all the probabiliorists and tutiorists, such as Concina, Sinnichio, Vendrochio, Fagnano. Only one that has lost his head would tell you the contrary.

Be therefore calm, and remain peaceful; you are always in the state of grace. In these suggestions you not only do not offend God, but you gain merits. Do not, therefore, confess these things, but say Mass with perfect liberty and every assurance. Do you not see that in acting otherwise, and in always being so disturbed you lose devotion, the spirit of prayer, and your peace of mind?

Recommend me to Jesus Christ. I bless you in a special manner. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

After the Roman edition.

Letter 365

TO A SUPERIOR OF THE CONGREGATION

Acceptance of a house in Sicily.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, August 3, 1761.

Father Margotta has been of the same opinion as your Reverence in regard to the establishment of a mission at Sicily.

It is true, at this time, there is no hope of obtaining the authorization to found a house. All that we can hope is that the affair will be connived at. I have resolved to send Father Blasucci as Superior with Fathers Apice and Caputo. Within twenty days, therefore, send me, Father Caputo, but without mentioning anything either to him or to the others, and this for good reasons.

You are at my disposal for Benevento which is more important than any other foundation.

I bless you all. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

After the Roman edition.

Letter 366

TO THE STUDENTS OF THE HOUSE AT CIORANI

Regulations made at the canonical visitation.

[The year 1761.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, Teresa!

To repair the disorders that have existed until now among our young men, and to preserve as far as possible the good spirit imbibed in the novitiate, I have thought it advisable to leave these regulations, which are taken for the most part from our Rules and from the Constitutions for our young men.

1. Students shall show all possible respect, veneration, and obedience as well to the Prefect as to the Lector; they shall neither defend nor excuse themselves in their presence. They shall be attentive to what they say with every mark of veneration; they shall not murmur among themselves.

2. Except at the time of recreation or when otherwise necessary, they shall not leave their rooms; nor is it permitted them to walk up and down in the corridors, to go to the class-room, to the choir, or to any other place outside of the studentate without the permission of the Prefect; especially during the time of siesta shall they remain in their rooms.

3. In going to the common acts, as for example going to or returning from class, they shall go two by two, with hands folded and eyes modestly cast down; and after the examination in the evening they shall return to the studentate in the same order.

4. During the time of general study they shall observe the strictest silence; they shall not be allowed to speak among themselves, but only to their Prefect and to their Lector.

5. They shall not be allowed to play ball, as it is a source of great distraction and, as we have already seen, scandalizes outsiders.

6. Only the Zelator shall be allowed to have a common key.

7. Let there be no disputes among them, but let one yield to the other. The Zelator shall pay special attention to this point.

8. The Rector as well as the Prefect shall not give permission too readily to students to speak to seculars; nor shall they allow outsiders, or even Fathers and Brothers to go into the recreation of the students. The students with their Prefect or with another Father assigned by the Rector, shall take their recreation apart from the others. Let not permission to eat outside of meal-time be too easily given even to eat fruit, if they go out very often. The recreations in the gardens shall not be given too often, as they cost a great deal. It can also be a source of scandal.

9. In assigning offices to the students, the Minister shall first come to an understanding with the Prefect.

10. The Rector shall not be too easy in giving permission, when there is question of speaking with seculars; he shall speak to the Prefect and shall assign to the students a companion who is to remain near when they speak to outsiders.

11. The Prefect shall not easily give permission to students to give up study, even though they are laboring under a slight indisposition; instead of allowing them to roam about, he shall make them attend class, if they cannot study.

12. When they go out, they shall always be accompanied by a Father in the absence of the Prefect.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

Rector Major.

Letter 367

TO FATHER GIOVANNI RIZZI, AT ILICETO

He exhorts him to despise his scruples and charges him with making an inquiry.

[November 1761.]

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I tell you now what I think before God. You are not only not obliged to confess the sins which, as you write me, you certainly remember and can swear never to have confessed, but you do wrong when you accuse yourself of them; hence you are not obliged to accuse yourself of them, and the confessors that hear you do very wrong.

It is not necessary that you know in detail the reasons, which are certain for me; it is sufficient that I tell you so on my own conscience and before God.

I also add: You should rejoice, for I regard your eternal salvation as assured.[17154]

As for Molfetta's son,[17155] I, as well as Fathers Ferrara and Mazzini, leave the matter entirely in your hands; I also hold Father Margotta's vote: hence you see the youth stands a very good chance.

However, before receiving him write to Fathers Villani, Caione and Fiocchi.[17156] I intend to write to them, but perhaps I shall forget to do so: I therefore ask your Reverence to write also as soon as you find an opportunity.

It must be understood that the young man has a patrimony and that, moreover, there is no obstacle to prevent him from entering the Congregation. Live Jesus and Mary!

I bless you.

of the Most Holy Reeeemer.

Letter 368

TO D. NICOLÒ PENTIMALLI, AT S. EUFEMIA, DIOCESE OF MILETO

Sentiments of condolence for the death of Father Pentimalli.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, November 28, 1761.

Very Reverend and Dear Sir: I know not whether my sorrow at the death of your brother[17157] has been greater than yours. May the divine will always be done!

Please accept my very great thanks to you for your charity to our Fathers, and should they still be there, encourage them, and tell them that I have written to them to Messina, thinking that my letter would no longer find them at your place. Let them know that they should also say Masses[17158] for Father Amarante[17159] whom God has called to himself.

I again thank you for your great kindness towards my companions, and I remain,

Your very humble and very devoted servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

Letter 369

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA, RECTOR OF ILICETO AND MASTER OF NOVICES

Announcement of the arrival of a novice.

Live Jesus, Joseph, and Mary!

NOCERA, November 28, 1761.

The young man who has no patrimony is coming, but as he is a youth of great talent and of an excellent disposition he has been received.

If I mistake not, Fathers Villani and Caione have been written to, but I do not remember having received an answer. Let your Reverence see about the answer, so that afterwards they may not complain.

I hear that the other young man of Molfetta [Francesco Romano] has come and that he is even brighter than the first; the examination of these two youths we shall leave to Father Rizzi.

I bless you all.

After the Roman edition.

Letter 370

TO FATHER OLYMPIO PAVONE, OF THE CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY SACRAMENT, AUTHOR OF VARIOUS WORKS OF PIETY

He congratulates the author on the subject of his compositions and on the manner in which he treats them.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph!

NOCERA, December 27, 1761.

My very dear Father: I have read your works; you have given to them all one aim, namely, the frequent reflection on eternity. How much are you not yourself penetrated with the thought of eternal things! Your books prove this; but your conduct has proved this in a still more striking manner. If indeed you have renounced all the affection for this world, if you have entered the holy society of missionaries to which you belong, you have done so only in order to occupy yourself with the eternal Good.

The salutary effect that these thoughts have produced on your mind, you have vividly portrayed in your works, and all those that read them attentively will derive from it, I hope, the same profit. Like reflections are in fact powerful enough by themselves to convert the soul that is most attached to the perishable goods of this earth, and to stimulate pious souls to walk on the road that leads to perfection. Who could deny this? Saints became saints only by reflecting on eternity.

Please accept, my Reverend Father, the expression of the profound respect, with which I have the honor to be

Your very devoted and very grateful servant,

ALFONSO DE LIGUORI,

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

After a copy printed at the head of the book of Father Pavone, entitled “Via Facile del Paradiso” (The Easy Way to Paradise), edition of 1863.

Letter 371

TO FATHER ANTONIO TANNOIA

He sends a letter addressed to the novices.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 28, 1762.

I write specially to the novices who have written to me, but I have besides written another general letter which I beg your Reverence to read leisurely to the novices in the chapel. In the next Chapter it may serve the purpose of a sermon.

Let them hear the letter on their knees, so that they may accept it with greater devotion, and read it and make them hear it slowly, slowly; and preserve it, because it will be of use for other novices. I bless you. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

Have the novices read my work on religious,[17160] because it is full of practical things; point out to them the chapters that are to be read.

After the original preserved in the archives of our house at Pagani.

Letter 372

TO THE NOVICES IN THE HOUSE AT ILICETO

Inestimable value of the religious vocation.—Means of preserving it.

Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

NOCERA, January 28, 1762.

My very dear Brethren: God knows how much I envy you. Had I only had in my youth, like you, the happiness of living retired in God's house in the midst of so many virtuous companions, who excite one another to love our Lord more and more, and far from this cursed world in which so many are lost!

Yes, I envy you, and I recommend to you to thank God unceasingly for the grace that he has given you to leave the world for the love of him.

These are graces that are not granted to all. How many companions of your age, in your country, are now living a life of distraction, of uneasiness, are exposed to a thousand dangers, and are probably living even away from God; for it is difficult for a young man to live in the world without being a slave of the devil!

But be on your guard; for the enemy always seeks to make you lose your vocation. When he has gained this point, he will have gained everything.

Let every one of you be convinced that there is no one that will not have to encounter his storm amidst great darkness.

There is, therefore, no other remedy than to keep from reasoning with temptation and to have immediately recourse to God, saying: O Lord! I have given myself entirely to Thee, and I do not wish to leave Thee; even if all the rest abandon Thee, I will always be united to Thee.

You should also have recourse especially to Mary, who is called the Mother of perseverance; if we have recourse to this tender Mother, and this we should constantly do, it is impossible for us to lose our vocation.

Hold for certain that whoever dies in the Congregation will not only be saved but will be saved as a saint, and will have a high place in heaven.

Attach yourselves, therefore, more and more to the love of Jesus Christ; love is a chain of gold that attaches souls to God, and attaches them so closely that they seem not to be able to become separated from him.

Hence I wish you always to make acts of love in your prayers, Communions, visits, spiritual readings, in your cells, in the refectory, at your walks, in every place and at all times.

He that loves Jesus Christ with his whole heart does not fear to lose him, and he is ready to suffer for the love of him every kind of pain, of contempt, of poverty.

If anyone, on the contrary, does not adopt this method he will easily lose his vocation; and this, my dearly beloved Brethren, is the greatest misfortune that can befall you. Hence I pray to God to send you death rather than permit you to lose your vocation—a misfortune that would drag along with it all kinds of evils.

Be persuaded that if you return to the world after having lost your vocation and turned your back on God, you will not have the courage to apply yourselves to prayer; for while wishing to apply yourselves to it you would always hear yourselves reproached for your unfaithfulness. If you would thus neglect prayer, as it is probable you would, and if you found yourselves in the midst of the world, of bad companions, of dangerous occasions, when you would no longer receive special favors from our Lord, who usually treats in this manner those that are unfaithful to his call, what would become of you in time and eternity?

And even if you would save your soul, though this would be difficult, you would at least lose the beautiful crown that God would have prepared for you in order to reward your fidelity. In any case, be assured that you would always lead upon earth an unhappy life, full of continual disquietude, and tormented without ceasing for having left God in order to follow your own caprice.

I repeat: I pray to God to send you death rather than permit that such a misfortune should befall you.

I bless you now in the name of the Blessed Trinity, and especially of Jesus Christ, who by his death has merited for you the supreme and inappreciable grace of holy perseverance.

I beg you to love very much the Blessed Virgin so that she may obtain for you holy perseverance.

I beg you to love much the Mother of God and to call her to your aid if you wish to sanctify yourselves.

Be full of courage, be joyful! become saints and love Jesus Christ much, for he gave his life and blood for each one of you.

Become saints, and pray to God for me, a poor old man, who is near death without having done anything for God; do you at least who remain here below love him for me.

I hope, however, before death, to see you and to embrace you after you have attached yourselves to Jesus Christ by the holy vows.

I do not cease to pray for you, every day and several times a day; do the same for me.

I embrace you in the Sacred Heart of Jesus Christ, and bless you anew. Live Jesus, Mary, Joseph, and Teresa!

I have a favor to ask of you; if anyone should feel himself importuned by a temptation against his vocation,—I do not mean a transient but a permanent temptation—let him write to me at once, and let him not resolve upon doing anything till he has received my answer; then let him do what he wishes.

After the Roman edition.

TO THE NOVICE, DON VINCENZO BUONOPANE.[17161]

He exhorts the novice to unite himself more and more to Jesus Christ.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

NOCERA, 28, [January, 1762.]

It affords me great pleasure to hear of your consolation. The time for which you so ardently longed has come. See that you do not allow the devil to laugh at you.

Seek to unite yourself closely to Jesus Christ and to our Lady, and do not look for sensible consolations.

When you feel dry and weary, pray and offer yourself to our Lord. Do not doubt that our Lord wishes to make a saint of you.

It grieves me to hear that I have lost the favor of Mgr. Martinez[17162] on your account; but I hope he will soon be appeased.

I bless you, and I recommend myself in your prayers to Jesus Christ after holy Communion.

Live Jesus, Mary, and Joseph!

of the Most Holy Redeemer.

PREFACE

THE great bishop of St. Agatha appears wonderful, even among the Saints of God, yet it would scarcely be possible to select a biography more instructive, and even interesting, to readers of every class and condition. A transcendent model for laymen, priests, religious and secular, superiors of communities, and rulers in the Church of God; a man who was a hero to his valet, of whom his own officials affirmed that "a hundred bishops would not do what he did alone;" of whom Clement XIV said, when refusing to accept his resignation of the mitre: He can govern the diocese from his bed; his ,very shadow is sufficient to govern it; a missionary through whom the Holy Ghost spoke so forcibly that some of his auditors actually died of the grief and contrition his burning words inspired; a Founder, whose sons still recall to our minds his lineaments, and, thanks to God, his virtues, his contagious simplicity, his ardent love for the Blessed Sacrament and the Blessed Mother; a contemplative who passed whole nights kneeling absorbed before his Love; an author who has enriched Catholic theology with over a hundred works, sufficient to earn for many a well-merited immortality; a scholar who has quoted in his writings nearly eight hundred Christian authors—Italian, Spanish, German, Irish, English, Scotch, African, and American; a preacher whose zeal never flagged, who was often known to preach several times a day; a confessor who was always the first to enter the confessional and the last to leave it; and, most wonderful of all, a man who, having lived over ninety years, "returned to his Creator, without a spot, the stole of innocence he had received in baptism," as the acts of his canonization attest.

When we add his many foundations, missions given and repeated in almost every town and hamlet in the kingdom of Naples, innumerable souls guided in the higher paths of the spiritual life, conventual and educational establishments founded or reformed, we may well revert to the marvelous industry of the earlier monastic founders, which our saints alone have been able to rival in modern times,—to Columbanus, who ordained that his monks should go to rest so fatigued as to fall asleep on the way, and get up before they had slept enough; for, what was the whole life of our saint but an heroic and successful effort to keep religiously the appalling vow by which he bound himself never to waste a moment of time.

This work, undertaken through obedience, has been for us a labor of love and devotion. It is hoped that it will become, if we may so speak, a popular life of the great Doctor, the size and price of which will place it within the reach of the multitude. In its preparation, we have used "Tannoia's Memoirs," Cardinal Villecourt's "Vie et Institut de Saint Alphonse," "The Oratorian Life of Saint Alfonso," A Life of Saint Alphonso by a Redemptorist Father, Life of the Saint, by Rispoli, the rule, the letters, and other works of the Saint, most of which have not yet appeared in English.

We give, as an appropriate introduction, the admirable Etude entitled MERCY AND LOVE, published by Léon Gautier, in L' Univers, on the publication of Cardinal Villecourt's Life of our Saint, in 1863.

ST. ALPHONSUS'S CONVENT OF MERCY, NEW ORLEANS,

Feast of St. Alphonsus, 1873.

INTRODUCTION

MERCY AND JOY.

IT is not without a special design that God places each of His saints on the theatre of this world at one epoch rather than another. In the Divine economy nothing is abandoned to chance. Wherever the Church approaches a crisis, and seems menaced with a defeat, God gives a saint to earth. And such a saint —in himself alone a magnificent gift of Providence—is invariably endowed by heaven with the graces peculiarly necessary at that precise moment for the healing of the world and the victory of the Church.

Against Arianism, God raised up an Athanasius, a Hilary of Poitiers; to counteract Roman decadence, God sent St. Benedict and his legions of toiling monks; to the hypocritical poverty of the Manichean Albigenses, God opposed the sincere and most magnificent poverty of Francis d'Assisi; the verbosity of the heretics He neutralized by the eloquence of a Dominic and the science of a Thomas Aquinas; against the perpetual militia of Protestantism there came forth from the soil of Catholicism the standing armies of St. Ignatius and St. Vincent de Paul.

Finally, and to come to our subject, at a time when the Christian world was in danger of becoming Jansenist; when Mercy and Joy were banished as foreign from almost every country and every hearth; when confessors armed themselves with iron sternness against weak and shuddering sinners; when frequent communion began to be regarded as an impossibility, if not a crime; when the heretics would have effaced from our Sacred books, whose every page they replenish and illuminate, the words Gaudium et Lætitia; at the critical period between the seventeenth century, which commenced universal secularization, and the eighteenth, which was about to consummate it, God sent into this world a saint destined to take Mercy and Joy by the hand, and render them victorious in every Christian household; a saint who would rob confessors of the heavy armor which. suppressed the beatings of their hearts and rendered their arms powerless to embrace sinners; a saint who was to make frequent communion the cherished practice of new Catholic generations; who would love, and cause others to love, the words Joy and Gladness, and would make Sweetness, Unity, and Love triumph for many ages, perhaps forever!

Who this saint is, our readers have already conjectured. It is Saint Alphonsus Maria di Liguori, who was born September 27, 1696, and died August 1, 1787, aged ninety years, laden with virtues and resplendent with miracles.

We will now speak of Alphonsus as being in a peculiar manner the destroyer of Jansenism.

I

St. Alphonsus was gifted with a most ardent temperament, and expressed his thoughts with a happy vivacity. More than once he turned the fire of his eloquence against the Jansenist sectaries: "That meeting which took place at Bourg-Fontaine was less an assembly of men than of demons." And again: "WHAT GOOD HAVE THE FRENCH JANSENISTS EFFECTED BY MAKING GOD SEEM LIKE A TYRANT?"

These words show the fixed sentiments of our saint, and he was not among those who change their sentiments every day. But previous to refuting these heretics in his books, he had already refuted them by his acts. The most beautiful Treatise against Jansenism is the Life of St. Alphonsus!

Scarcely had he been admitted to Holy Orders, when the ruling passion of his life became manifest, with all its ardor, with all its enthusiasm—his passion for great sinners. He put himself in their way; he met them everywhere; he pursued the most wretched; he attracted them; he heard their confessions and absolved them. "He could not endure," says Cardinal Wiseman,[17163] in his beautiful panegyric on our saint, "those confessors who received their penitents with a discouraging, supercilious air; or who, having heard them, sent them off disdainfully, as unworthy or incapable of the divine mercy. His whole life was a protest against proceedings of this nature, and towards the close of his career, he could use those magnificent words which are the confirmation of his glory, and which should be written in letters of diamond: 'I DO NOT REMEMBER THAT I EVER SENT AWAY A SINNER WITHOUT ABSOLUTION.' "

In fact, the great honor of St. Alphonsus is, that he restored Mercy to its true place in the Church. God had been regarded as a sort of giant, harsh and terrible, before whom men trembled, pale, ghastly, devoured by fear. Our saint annihilated these unworthy representations—dangerous and stupid pictures, which distorted the lineaments of the true God. He has shown us what is really the divine aspect; he has pointed out Jesus weeping over sinners, and lovingly extending His arms towards them. The Jansenists suppressed the paternity of God. St. Alphonsus is among those who have restored to Him His character of Father, that is to say, His goodness.

And when our saint took up his pen, his doctrine was not at variance with his practice. In his "Praxis Confessarii," the great bishop of St. Agatha lays it down that the confessor is at once a father, a physician, a teacher, and a judge. Well, the procrastinating Jansenists would not agree to all this. Here is a great sinner, who, with trembling knees and shame-stricken countenance, comes to make an agonizing confession of twenty or thirty years' infamy. "Will you," asks the saint, "terrify him, and turn him off from month to month, according to the present regime? No, no; it is a Jansenist doctrine thus to defer absolution." And with a countenance almost terrible, he adds: "It is not difficult, then, to say to your brother: 'Go off, you are damned; I cannot absolve you.' But if we consider the value of the Blood of Jesus Christ, we should hold such conduct in abhorrence? "

Thus speak the saints: those who have least need of mercy for themselves dispense it most freely to their brethren. True physicians, they do not say to the sick, "Wait; in some days I may dress your bleeding wounds." True fathers, they do not say, "Wait; after some months, I shall open my arms to embrace my repenting son." True teachers, they do not refuse to give decisions, and leave poor souls to perish in the dark. True judges, they do not inflict on the accused a horrible suspense, broken by sobs and watered with tears. The Jansenists, in being very severe, imagined themselves very wise; but what did they do? What use to say to penitents, "Come back to-morrow." The penitents did not come back. They made humanity loathe pardon by selling it so dear; and peace, being so tardy in bestowing it. I know that some will object to us the probabilism of St. Alphonsus; they will affirm that he sinned by an excess contrary to that of the Jansenists; they were too severe, he was too lenient. The Saint, with an elevation of principle which is well known, a thousand and a thousand times proclaims that "it is always necessary to act with moral certitude." He contents himself with adding "of two probable opinions, one is not obliged to adopt the more rigid." Is this, then, laxity? Or do you prefer the Jansenist proposition: "Some commandments of God are impossible to man?" Morose, forbidding, and austere, the Jansenists pointed out the way of salvation, but they strewed it with difficulties almost insurmountable—angular stones, sharp blades, and burning coals; all these must be encountered.

"My brother," says a sweet voice, "begin by walking in the path before you; it is uneven, stony, rough, but you can tread it, and you will even find thereon some flowers which the goodness of God scatters, to cheer and console you. Later on, you may enter on more difficult ways, but you must not despair in the beginning. God is good!" Thus speaks Alphonsus, and man takes courage. "Always acting with moral certainty, but not always adopting the more rigorous sentiment," he has confidence in mercy, he experiences some joy, he looks hopefully toward God. And not only does he attain salvation, but often goes farther, and acquires perfection. This is the work of our Saint, of his writings, of his actions. Yet more, he has been the consoler of desolate humanity.

II

It is well Alphonsus has triumphed. He has made the confessional a consolation; he has installed therein goodness instead of indignation; the Father, in a word. But his mission is far from being fulfilled. In our churches reigns a timid, or rather, affrighted silence; eyes are no longer lifted to the tabernacle; the Eucharistic Majesty is dreaded; once a year the faithful are admitted, after a protracted and austere preparation, to approach the terrible altar; once a year the banquet of the heavenly Father is spread before them; once a year they may receive their God. During the remainder of the year, they can only remember or expect Him. Mothers in tears cannot unite themselves to the Consoler of their sorrows; sinners cannot more frequently draw from the tabernacle the strength their weakness so often needs the children cease to remember the Eucharist. On the door of the tabernacle, the icy finger of implacable Jansenism had written: "Love is not permitted to descend into the hearts of men oftener than once a year."

Arnauld's book, "Frequent Communion," has accomplished a mischief that can scarcely be undone. It has plunged Catholic souls into a lethargy—those souls that God created to be everlastingly awake. The very movements of our hearts are arrested by the chilling touch of Jansenism. Hearts must not beat, love must not appear—fear, terror, awe—these alone are authorized. Mercy no longer dwells on our altars; the terrible God enthroned on them is always ready to hurl his thunderbolts. Frightful doctrines, which Alphonsus alone was able to undermine.

This great man enters our churches; with energetic zeal he opens a passage to our altars; he ascends the steps; a finger is lovingly pointed toward the tabernacle, and a powerful voice cries out to all Christian people, "Come, come; Love suffers strangely from your absence; Love is left alone." Then they come. The beautiful books of the Saint have reassured all souls. And these are only echoes of the words of all the saints. Alphonsus is in perfect accord with St. Charles Borromeo and with St. Vincent de Paul; with Popes and with Councils; with Jesus Christ, above all. He has expanded, he has dilated souls. Our hearts are more vast since his day. A moment ago, we said that he had raised MERCY to its rightful position among men; the same he has done with LOVE.

Who can sum up the incomparable prayers, the effusions of love, the crimes prevented, the virtues acquired or preserved, through the influence of our Saint? He has augmented Communions by hundreds of thousands; by hundreds of thousands then must we count up the wonders of purity, innocence, and virtue, which he has really produced in the world of souls.

III

There are certain men who, in closing their eyes on the sun of this world can bear themselves this magnificent testimony: "I have always loved what is great." Well, on the bed of death every Jansenist might have said: "I have always loved what is little." I cannot imagine a Jansenist having an elevated thought. We have seen them dry up the sources of Mercy and Love; nor did their harshness stop here, they must dry up the very sources of salvation. Their hideous doctrine of grace drove Love not only from earth, but even from heaven; so that poor, stolid humanity with tearful eye and riven soul, knew not where to find it. "Jesus Christ did not die for all men," said the Jansenist murderers of Love; God wills to save only the predestined, and these are necessitated to do right, since man cannot resist interior grace.

Here my heart rebels, my anger is enkindled. Such were the doctrines proposed to the Christians of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries! And we are astonished that they became disgusted with such odious principles! We are astonished that humanity, to whom the smile of Mercy, the smile of Love, the smile of Hope, were interdicted, became Jansenist or revolutionary! I am no longer amazed at the excesses of the National Assembly, since I see so many Jansenists on its benches. Still less am I surprised at the excesses of the Revolution, since among its terrible actors figure so many ancient Jansenists. These men had hearts of steel! their actions were eloquent of the fatalism and despair of their doctrines!

Well, whom does God send to restore to men the hope of an easier and more universal salvation? Who will become the consoler of wretched humanity, and open anew the beautiful paths to beatitude? 1. is still St. Alphonsus. He begins by laying down the principle that "God wills with a true and sincere will, that all should be saved, and none lost—that Jesus Christ died for ALL men." Then, in his memorable book entitled "The Great Means of Prayer," he establishes incontestably that, "God, willing the salvation of all men, has given to each the graces necessary to attain it. If He fail to give the efficacious grace, He at least gives the sufficient grace of being able actually to pray. And by prayer, everyone can obtain the efficacious grace to fulfil the law, and work out his salvation."

The most culpable of the damned, had he wished to profit by the grace of prayer common to all, would have obtained by prayer the requisite grace, and would have been saved.

Ah! at last I breathe freely. No longer is hope deadened within me. I see heaven peopled; I see the ways of salvation frequented; I see that God is good. I can throw myself on my knees; God is not inexorable. Away with these odious Jansenist crucifixes, whose arms are so contracted; I must have wide arms, immense arms, capable of enclosing all the sinners in the world. Give me the Jesus Christ of St. Alphonsus, not him of Arnauld and Saint-Cyran.

IV

A phenomenon which has always seemed strangely surprising to me is, that all revolutionists have been passionately attached to the Jansenists, and passionately beloved by them. It is nevertheless certain that the Jansenists were the most intolerant, morose, and illiberal of sectaries. It is equally true that we, Catholics, defended against them all human liberties, and at the same time, the cause of Mercy, Love, and Hope. But the Jansenists were rebels; that suffices for our adversaries. And above all, they were enemies of the Holy See; that explains everything. It cannot now be a matter of surprise to see among our opponents Michelet and Nicole, the Siècle and the Provinciales, the Socialists even, with Saint-Cyran and Arnauld. All rebellions are connected, and are true to each other.

Not satisfied with effacing from the world all ideas of love, goodness, and hope, the Jansenists wished also to blot out the idea of unity. They were the most ardent and the most dangerous of Gallicans. This fact is so notorious that it is unnecessary to demonstrate it. We may add that the Jansenists managed their revolt well. Yes, during two centuries a school existed in the bosom of the Church which affirmed that "a Council is above the Pope," in other words, that members are superior to their head, and can assume its peculiar functions. Yes, during two centuries certain theologians used their best efforts to annihilate the idea of Infallibility, an idea which is the grandest honor of the human race; for, as the good Bishop of Lille recently said: "Man is
